In the meane time this may seeme strange, that the same Thomas Arundell, who a little before sitting vpon iudgement against the lord Cobham, and pronounced sentence of death vpon him, did himselfe feele the stroke of death, and the sentence of God executed vpon him before the other. Who would haue thought that the lord Cobham being so cast and condemned definitiuely by the archbishops sentence, but that hee should haue died long before the archbishop? But such be the works of Gods almightie hand, who so turneth the wheele that this condemned lord surmised his condemner 3. or 4. yeares.

Thomas Arundell giueth sentence against the lord Cobham: and God giueth sentence against Thom. Arundel.

The condemned man ouercometh his condemner.

In the death of this archb. first Ployder Virgil is deceiued, who in his 22. book, pag. 441. affirmed his death to be an. 1415. and in the second yere of king Henry 5. also after the beginning of the Councell of Constance, who in deed neuer reached the beginning thereof, nor euer saw the second yere of that king, vnlesse ye count the first day for a yere) but died before an. 1414. Feb. 20. Ex hist. S. Albani & multis. Furthermore concerning the death of this Arundell, and the maner thereof, who had been so heauie a troubler of Christs saints in his time, because the thing seemeth worthie of noting, to behold the punishment of God vpon his enemies, this is the report, as I haue found it alleaged out of Thomas Gascoin in Dictionario Theologico: Whose plaine words be these: An. 1414. Tho. Arundel Cant. Archiepiscop. sic linguam perculsus erat, vt nec deglutire, nec loqui per aliquot dies ante mortē suam potuerit, diuitis epulonis exemplo, & sic tantum obijt. Atque multi tunc fieri putabāt, quia verbū alligasset, ne suo tempore prædicaretur. That is, Thomas Arundel archb. of Cant. was so stricken in his tongue, that neither he could swallow nor speake for a certaine space before his death, much like after the example of the rich glutton, and so died vpon the same. And this was thought of many to come vpon him, for that hee so bound the word of the Lord, that it should not be preached in his daies, &c. Which if it be true, as it doth well here appeare, these and such other horrible examples of Gods wrath may be terrible spectacles for such as occupie their tongues and braines so bustlie to stop the course of Gods word, striuing but against the streame; against the force wherof, neither they are able to resist, and many times in resisting are ouerturned themselues & drowned therein. And thus much for the death of Thomas Arundell, who continued archbishop in the see of Cant. the space of 18. yeares.

An example of Gods working hand against the enemies of his word.

The marueilous hand of God vpon Thomas Arundel archbishop of Canturbury.

Iohn Chichelie archbishop of Cant.

After this Arundell, succeeded next in the said see of Cant. Henry Chichelie, made archb. An. 1414. and sate 25. yeares. This Henry following like vnto the steps of his predecessour, shewed himselfe no small aduersarie against the fauourers of the truth. In whose time was much trouble and great affliction in the church. For as the preaching and teaching of the word did multiplie and spread abrode daily more and more, so on the contrarie side, more vigilant care and strait inquisition followed and encreased against the people of God, by reason wherof diuers did suffer, and were burned, some for feare fled the countrie, many were brought to examination, and by infirmitie constrained to abiure. Of whom hereafter (Christ willing) particularly in order of their times we will entreat.

As true pietie, and sincere preaching of Christs word began at this time to decay: So idle monkerie and vaine superstition in place thereof began to increase. For about the same yeare the king began the foundation of two monasteries, one of the one side of Thames ofriers obseruants, the other on the other side Thames called Shene and Sion, dedicated to Charter house monks, with certaine Bridgit nuns or recluses, to the nūber of 60. dwelling within the same precinct, so that the whole number of these with priests, monks, deacons, and nunnes, should equall the number of 12. apostles and 72. disciples. The order of these was according to the description of S. Paul the apostle, Col. 1. Eate not, taste not, touch not, &c. to eate no flesh, to weare no linnen, to touch no money, &c.

Sion & Bethlem builded.

About Michaelmas, the same yeer the king began his parliament at Leicester, aboue mentioned. In the which parliament the commons put vp their bill againe, which they had put vp before. An. 11. Hen. 4. that temporalties disorderly wasted by men of the church, might be conuerted and employed to the vse of the king, of his earles and knights, and to the releefe of the poore people, as is before recited, page 513. In feare of which bill, lest the king would giue thereunto any comfortable audience (as testifieth Rob. Fabian and other writers) certaine of the prelats and other headmen of the church put the king in mind to claime his right in France. Whereupon Henry Chichelie archbishop of Canturburie made a long and solemne oration before the king to perswade him to the same, offering to the king in the behalfe of the clergy great and notable sums. By reason whereof (saith Fabian) the bill was againe put off, and the king set his mind for the recouery of the same: so that soone after hee sent his letters and messengers to the French king concerning that matter, and receiued from him againe answere of derision, with a pipe of tennis balles (as some record) sent from the Dolphin, for him to play with at home. Whereby the kings mind was incensed the more toward that voiage. Who then furnishing himselfe with strength and armour, with powder and shot, and gunstones to play with in France, and with other artillery for that purpose conuenient, so set ouer into France, where hee got Hareflew with diuers other townes and castles in Normandie and Picardy, and at Agincourt had a great victorie ouer the French armie, they being counted but 7. thousand, by picking sharpe stakes before them, &c. After that hee wanne Caen, Toule, Rouan with other townes moe, as Peldune, or Peltune, and married with Katharine the French kings daughter. And yet notwithstanding the third time hee made his voyage againe into France, where at length at Bloys he fell sicke and died: concerning al which voyages, because they are sufficiently discoursed in Fabian, Hal, and other Chronographers, referring therefore the reader vnto them, I will returne my storie to other matters of the church more effectuall.

The entrie of the storie of the Bohemians.

Declared a little before how by the occasion of Queen Anne, which was a Bohemian and maried to king Richard 2. the Bohemians comming thereby to the knowledge of Wicklifes bookes here in England, began first to taste and sauour Christs Gospell, till at length by the preaching of John Hus, they encreased more and more in knowledge. Insomuch that pope Alexander the 5. hearing thereof, began at last to stirre coales, & directeth his bull to the archbishop of Swinco, requiring him to looke to the matter, and to prouide that no person in churches, schooles or other places should maintaine that doctrine, citing also John Hus to appeare before him. To whom the said John answering againe, declared that mandate or bull of the pope bitterly to repugne against the manifest examples and doings both of Christ and of his apostles, and to be preiudicial to the libertie of the Gospell, in binding the word of God not to haue free recourse. And therefore from this mandate of the pope he appealed to the same pope better aduised. But while he was prosecuting his appeale, pope Alexander died, as is aforesaid, pag. 510. Ex Cochlæo. in hist. Hussit.

Pope John 23

After whom succeeded pope John the three and twentith, who also playing his part here in this matter like a pope, sought by all meanes possible how to prepossesse and keepe vnder the Bohemians, first beginning to worke his malice vpon the foresaid John Hus their preacher. Who at the same time preaching at Prage in the temple of Bethleem, because hee seemed rather willing to teach the Gospell of Christ, then the traditions of bishops, was therefore accused of certaine to the foresaid pope John the three and twentith for an heretick. The bishop committed the whole matter vnto cardinall de Columna, who when he had heard the accusation, he appointed a day to John Hus, that he should appeare in the court of Rome: which thing once done, Wenceslaus king of the Romans and of Bohemie, at the request specially of his wife Sophia, and of the whole nobilitie of Boheme, as also at the earnest sute and desire of the towne and Vniuersitie of Prage: He sent his embassadors to Rome, to desire the bishop to quit and clearely deliuer John Hus from that sentence and iudgement; and that if the bishop did suspect the kingdome of Boheme to bee infected with any heretical or false doctrine, that he should send his embassadors, the which might correct and amend the same, if there be any errour or fault in them. And that all this should be done at the only costs and charges of the king of Bohemie, and to promise in his name that he would aid and assist the bishops legats with all his power and authoritie, to punish all such as should be taken or found in any erroneous doctrine. In the meane season also John Husse before his date appointed, sent his lawfull and meeke procurators vnto the court of Rome, and with most firme and strong reasons, did proue his innocencie; whereupon he trusted so, that he thought he should haue easily obtained that he should not haue beene compelled, by reason of the great danger, to appeare the day appointed. But when as the Cardinall de Columna, (vnto whose will and iudgement the whole matter was committed) would not admit no defence or excuse: John Huss his procuratours appeale vnto the high bishop: yet notwithstanding, this last refuge did not so much preuaile with cardinall de Columna, but that he would openly excommunicate John Hus as an obstinate heretike, because he came not at his day appointed vnto Rome.

Notwithstanding forsomuch as his procurators had appealed vnto the high bishop, they had other iudges appointed vnto them, as cardinall Aquicinians and cardinall Genetines with certaine others. The which iudges after they had pondered and deferred the matter by the space of one yeare and a halfe, at last they returned to the sentence and iudgement of cardinall de Columna, and confirming the same, commanded John Hus his procurators that they should leaue off to defend him any more, for they would suffer it no longer. Whereupon when his procurators would not cease their instant sute, certaine of them were cast into prison, and grieuously punished, the other leauing their iudges vndone, returned into Bohemie.

Parum homus, Parum malum, Medium.

The Bohemians not withstanding little cared for all this, but continuing still as they were more in knowledge, so the lesse they regarded the pope, complaining daily against him and the archbishop for stopping the word of God, and the Gospell of Christ to be preached, saying that by their indulgences and other practises of the court of Rome, and of the bishops consistorie, they sought their owne profit, and not of Iesus Christ: that they plucked from the sheepe of Christ the woll and milke, and did not feed them, neither with the word of God nor with good exampies. Teaching moreouer and affirming, that the comun indulgences of the pope and prelats are not to be obeyed, but so farre as they follow the doctrine and life of Christ, and of his apostles, and that lay men ought to iudge the workes of prelats as Paul iudged the workes of Peter in correcting him: Gal. 2. Furthermore, they had amongst them certaine notes and obseruations, whereby they might discerne how far and wherein they might obey their prelats: they decided also and scorned the popes iurisdiction, because of the schisme that was then in the church, when there were three popes together one striuing against another for the papacy.

A Doubt of John Hus proponded.

Quer and besides this, at the same time John Hus did propound publikely, and by the notaries caused to be written 3. doubtfull questions, the tenor whereof followeth here word for word, and is this. Fro almuch, saith he, as it is good for men being in doubt to aske counsell, wherby al debitation remoued, they may be able the more firmely to adhere to the truth, three doubts here arise to be solued. The first doubt is, whether we ought to beleeue in the pope. The second, whether it be possible for any man to be saued, which confesseth not with his mouth vnto a mortall priest. The third doubt is, whether any of the Doctors do hold or say that some of Pharaos host being drowned in the red sea, & of 9 Sodomites being subuerted, be saued.

Credert in Deū. Credere Deo. Credere Deum. Psal. 115. vers. 4. & 118. vers. 42. Against this confession.

As concerning the first, he did hold negatiuely, alledging the saying of Bede vpon this place of the apostle: To him that beleeueth vpon him which iustifieth the wicked, his faith is imputed to righteousnes: Rom. 4. Vpon this place saith Bede: Aliud est credere in deum, aliud credere deo, aliud credere deum, &c. The second doubt, saith hee, the master of the sentences doth answere, lib. 4. dist. 17. cap. 11. in these words: What is then to be holden or said herein? Certes, that without the confession of the mouth, and assoiling of the outward paine, sins be forgiuen through contrition and humilitie of the heart, &c. For the third doubt he brought in the words of S. Hierom vpon the prophet Nahum, speaking of the Egyptians destroyed in the sea, and of the Sodomites destroyed with fire, and of the Israelites destroyed in the desert. Knoth you (saith Hieronie) that God therefore punished them for their sinnes here temporally, because they should not be punished hereafter perpetually, and therefore because they were here punished, they shall not be punished hereafter, for else the Scripture should lie, which is not to bee granted. These 3. questions he let John Hus bid bring in to declare how the Doctors do not agree in all things neither with the church of Rome, neither are to be followed in all points of all men.

Counsell of the prelats of Rome against the Gospellers.

It followeth moreouer after the death of the archbishop Swinco aboue mentioned, that one named Conradus was placed by the pope there to bee chiefe generall, which Conradus conferring with the diuines and Doctors of the Vniuersitie of Prage, required their aduices and counsels, what way they might best take to assuage the dissention and discords betwixt the clergie and the people. Wherupon a certaine councell was deuised to be holden after this forsaid maner as followeth.

1 First, that all Doctors and masters of the Vniuersitie of Prage should be assembled in the court of the archbishop and in his presence, that euery doctor and master should sweare, not to hold or maintaine any of the 45. articles of John Wickliffe before condemned.

2 Item, concerning the 7. Sacraments of the Church the heeres and censures of the church, the maners, rites, ceremonies, customes, and liberties of the church, concerning also the worshipping of reliques and indulgences, the orders and religions of the church, that euery one shall sweare that hee doth hold, beleeue and maintaine, and will maintaine, as doth the church of Rome and no otherwise, of the which church of Rome the pope is the head, and the colledge of cardinals is the body: who are the true and manifest successors of blessed S. Peter prince of the apostles, and of the colledge of the other apostles of Christ.

3 Item that euery one shall sweare, that in euery catholicke matter belonging to the church, that he will stand to the determination of the apostolicall see, and that hee will obey the prelats in all maner of things wheresoeuer, the thing, which is pure good, is not forbidden: or that which is mere ill, is not commanded: but is meane and indifferent betweene both. Which meane or indifferent thing, yet notwithstanding by circumstances of time, place or person, may be either good or euill.

4 Item, that euery one shall sweare and confesse by his oth, that the opinions of Wickliffe and others, touching the 7. Sacraments of the church and other things aboue ratified, being contrarie to the said church of Rome, be false.

5 Item that an oth be required of them all, that none of them shall hold, defend or maintaine any of the 45. articles of John Wickliffe aforesaid, or in any other matter catholicke, and especially of the 7. Sacraments and other articles aboue specified, but only as doth the church of Rome and no otherwise.

6 Item, that euery ordinarie in his diocesse shall cause the said premisses contained in the 1. 2. 3. 4. articles aforesaid, to bee published in his synods, and by his preachers to bee declared to the people in the kingdome of Bohemie.

7 Item, that if any clerke, student, or lay man shall withstand any of the premisses, that the ordinarie haue authoritie if he be conuicted thereof, to correct him according to the old lawes and canons, and that no man shall defend such one by any meanes, for none but the ordinarie hath power to correct such a man, because the archbishop is chancellor both of the kingdome and Vniuersitie of Prage.

8 Item, that the songs lately forbidden, being odious, slanderous and offensiue to others fame, bee not sung neither in streets, tauernes, nor any other place.

9 Item, that master John Hus shall not preach so long as he shall haue no absolution of the court, neither shall binder the preaching in Prage by his presence: that by this, his obedience to the apostolicall see may be knowne.

10 Item, that this councell doth appeare to be good and reasonable for the putting away of ill report and dissention that is in the kingdome of Boheme.

11 Item, if master John Hus, with his complices will performe this, which is contained in the 4. former articles, then we will be ready to say as they would with vs and haue vs, whensoeuer neede shall require, that we do agree with them in matter of faith: otherwise if they will not so do, here in giuing this testimony shall lie greatly vnto our lord the king and to the whole world. And moreouer, wee will be content to write to them to the court of Rome, and do the best we can for them, our honours saued. This counsell and deuice being considered amongst the head of the Vniuersitie of Prage, the foresaid administrator, named Conradus, presented vnto the king and to the barons of the realme, and also to the Senate of Prage. Whereof as soone as word came to John Hus and his adherents, they likewise drew out other articles in maner and form of a councell as followeth.

For the loue of God and the true preaching of his Gospel, for the health of the people, and to auoide the sinister and false infamie of the kingdome of Boheme, and of the Marquethie of Morauia, and of the citie and Vniuersitie of Prage, and for the reforming of peace and vnitie betweene the clergie and the scholars of the Vniuersitie:

1 First let the right and full decreement of the princes and of the kings counsell, be holden and stand in force, which betweene the lord archbishop Swinco on the one partie, and betweene the rector and master John Hus on the other partie, was made, proclaimed, sealed, and solemnly on both parts receiued and allowed in the court of our foresaid lord the king.

Steuen Palecz hath a great enuy to I. Hus.

2 Item, that the kingdome of Boheme remaine in his former rites, liberties, and common customes, so as other kingdomes and lands do enioy, that is, in all appzobations, condemnations, and other acts concerning the holy mother vniuersall church.

John Hus banished out of Prage.

3 Item, that master John Hus, against whom the foresaid lord Swinco, could obiect no crime before the councell, that the said John Hus may be present in the congregation of the clergy, and there whosoeuer will obiect to him either heresie or error, let him obiect, binding himselfe to suffer the like paine, if he do not proue it.

4 Item, if no man will set himselfe on the contrarie part against him, then let the commandement be made by our soueraigne lord the king through all his cities, and likewise let it be ordained and proclaimed through all villages and townes, that master John Hus, is ready to render account of his faith, and therefore if any will obiect vnto him any heresie or errour, let him write his name in the chancerie of the lord archbishop, and to bring forth his probations openly before both the parties.

5 Item, if none such shalbe found to obiect, or which will write his name, then let them bee called for, which caused to bee noised and rumoured in the popes court, that in the kingdome of Boheme

Boheme in the citie of Prage, and in the Marquesdome of Morauia, many there be whose hearts be inserted with heresie and errour, that they may proue who they be: and if they be not able to proue it, let them be punished.

6 Item, that commandement be directed to Doctors of Diuinitie and of the canon law, and to the chapter of cathedrall churches, and that it berequired of them all and of euery one particularly, that they will bring forth his name, if they know any such to be an heretike or erroneous, and if they denie to know any such, then let them make recognition thereof, before the publike notary, conteining the same with their seales.

7 Item, these things thus done and promised, then that our soueraigne lord the king, and also that the archbishop will giue commandement vnder paine, that no man shall call one another heretike or erroneous, vnlesse he will stand to the probation of that heresie or error, as it becommeth him.

8 Item, after these things obtained, that our soueraign lord the king, with the consent of his barons, will then leuie a subsidie, or collect of the clergie, and direct an honest ambassie to the popes court; with the which ambassadors, let them also goe vpon their owne proper charges or expences for their purgation, which haue caused this kingdome sadly and grieuously to be infamed in the apostolicall court.

9 Item, in the meane season for the presence of master John Hus no Interdict ought to bee made, as it was made of late contrary to the order and determination of our holy mother church, &c.

As this matter was thus in altercation betweene the two parts, the one obiecting, the other answering in articles, as is aforesaid; in the meane time it happened by the occasion of Ladislaus king of Naples, who had besieged the popes townes and territories, that pope Iohn railing vp warre against the said Ladislaus, gaue full remission of sinnes to all them which would warre of his side to defend the church. Then this bull of the popes indulgence was come to Prage, and there published, the king Wencellaus, who then fauoured that pope, gaue commandement that no man should attempt any thing against the said popes indulgences. But Hus with his followers, not able to abide the impiety of those pardons, began manfully to speake against them: of the which company were 3. certaine artificers, who hearing the priest preaching of these indulgences, did openly speake against them, and called the pope Antichrist, which would let vp the crosse to fight against his euenchristened. Wherfore they were brought before the senate, and committed to ward. But the people layning themselues together in armes, came to the magistrates, requiring them to be let lose. The magistrates with gentle words and faire promises satisfied the people, so that euery man returning home to his owne house, the tumult was asswaged. But the captiues being in prison, notwithstanding were there beheaded, whose names were John, Martine, and Stalcon. The death and martyrdome of these three being knowne vnto the people, they take the bodies of them that were slaine, and with great solemnity brought them vnto the church of Bethlem. At whose funerall diuers priests fauouring that side, did sing on this wise: These be the saints which for the Testament of God gaue their bodies, and their bodies were for his sake vnrighteously interred in the church of Bethlem. John Hus preaching at the same funerall, much commending them for their constancie, & blessing God the father of our Lord Iesus Christ, which had bid the way of his verity so from the prudent of this world, & had reueal. it to the simple lay people and inferior priests, which chose rather to please God then men.

The pope maketh warre.

John. Martine. Stalcon. Martyrs.

Thus this city of Prage was diuided. The prelates with the greatest part of the clergie, and moll of the barons, which had any thing to lose, did hold with the pope, especially Steuen Palecz, being the chiefest doer on that side. On the contrary part, the commons, with part of the clergie and students of the vniuersitie went with John Hus. Wencellaus the king fearing lest this would grow to a tumult, being moued by the doctors, prelats, and counsell of his barons, thought best to remoue John Hus out of the city, who had beene excommunicated before by the pope: And further, to cease this dissention risen in the church, committed the matter to the disposition of the doctors and the clergie. They consulting together among themselues, did set forth a decree, ratified and confirmed by the sentence of the king, containing the summe of 18. articles for the maintenance of the pope and the see of Rome, against the doctrine of Wickliffe and John Hus. The names of the Doctors of diuinity were these: Steuen Palecz, Stanislaus de Znoyma, Petrus de Ikoyma, Ioannes Helie, Andreas Broda, Iohannes Hildesen, Matheus Monachus, Hermannus Heremita, Georgius Bora, Simon Wenda, &c. John Hus thus departing out of Prage, went to his countrie, where he being protected by the lord of the soile, continued there preaching; to whom resorted a great concourse of people; neither yet was hee so expelled out of Prage, but that sometimes hee resorted to his church at Bethlem, and there also preached vnto the people.

Moreouer, against the said decree of the Doctors, John Hus with his company replied againe, and answered to their articles, with contrary articles againe, as followeth.

The obiections of Iohn Hus and of his part, against the decree of the Doctors.

FIrst, the foundation of the Doctors whereupon they found all their writings and counsels is false: which foundation is this, whereas they say that part of the clergy in the kingdome of Boheme is pestilent and erroneous, and holdeth falsitie of the Sacraments.

2 The Doctors hereby do defame the kingdome of Boheme, and do raise vp new discords.

3 Let them shew therefore those persons of the clergie, whom they call pestilent, and so let them verifie their report, binding themselues to suffer the like paine, if they be not able to proue it.

4 False it is that they say, the pope and the cardinals to be the true and manifest successors of Peter and of the apostles, neither that any other successors of Peter and of the apostles, can be found vpon the earth besides them. Whereas no man knoweth whether he be worthie of hatred or of fauor. And all bishops and priests be successors of Peter and of the apostles.

5 Not the pope, but Christ onely is the head: and not the cardinals, but all Christs faithfull people be the body of the catholicke church, as all holy Scripture and decrees of the holy fathers do testifie and affirme.

6 And as touching the pope, if he bee a reprobate, it is plaine that hee is no head, no not member also of the holy church of God, but of the diuell, and of his synagogue.

7 The clergie of the Gospellers agreeing with the saying at saint Austen which they alledge, and according to the sanctions of the fathers, and determinations of the holy mother church, do say and affirme laudable: that the condemnation and prohibition of the 45. articles is vnlawfull, and vniust, and rashly done: for that not onely because the Doctors, but also all bishops and archbishops, in such great causes, namely, touching faith (as these articles doe) haue no authority at all, as appeareth, De baptismo et eius effectu, cap. Maiores. Et in Can. 17. dist. cap. Hinc fedi, &c.

8 The second cause of the discord which they alledge, also is most falce: seeing the faith of whole Christendome concerning the church of Rome, is diuided into 3. parts by the reason of 3. popes, which now together do reigne: and the 4. part is neutrall. Neither is it true, that we ought to stand in all things to the determination of the pope, and of the cardinals, but so farre forth as they do agree with the holy Scripture of the old & new Testament, from whence the sanctions of the fathers, did first spring, as is euident, De accusationibus cap. qualiter, &c.

9 For the 4. article they hold not into a certaine dolage, and more necessary to themselues. By reason that they notably haue reprehended the Gospellers, who in all their doings receiue the holy Scripture, which is the law of God, the way of truth and life) for their iudge and measure: and afterward they themselues do alledge the Scripture, Deut. 17. where al iudges both popes and cardinals are taught to iudge and discerne betweene leper and leper, and in euery ecclesiasticall cause, onely after the rule of Gods law. And so are they contrary vnto their second article, wherein they say: that in euery catholike matter we must run to the pope: which is contrary to the foolish condemnation of the articles aforesaid.

10 Consequently, like idiots they doe most falsly alledge for their purpose the canon, vnder the name and authority of Hierome, written 24. q. 1. Hæc est fides papa, &c. where they do apply the words of Hieronie most impertinently to the pope of Rome, which he writeth to S. Austen, calling him a most blessed pope.

24. q. 1. Hæc est fides. Austen called pope.

11 By which place of Hierome, it is manifest that the first article of those Doctors is false. Forasmuch as by these words appeareth that other besides the bishop of Rome and his cardinals are called blessed popes, holding the faith and feate of Peter, and are successors of the apostles as was Austen and other holy Popes mo.

12 Whereof it followeth moreouer, that the church of Rome is not that place, where the Lord did appoint the principall see of his whole church. For Christ which was the head priest of all, did first sit in Jerusalem, and Peter did sit first in Antioch, and afterward in Rome. Also other popes did sit some in Bonony, some at Perusium, some at Auinion.

Pope Ioane a woman.

13 Item, the foresaid prelats are falsifiers of the holy Scriptures and canons, and therefore are worthie to bee punished: Which affirme and say, that we must obey the pope in all things. For why? it is knowne that many popes haue erred, and one pope was also a woman. To whom not onely it was not lawfull to giue obedience, but also vnlawfull to communicate with them. As all Rubricos, and infinite canons do declare.

14 Item, their 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. 11. articles do stand and are grounded vpon vntrue and false persuasions. And therefore are to be reiected and detested like the other before: Seeing they doe induce not to peace and verity, but to dissention and falsitie.

15 It is manifest also to the laity, that this dissention among the clergie, riseth for no other cause, but only for the preaching of the Gospell, which reprehendeth such Simoniaks, and such heretickes in the church of God, as namely haunt the court of Rome, spreading out their branches abrode into all the world. Who deserue to be remoued and extirpate not only of the clergy gospellers but also of the secular power. And so these three vices, to wit, simonye, lecherie, and auarice (which is vsually) be the causes of all this dissension among the clergy in the kingdome of Boheme, and not the other, which they falsly ascribe to the gospellers of Prage. These three vices being remoued, peace & vnity would soone be reformed in the clergy.

16. Moreouer, their last article is too grosse, and not onely is without all law, but also without all colour of law: whereas they fondly and childishly doe argue thus: that the processes made against M. John Hus ought to bee obeyed, because so much the common sort of the clergie of Prage, hath receiued them. By the same reason they may argue also, that wee must obey the deuill, for our first parents Adam and Eue obeyed him. Also our fore-auncestors before vs were Pagans, wherefore we must obey them, and play also the Pagans.

17. But let this friuolous opinion go: this is certaine truth, that the said processes made against M. John Hus, by law are none. Forsomuch as they were obtained, drawn, wrought, and executed contrary to the commission of the pope, against the determination of the holy mother church, as appeareth Cap. Sacro de Sententia excom. and a thousand other lawes besides.

18. Finally, whosoeuer wittingly and obstinately doe defend & execute (the said processes made) or adherents vnto them, are all to be counted as blasphemers, excommunicate, and heretickes, as hath been afore written and exhibited to the lord general bishop of Constance. And more shall be declared and proued, if audience may be giuen openly before all the Doctors.

Ex Aenea Sylui. & Cochleo.

¶ Vnto these obiections of J. Hus and his part, the catholike Doctors against did answere in a long tedious processe: The scope whereof principally tended to defend the principality of the pope, and to maintaine his obedience aboue all other potentates in the world: affirming & contending, that although Christ is the head alone of the whole multitude of them that are sleeping in purgatorie, and which are labouring in the church militant, and which are reigning in heauen: yet this letteth not, but the pope is head of the church here militant, that is, of all the faithfull, which here in this world line vnder his office. Like as Christ is king of all kings, and yet Charles may bee the king of France: so say they, Christ may bee the vniuersall head, and yet the pope may bee head vnder him of the whole church. And thus concluded they that the pope is the head, and that the college of cardinals is the body of the Romish church; which church of Rome is placed in the ecclesiasticall office here ouer the earth, to know and define vpon euery ecclesiasticall and catholike matter: to correct errors, and to purge them, and to haue care vpon all such vniuersall matters, and cure vpon all vniuersall churches, and vpon the vniuersall flocke of faithfull christians. Forasmuch as in the regiment of the church though the vniuersall world, there must needs remain in such office alwaies some such minister and true successor of Peter, prince of the apostles and of the college of the other apostles of Christ: neither can there be found or giuen vpon earth any other successors but only the pope which is the head, and the college of cardinals, which is the body of the foresaid church of Rome. And although the whole vniuersall multitude of the faithfull do make the body of Christ, yet the same body of Christ is not placed here in office to exercise such authority vpon earth. Because that the vniuersall multitude was neuer yet, nor euer can be congregate together.

And therfore necessary it is, that some such true and manifest successors and iudges be appointed, to whom recourse must be had, in all such catholike and ecclesiastical matters determinable. For like as in earthly regiments, euery cause of discord is brought before his magistrate, and hath his place assigned where to bee decided: so like reason would require, that in principall matters and controuersies of faith, some such presidents and places be limited for the purpose to haue such doubts resolued. And this being granted, then the Doctors proceed, and here must needs conclude, (say they) that there cannot be giuen in all the world any other place, but only the church of Rome: the head whereof is the pope, and the body is the college of cardinals. For like as Christ departing out of this world in his corporall presence, left his body here with vs vnder the Sacrament in all other forms, whereby he remaineth with vs (according to his promise, Mat. vlt.) vnto the consummation of the world: euen so while Christ walked here on earth in his bodily presence, he was pope himselfe and chiefe bishop, and so head of the church here militant in earth corporally conioyned with the same, as the head is to his body. But after that he departed out of the world because his body, which is the church militant vpon the earth, should not be headlesse, therefore he left Peter and his successors to his church, for an head in his place, vnto the consummation of the world, saying to him: Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my church &c. Mat. 16. And againe he saith: Feede my sheepe: Ioan vlt. That is to say, be thou Peter the head ouer thy brethren.

Thus then M. John Hus being driuen out of Prage (as is afore touched) by the motion of these Doctors, and moreouer being so excommunicate, that no masse nor other mass bee said there where he was present: the people became mightily to grudge and to cry out against the prelats & other popish priests, which were the workers thereof, accusing them to be Simoniacks, couetous, whoremasters, adulterers, proud, sparing not to lay open their vices to their great ignominy and shame. And much craued reformation to be had of the clergie.

The king seeing the inclination of the people, being also not ignorant of the wickednesse of the clergie, vnder pretence to reforme the church, began to require greater exactions vpon such priests and men of the clergie, as were knowne & accused to be wicked liuers. Wherupon they on the other part, that fauoured John Hus, taking that occasion present, complained of all, accused many, and spared none, whomsoeuer they knew to bee of the catholick faction, or enemies to J. Hus. By reason whereof the priests of the popish clergy were brought, such as were faulty, into great distresse, and such as were not faulty, into great feare. Insomuch that they were glad to fall in, at least not to fall out with the protestants, being afraid to displease them. By this meanes M. Hus began to take some more liberty vnto him, and to preach in his church at Bethlem, and none to controll him: by the same incenses the people also receiued some comfort, and the king much gained money by that reason.

And thus the popish clergy, while they went about to persecute J. Hus, were inwrapped themselues in great tribulation, and afflicted on euery side, as well of lay men, as of learned men of the clergie. Insomuch that women also and children were against them. And by the same reason, wherewith they thought to entangle him, they were ouerthrowne themselues. For the doctors which before condemned this doctrine in J. Hus, for intolerable heresie, and cried out so much against him, for teaching that temporall lords might take away temporall liuings from the clergy sinning habitualiter, that is, lying & continuing still in the custom of iniquity: now when the K. and the lords temporall began to mearse them and bereaue them of their temporalties for their transgressions, the said doctors did keepe silence and durst speake neuer a word. Against, where the foresaid doctors before could not abide in John Hus, that tithes were to be counted for pure almes, now coming to the Guild-hal, were faine to entreat for their temporall goods, not to be taken from them, pleading the same temporalties to bee meere almes & deuotion of good men, giuen vnto the church. Ex Cochl.

And thus now did they themselues grant the thing, which before they did condemne. The more that the popes clergie was pinched, the more grudge and hatred redounded to John Hus, although he was in no cause thereof, but only their owne wicked deseruings, for the which cause Steuen Paletz, & Andreas de Broda, being the chiefe champions of that faction, though they could not remedie the cause, yet to ease their minds, wrote sharpe and cruell letters to maister Hus. And to helpe the matter forward, the pope also here must helpe at a pinch, who likewise writeth his letters to Wenceslaus king of Boheme, which was brother to Sigismund emperor, for the suppressing of John Hus and of his doctrine. Which was in the fifth and last yeere of his popedome, An. 1414. The tenor of whose letters to king Wenceslaus in this sort proceedeth.

The letter of pope Iohn to king Wenceslaus.

IOhn bishop seruant of Gods seruants, to his welbeloued son in Christ Wenceslaus, king of Romanes and of Boheme, greeting and apostolicall benediction. Among other desires and delights of our heart, which (though vnworthy) represent the roome of Christ here in earth, this doth chiefly redound to our singular comfort, so often as we doe heare of the brotherly entreatie of peace and of concord (by which concord kingdoms doe encrease, as contrary by discord they are diminished) which is between your honor, & our welbeloued son in the Lord, Sigismund your brother germaine and cosin, for the noble king of the Romanes, &c. And furthermore it followeth in these words: And as we haue cause to ioy at the premisses: so likewise againe the heauie rumors which are here, doe trouble and dampe our minds: For we heare, that in diuers places vnder your dominion, there be certaine which doe follow and leane to the errors of that archeretick Wickliffe, whose bookes haue been long since condemned in the generall Romane councell, and to be erroneous, hereticall, and swarming from the catholicke faith. And furthermore, which is worst of all, the said persons cleauing to the opinions of the hereticks (lest they should be corrected of their superior powers for their excesse, to couer their naughtines and stubbornes in despising the commandements of the apostolicall see) do openly teach disobedience and contempt of the keyes and ecclesiastical censure, to the subuersion of the apostolicall dignity, setting at nought the decrees of the holy fathers, and cosens. Wherefore we do exhort your worship for the mercy of our God, as hartily as we may or can, that it would please you, as we desire & hope you will, to effectuallie, to shew forth your regall power, both for the glory of God, and defence of the catholike faith, in such you go about to defend, and for the conseruation of your kingly name, state and honor, for the prosperous & safe gouernment of your kingdom and dominions, as it becommeth a catholick prince, whereby this blot blot of heresie (which doth so lamentablie and miserably spring and creepe in those parts, and doth so infect the minds of mortall men, to the destruction of their soules, and doth sequester them from the congregation of the pure and catholike faith and truth) may be rooted out, &c. Giuen at Bononia in the Ides of June, in the fifth yeere of our popedome, &c.

In this epistle of pope John aboue prefired, forsomuch as mention is made of a certaine councel before holden at Rome (which was foure yeres before) against the articles and bookes of John Wickliffe: it shall not be impertinent no; out of purpose to repeate a certaine merry historie, and worthy otherwise to be noted at, written by Nicolas Clemangis of a certaine spirit, which ruled the popish councels: his words are these.

The storie of an Owle appearing at the councell of pope Iohn. Ex Nic. Clemangis.

The same pope called a councel at Rome about foure yeres before, at the earnest sute of diuers men. And a masse of the holy Ghost being said at the entrance into the said councell, (according to the accustomed manner) the councell being set, and the said John sitting highest in a chaire prepared for him for that purpose: Behold an vgly and dreadfull Owle, or as the common prouerbe is, the euill signe of some mischance of death to follow, comming out of the backe house of him, flew to and fro, with her euill fauoured voice, and standing vpon the middle beame of the church, cast her staring eyes vpon the pope sitting. The whole companie began to maruell, to see the night Crow, which is wont to abide no light, how shee should in the mid day come in the face of such a multitude, and indged (not without cause) that it was an ill fauoured token. For behold, said they, (whispering one in an others eare) the spirit appeareth in the shape of an Owle. And as they stood beholding one an other, and admiring the pope, scarcely could keepe their countenance from laughter. John himselfe, vpon whom the Owle stedfastly looked, blushing at the matter, began to sweat and to fret and fume with himselfe, and not finding by what other meanes he might salue the matter, being so confused, dissoluing the councell, rose vp and departed. After that there followed another session: in the which the Owle againe, after the maner aforesaid, although, as I beleeue, not called, was present, looking stedfastly vpon the bishop; whom poe beholding to be come againe, was more ashamed then hee was before (and iustly) saying he could no longer abide the light of her, and commanded that shee should be driuen away with batts and thountings: but shee being afraid neither with their noise, neither of any thing else, would not away, vntill that with the strokes of the sticks, which were throwne at her, shee fell downe dead before them all. This I learned of a faithfull friend, who at the same time came to Rome: the which thing I fearcely crediting for the rarenesse of the matter, he affirmed by his oth, that it was most certaine and true: adding moreouer, that all there present were much offended, and did greatly deride that councell called for such a purpose, and by little and little the councell was dissolued, nothing done there, as he saith. Although it hath not been alwaies seene that such spirituall Owles haue been present with popes and their councels, and gouerned them: yet their euill doctrine declareth no lesse. Reade, gentle Reader, the booke of Clemangis, and thou shalt not thinke thy labour euill bestowed. For hee hath both learnedly, truely, freely, and godly bewailed the filthines of Antichrist, and his ministers, their wickednesse, impiety and cruelty, and the miserable state and face of the church, &c. And thus much for pope John.

The Councell of Constance.

The order of Constance.

HEre by the way is to be noted and vnderstood, that during all this time of pope John, there were 3. popes raigning together, neither was yet the schisme ceased, which long time had continued, the space (as I said) of 29. yeeres. By the reason whereof a generall councell was ordained and holden at Constance in the same yeere, Anno 1414. being called by Sigismund the emperour, and pope John the three and thirtith, for the pacifying of the foresaid schisme, which was then betweene three popes, striuing for the popedome: The first whereof was John, whom the Italians set vp: The second was Gregorie, whom the Frenchmen set vp: The third was Benedict, whom the Spaniards placed. In this schismaticall ambitious conflict, euery one defended his pope, to the great disturbance of christian nations. This councell endured foure yeres long, wherein all their matters were decided moll by foure nations, to say, the English, Germaine, French, and Italian nation. Out of which foure nations were appointed and chosen foure Presidents to iudge and determine the matters of the councell. The names of which Presidents were these: John the Patriarke of Antioch for France, Anthonie archbishop of Aquen for Italy, Nicolas archbishop of Genesuensis for Germanie, and Nicolas bishop of Bathe for England: by whom many great and profitable things to the glorie of God, and publike profit, might haue been concluded, if the rotten flesh of the churchmen could haue bidden the sait of the Gospell, and if they had loued the truth: But as Gregorius Nazianzenus writeth, there lightly come seld generall councels, but they end more with disturbance, then tranquillitie. So it happened in this councell: for whereas John the 23. in the first Session exhorteth them by these words taken out of the 8. of Zacharie: Veritatem diligite: that is to say: Loue the truth; further, monishing them, and specially the Diuines, euery man to do his endeauour for the bnitie of the church, and to speake their mind freely: but how soone this his exhortation was forgotten, it appeared thozily after by the despiting of the prophets, and persecuting of Christ in his members, as by the grace of Christ shall appeare hereafter in the processe of this storie. First this John did resigne his papacie, the emperor giuing him thankes kissed his feet.

Afterward the said John repenting him that he had so done, sought meanes to flee; wherevnto Fredericke Duke of Austrich did assist him; for he changing his garments, fled by night with a small companie. And when hee was not come vnto Schaffe house to goe into Italy, the emperor pursuing, tooke him, and proclaimed Fredericke traitour, and for that cause tooke away certaine cities from him. At the last the matter was appealed vnder this condition, that Fredericke should require grace of the emperor, and resigne all his possessions vnto him. Thereupon the emperour receiued him againe into fauor, and restored him to his dukedome. This pope being thus deposed, was committed vnto the county Palatine, and by him caried to the castle of Hanbetine, where he was kept prisoner by the space of three yeres. Afterward hee was againe by pope Martine admitted to the number of cardinals.

This pope John was deposed by the decree of the councell, more then 40 most grieuous and hainous crimes being obiected and proued against him: as that hee had hired Marcilus Perniensis a physition, to poyson Alexander his predecessour. Further, that he was an heretike, a simoniake, a liar, an hypocrite, a murtherer, an inchanter, a blasphemer, an aduterer, and a Sodomite; and finally what crime is it, that he was not inferred withall?

And now to returne vnto the councell, first we will declare the order of their Sessions, with things therein concluded, in general: then we will (Christ willing) adioyne the speciall tractation of such matters, as pertaine to the storie of the Bohemians, and Iohn Hus, and Hieronie of Prage, who in the same vngodly councell were condemned and burned.

This councel the time of Constance, which was summoned by the emperour Sigismund, and pope Iohn 23. about the nativitie of our Lord Iesus, An. 1414. began the same yere to be assembled about the latter end of the yere. Which first beginning as the manner is, with a masse of the holy Ghost, as they were singing according to their custome their Hymne, Veni sancte spiritus, there was at the same time a certaine bill set vp in the church by some well disposed man, as it seemed, wherein was contained these words following: Alijs rebus occupati nunc adesse vobis non possumus; That is to say: We are otherwise occupied at this time, we cannot intend to come to you. Here is also to bee remembred the worthie saying of the emperor Sigismund, when talke was mouthed as touching the reformation of the spiritualtie, and some said, quòd oportet incipere à Minoritis, that is, the reformation ought first to begin at the Minorites; the emperour answering againe: Non à Minoritis, sed à Maioritis, that is, not with ye Minorites, but with the Maiorites. Meaning, the reformation ought first to begin with the pope, cardinals and bishops, and other superior states of the church; and so to descend after to the inferiors. This much by the way, and now to the purpose and order of the Sessions as wee promised. The which councell continued, as is aforesaid, by the space of foure yeres, and had in it 45. Sessions, wherein many things were concluded, the which all together were too long to be recited in this place: as the deposition of three seuerall popes, which were before spoken of, the hearing of certain legats. Yet I mind to make some briefe recapitulation of the most principall matters there done in the Sessions orderly ensuing.

In the first Session chiefelie was concluded, first that this councell was lawfully congregate.

2 Item, that the going abroad of the pope should bee no let or stay, but the councell might proceed.

¶ Wherein note (gentle Reader) that the authority of the generall councell is aboue the pope, contrarie to their owne doctrine.

3 Item, this councell should not be dissolued before the church were reformed, as well in the superiors, as inferiors.

In the 4. Session amongst other things, this was first concluded: That a Synode congregate in the holy Ghost, making a generall councell, representing the whole catholike church here militant, hath power of Christ immediatly, to the which power euery person, of what state or dignitie soeuer he be, yea being the pope himselfe, ought to be obedient in all such things as concerne the generall reformation of the church, aswell in the heads, as in the subiects.

Item, the said pope should not translate the court of Rome and the officers of the same court, from the city of Constance. And that all his censures, doings and vndertakings after the time of his departure, what soeuer he should enterprise to doe to the preiudice of this councell, should be of no effect.

In the 5. Session the same articles were repeated and concluded againe.

In the 6. Session procuration and citation was sent out against the pope.

Item, commissioners were appointed out of the foure nations for the hearing of Iohn Hus, which shall be hereafter mentioned in his storie following.

Item, the memorie of Iohn Wicklike was condemned, and the sentence giuen in the councell holden at Rome vpon the condemnation and burning of Wicklifes bookes, was there confirmed.

Item, in the same Session, citation was sent out against Hieronie of Prage, the tenor whereof followeth after in the storie of the said Hieronie. Citation graunted against Hieronie of Prage.

Item, in this session was decreed against libels of infamy.

In the 7. session nothing was handled, but that the tenour of the citation against pope Iohn was recited. 7

In the 8. Session, the sentence and condemnation of Iohn Wicklike, and his 45. articles was recited, and sentence giuen against his memorie and bones to bee burned. The tenor whereof is rehearsed in the historie of Iohn Wicklike before passed, fol. 413. 8 Sentence giuen for the burning of Wicklifes bones.

In the 9. Session, the matter and cause of pope Iohn was againe intreated, and commissioners appointed to enquire vpon his cause, and iudges for the same. 9

In the 10. Session, suspension was giuen out and read against the said pope. 10

In the 11. and 12. Sessions, notaries were assigned and definitiue sentence giuen against the said pope: where also was decreed that none of them that contended before for the papacy, should be chosen pope. 11 12

In the 13. Session was decreed, Quod nullus presbyter sub pœna excommunications communicet populo sub vtraque specie panis & vini: That is, that no priest vnder paine of excommunication shal communicate vnto the people vnder both kinds of bread and wine. 13

In the 14. Session, came in the resignation of pope George the 12. which was one of the 3. before mentioned, desiring for the papacy, with certaine other articles concerning the election of the bishop of Rome, and the ratification of their resigning, which gaue ouer the papacy. 14

Then ensueth the 15. Session, in the which silence was commanded on all parts vnder paine of excommunication, and the great curse, that no person or persons high or low, of what estate or degree soeuer they be, emperour, king, cardinall, or other, should disturbe the said session with any maner of noise, either by hand, foote or voice. This being done, the sentence and condemnation against Iohn Hus, was read and published, which after in the storie of Iohn Hus, followeth to be set more at large. 15 The solemne publishing of the sentence of condemnation against Iohn Hus.

In the 16. Session, ambassadors were assigned by the councell to go into Arragon to Benedictus the 13. to intreate with him for the resignation of his papacie, as the other two had done before. 16

Item, power was giuen to iudges, to cite vnder paine of deprivation, all such as priuily departed away from the councell: in the which session also the sentence against Iohn Husse was confirmed and ratified. 17

In the 17. Session, the emperour tooke vpon him a iourney to the king of Arragon, to entreate with pope Benedictus. An excommunication denounced against all such as should go about to empeach the emperours iourney about that matter, &c. The emperors iourney into Arragon.

Item, prayers and processions were determined to be made by the councell, euery Sunday for the same cause, with an hundred daies of pardon giuen to them that would be present thereat; and that all prelats should be present at euery of these said masses and processions in their pontificalibus. Granting besides to euery priest that said one masse, for the same 100. daies of pardon. And to all other that once a day should say one Pater noster, and one Aue, for the safety of the emperour, fortie daies of pardon. Pardons wrot here vpon cheape.

In the 18. Session, certaine iudges were assigned for the hearing of matters, which the councel had no leisure to heare. 18

It was there also decreed, that such letters and bulles as were written in the name of that councell, should bee receiued with no lesse credit and authoritie, then the buls proceeding from the see apostolicall, and that the falsifiers of the same should incurre no lesse penalitie, then the falsifiers of the other. Legates also and ambassadors were sent into Italie.

In the 19. Session, which was the same yeer in the moneth of September, Hieronie of Prage, who was cited, as is before said, was accused of heresie, and cast into prison by the said councell, and constrained to abiure. The which his abiuration hereafter followeth to be seene in his historie. 19

Item, it was decreed: Quod non obstantibus saluis conductibus Imperatoris, Regum, &c. possit per iudicem competentem de heretica prauitate inquiri, &c. That is, notwithstanding the safe-conduct giuen by the emperor and kings, &c. inquirie may be made against a man for heresie by a sufficient iudge, and processe to be made according to the law. Concilium fe-difragum.

The causes of heresies were committed to certaine iudges and deputies.

Item, the Chart called Carolina, and diuers other Charts and constitutions concerning the liberties of the church of Rome, being brought forth were approued and confirmed. And how these Charts of Constantines donation, is not here mention-ed.

In the 20. Session, letters and instruments were made and set vpon church doores, to require and admonish Duke Fredericke to restore againe vnto George bishop of Auistrich, such lands, rents, and reuenewes as hee detained and withheld Diuers the church-lands withheld, vnder paine of interdittement, suspending and excommunication.

During the time of this session, the ambassadors returned out of Arragon fro pope Benedict, and were heard with great audience; where as certaine articles and conditions betweene the pope and the councell were brought forth and agreed vpon, to the number of twelue.

In the yere of our Lord 1416. was the 21 session, beginning after their manner with a masse of the holy Ghost, with processions, and such other rites; in the time of which masse, Iames bishop of Lomby made a sermon, taking for his theme these words, Exprobrauit Deus incredulitatem eorum & duritiam: That is, the Lord rebuked their misbeliefe and hardnesse, &c. This sermon being ended, Ierome of Prage which had abiured, as is said, the yere before, being present thereat, stood vp vpon a certaine beach or forme, replying against the foresaid Iames and his sermon, alleadging and preaching diuers and sundry things, whereupon the Patriarch of Constantinople, one of the commissioners, proceeded against him, pronouncing the sentence definitiue, which hee had in writing against the said Ierome; which sentence being read and approued by the councell (the tenth whereof insueth in his history) the said Ierome was deliuered vnto the secular power, and burned. 21 Anno 1416 Ierome of Prage replied against the sermon of the bishop of Lomby.

The 22. and 23. sessions containe no worthy matter, but only the placing of the ambassadors of Alphonsius king of Aragon: and granting them voices in the Councell. 22.23

In the 24. session, citation was giuen out against Benedict, keeping with Alphonsius king of Aragon. 24

The 25. session containeth nothing but a certaine Commendam giuen to the church of Olemucensis. 25

The 26. session there was nothing else handled, but the vniting and incorporating of the ambassadors of the king of Nauarre into the Councell, and also concerning the derogation of the priority of voices. 26

After this, followed the 27. and 28. sessions, which were in the yere 1417. Wherein was intreated the relation and declaration concerning the cause betwixt duke Fredericke and the bishop of Trident, and processe giuen out against the said duke, accusing him of sacrilege, and also excommunicating him for not obeying the admonition of the Councell, concerning the disturbation and detaining of the city of Trident, and other possessions from bishop George, as is afore specified. 27.28 Anno 1417 The solemne publishing of the sentence of condemnation against Iohn Hus.

In the 29. and 30. sessions, protestors and notaries were giuen out in the cause against pope Benedict, and order decreed vpon his obstinacy; wherein also the withdrawing of the king of Aragon from the same pope, was recited and approued by the Councell. 29.30

In the 31. session, certaine instruments and speciall letters monitory were directed from the Councell to a certaine earle of Italy named Comes virtutum, for laying violent hands vpon Albert bishop of Asse, and for bringing him to prison; requiring the said earle, vnder paine of interdiction & excommunication, to set the said bishop at liberty. Also, another decree was set forth for the releasing against the liberties of the church of Baron. 31

In the 32. and 33. sessions, the accusation of pope Benedict was renewed, and his obstinacie accused, and witnesse brought in; at which thing doing, the emperor Sigismund was present. 32.33 Pope Benedict accused.

In the 34. session, the cause of the foresaid pope was heard, and processe giuen out against him. 34

In the 35. Session, the ambassadors of the king of Castile were brought in, and vnited to the Councell, and instruments thereof made and read. Also, that notwithstanding the othes made to the foresaid pope, men might lawfully forsake his obedience. 35

In the 36. session, a certaine citation was made and read against the pope, containing his deprivation, and the sentence against him, and instruments made vpon the same. And where as this pope had thundred out his curses, deprivations and excommunications against them; the said synod did annihilate all his doings. 36 The pope excused by the councell.

In the 37. session did renew againe the accusation of the foresaid pope, and the sentence definitiue against him was published. 37

In the 38. session certaine decrees were made touching the annihilating of the penalties of the ambassadors of king Henrie, sonne of Alphonsius king of Arragon. Also, another decree was made touching the reuocation of the voices granted to the ambassadors of the king of Aragon. 38

Thus pope Benedict being deposed and excommunicated, as is aforesaid, in the next sessions following they addicted themselues to the election of a new pope, beginning first in the 39. session, to giue out decrees concerning generall Councels, and prouision for the auoiding of such like schismes hereafter. Decreeing euery tenth yere to haue a generall Councell, after the two Councels that should follow immediatly after this; of the which, the one should be kept within fiue yeres then next following; and the second within seuen yeres after that. 39 Decrees for generall councels.

Item, in the same session was drawne out a forme touching such things as the pope should professe and bind himselfe to obserue at the time of his election, of the which forme the order and tenor is this.

I. N. elected for pope, professe with heart and mouth vnto almighty God, whose church I take vpon me to gouerne by his helpe, and to blessed Saint Peter the prince of the Apostles, so long as I shall endure in this fraile and brittle life, firmely to beleeue and hold the holy catholike faith after the traditions of the Apostles, of generall Councels, and of other holy fathers, and namely of the eight generall Councels, Nicene the first, the second of Constantinople, Ephesine the third, Chalcedone the fourth, the fifth and sixth of them in Constantinople, the seuenth of Nice, the eighth of Constantinople. And also of the generall Councels of Lateran, Lions, and Vienne, willing to obserue the same faith inuiolate euen to the vttermost, and to preach and defend the same, euen to the spending of my life and bloud, and also by all meanes possible to prosecute and obserue the rite of the sacraments canonically deliuered to the catholike Church. And this my profession and confession, by my commandement being written out by the notary of the archees of the holy Church of Rome, I haue subscribed with mine owne hand, and sincerely with a pure mind and deuout conscience, I offer it vnto the Almighty God vpon such an altar, &c. In the presence of such witnesse, &c. Peuen, &c. The profession which the pope is bound to.

It was also decided in this session, that no prelats should be translated against their wils.

The third of the same month and the same yere, followed the 40. session, wherein certaine decrees were constitute and read, as touching reformations to be made through the whole church by the pope that next should be, with the Councell, before this synod should breake vp. 40

Item, that they should so proceed to the election of the bishop of Rome, notwithstanding the absence of the Cardinals which were with pope Benedict in Spaine. This done, the order and manner was decreed for the election of the pope.

After these things thus decreed, in the next session, which was 41. the constitution of Clement the firth was read, concerning the order and diet of the cardinals being then in the conclaue about the chusing of the pope; and vpon the same, othes were ministred vnto the cardinals and other electors, binding them to obserue and keepe all such things as they should be bound to, during the time of the election. 41

First, that they should enter into the conclaue within ten daies after the fortith session, which was this present day after sunne set. The order and manner of the conclaue in chusing the pope.

Secondly, that euery cardinall should haue but two scrutors attending vpon him at the most, either of the laity or clergie, as they would themselues.

Thirdly, that they should remaine together in the said conclaue, without any wall betwixt them, or any other couer, saue only bare curtaines, if any were disposed to sleepe.

Fourthly, that the conclaue should so be shut vp, and the entrie to the priuy chamber to be kept so straitly, that none of them should come in or out, nor any to haue recourse vnto them to talke with them priuily or apertly, nor they to admit any man to come to them, except by the consent of them all certain should be called about matters concerning the election.

Fifthly, that no man should send to them either messenger or writings.

Sixthly, that a competent window should be assigned vnto them to receiue in their victuals, but that no person might come in thereat.

Seuenthly, that no day after their first ingresse into the conclaue, beside bread, wine, and water, they should haue any more dishes but one of one onely kind, either of flesh or fish, egges, pottage, made of fish or flesh, not after the daintiest sort, beside salades, cheese, fruit, and confectues, where of there shall be no principall messe made but for sauce and taste.

Eightly, that not one should be compelled to goe into the conclaue: but if they did all refuse to goe in, then they should be compelled thereunto.

Ninthly, that such as would goe out, might; but if they would all goe out before the pope were elect, they should be compelled to goe in againe, except such whom infirmity did excuse; but without the excuse of infirmitie, if any went out, he should no more be admitted, except they went all out together.

Tenthly, that such as went out by reason of infirmity, for to bee absent, and returne before the election be determined, may be admitted againe into the conclaue in the same state wherein they shall finde the election to stand.

Further and besides, the keepers of the conclaue should also be sworne to see all these premisses obserued and kept without fraud or guile, and that they should not straiten the cardinals and other electors about the order here taken.

And if the king be there himselfe, sitting in his throne of estate, he should receiue the same oth of the cardinals.

Vpon this, such as should be elected to bee the cardinals, were chosen. These were wife cardinals, they would bitts such as could catch them: whereupon vnder the pretence of the same, many did invade the goods of the cardinals, and others which were in the conclaue, fally fauning them to be elected which were not to be elected. To stop the greedy rauening of such, a decree also was published in the same session.

These things thus prepared and set in order, the Patriarch of Constantinople, with the cardinals and other archbishoppes, bishoppes, abbats, priors, deanes, archdeacons, doctors, with other electors entring into the conclaue vpon munday, on thursday after they had hatched out a pope, being Saint Martins euen, whereupon they named him Martin. This Martin thus being elected, was straightway brought in by the Emperor and the Councell into the church of Constance, and there inthronized for pope, not without great solemnity and triumph. The twenty one day of the said moneth, this foresaid Martin, according to their accustomed pompe, was honorably brought in to bee crowned with sumptuous procession from the high church of Constance, vnto the monasterie of Saint Austin: the Emperor on foote, leading his horse by the bridle on the right hand, and the Marquesse of Badenburge prince elector, likewise leading his horse on the left hand, the pope himselfe riding in the middest vpon his palfrey.

Pope Martin hatcheth.

The emperor leadeth the popes horse by the bridle on the right hand. The prince electors leadeth the popes horse on the left hand.

And thus being brought into the monastery aforesaid, and so reduced round about against from thence to the high church of Constance, was there crowned with all magnificence.

Notwithstanding all this, yet all the trifling and lord vanity of this Councell maze great then wise, bid not end thus: for in the next session, which was the forty two, came out a decree in the name of the pope and the councell, discharging the bond of the emperor and the county Palatine, touching the safe custody of pope Iohn, who was by bond committed vnto them to be kept in safety.

In the 43. session, certaine other decrees and statutes were made by pope Martin in the said synod: annullating and repruning all the acts and proceedings of the other popes before, during the time of the schisme from the time of Gregory the eleuenth. As in matters concerning exemptions, vnions, fruits and profits of the church, benefices, simony, dispensations, tithes, and other burdens of the church. Also concerning the apparell of the clergy, and such other things.

Apparell of the clergy.

In the 44. session, the sage fathers of this councell were occupied about the determining in what place the next councell shou'd be kept in. The forty fiue session brake vp and dissolued this synod.

44

Now to finish our tedious rehearsall of this synod: The cardinall Ambald by the commandement of the pope and the councell, with a high and loud voice pronounced these words, Dominus in pace, which is, Lords depart in peace: whereunto the flanders by answered, Amen.

45

Thus the councell being dissolued, frier Iohn bishoppe of Catthan, by the consent and commandement of the pope and the councell, went vp into the pulpit to make a sermon, taking for his theame: Vos autem triſtitiam habetis: iterum autem videbo vos, & gaudebit cor vestrum: You are now in sadnesse, I will see you againe, and then your hearts shall reioyce. The which collation being ended, another cardinall named Anthony, was sent vp by the pope and the councell, with this proclamation. First, to definite the synod, and to giue euery man leaue to depart home. Also to declare the popes indulgence vnto them, vpo by the authority of God almighty, had granted to them all and euery one present at that councell, full absolution once in their life; so that euery one within two moneths after the hearing of this indulgence, should procure the same in forme of writing. Also, another indulgence was granted in like manner of plenary remission at the houre of death, and that was vnderstood as well of the houshold, as of the maisters themselues. But vnder this condition, that from the time of notification of the same, they should fast vp the space of one whole yere euery friday, for the absolution in their life time. And for the absolution at the houre of death, to fast the same Friday another yere, except they had some lawfull impediment to the contrary, so that after the second yere, they should fast vnto their liues end, or else to doe some other good worke. The which being in this maner proclaimed, the synod brake vp, and euery man departed home.

Smell here reader, this made well for the popes pulse.

So that the whole multitude which were viewed to be in the towne of Constance betweene Easter and Whitsontide, were numbred to be 60500. strangers and forreiners at that councell.

Here is to be noted that in this councell of Constance, nothing was decreed or enacted worthy of memory, but this only, that the popes authority is vnder the councell, and that the councell ought to iudge the pope.

The generall councell aboue the pope.

And as touching the communion in both kinds, although the councell did not denie, but that it was vsed by Christ and his Apostles: yet notwithstanding by the same councell it was decreed to the contrary.

Communion in both kinds denied by this councell.

Hitherto we haue comprehended the order and discourse of this councell, with the acts and sessions concerning the same: which councell, although it was principally thought to be assembled, for quieting of the schisme betweene the three popes; yet notwithstanding, a great part thereof was for the cause of the Bohemians, and especially for Iohn Hus, as appeared by their preparation before the councell. For before the councell began, the emperor Sigismund aforesaid, sent certaine gentlemen Bohemians, which were of his owne houshold, giuing them in charge to bring Iohn Hus, bachelar of Diuinitie, vnto the said councell, and that vnder his safe-conduct. The meaning and intent thereof was, that Iohn Hus should purge and cleare himselfe of the blame which they had laid against him: and for the more better assurance, the emperor did not onely promise him safe-conduct, that he might come freely vnto Constance, but also to returne againe into Boheme, without frand or interruption: he promised also to receiue him vnder his protection, and vnder safegard of the whole empire. For the same only cause the emperor sent him afterwards the said safe-conducts double written, both in Latin and Almaine, the forme whereof doth hereafter ensue.

The safe-conduct giuen to master Iohn Hus.

¶ Sigismund by the grace of God king of the Romans, of Hungary and Denmarke, Croatia, &c. To all princes as well ecclesiasticall as secular, dukes, marquesses, and earles, barons, captaines, borowmasters, iudges and gouernours, officers of townes, bourgages and villages, and vnto all rulers of the communalty, and generally to all the subiects of our empire, to whom these letters shall come, grace, and all goodnesse.

We charge and command you all, that you haue respect vnto Iohn Hus, the which is departed out of Boheme, to come vnto the generall councell, the which shall be celebrate and holden very shortly at the towne of Constance. The which Iohn Hus we haue received vnder our protection and safegard of the whole empire, desiring you that you will cheerfully receiue him when he shall come towards you, and that you intreat and handle him gently, shewing him fauor and good will, and shew him pleasure in all things, as touching the forwardnesse, ease, and assurance of his iourney, as well by land as by water.

Moreouer, we will that he and all his company, with his carriage and necessaries, shall passe throughout all places, passages, ports, bridges, lands, gouernances, lordships, liberties, cities, townes, bourgages, castels and villages, and all other your dominions, without paying of any manner of impostion or dane mony, peage, tribute, or any other manner of tolle what-soeuer it be. We will also that you suffer him to passe, rest, tary, and to sojourne at liberty, without doing vnto him any manner of impeachment, or vexation, or trouble; and that if need shall so require, you doe prouide a faithfull company to conduct him withall, for the honor and reuerence which you owe vnto our Imperiall Maiesty. Yeuen at Spire the 18. of October, in the yeere of our Lord God 1414.

Notwithstanding, briefly to touch and passe, let vs consider part of the reasons of the said Cope, how friuolous and false they be, and easie to be refelled. That (saith he) if he preached by the way comming vp: First, that it is false, vide infra page. That (saith he) if he stood obstinate in his heresie: What if hee sought to escape away after his comming vp? To this the lords of Boheme doe answere, that this safe-conduct was broken, and he imprisoned, not onely before he attempted to escape, or before he was condemned for an heretike, but also before hee was heard of the councell what he was. Vide infr. page. Answere to Alex. Copus.

Further, where Cope saith, that the generall councell was aboue the emperor, and hath power in case of heresie to breake publike leagues and grants: to that I say, that this safe-conduct stood not only vpon the emperor, but also vpon the consent of the pope himselfe. Vide infr. page.

And admit that to be true, that the councell had power to make this decree, to breake promise with heretikes: yet this cannot bee denied, but that Iohn Hus was condemned and iudged iudged before that decree in the nineteenth session was made. Finally, when Cope hath proued by what scripture the councels haue power to depose the authority of their emperors in such secular causes touching safe-conducts, and outward safety, then will I answere him more fully herein. But to the purpole againe of the story.

John Hus seeing so many faire promises, and the assurance which the emperor had giuen vnto him, sent answer vnto the emperor, that he would come vnto the councell. But before he departed out of the realme of Boheme, and specially out of the towne of Prage, hee did write certaine bils long enough afore, as well in Latine as in the Bohemian language, and Almaine, and caused them to be set and fastned vpon the gates of the cathedrall churches and parish churches, cloisters and abbies, signifying vnto them all, that he would goe to the generall councell at Constance; wherefore if any man haue any suspition of his doctrine, that he should declare it before the lord Conrade, or bishoppe of Prage, or if hee had rather, at the generall councell, for there hee would render and giue vp vnto euery one, and before them all, an account and reason of his faith. The example of his letters and intimations set vp were these, the copie whereof heere followeth. John Hus taketh the emperors safe conduct.

¶ The letters of Iohn Hus set vp in common places of the citie of Prage.

Letters of Iohn Hus to Prage.

MAster Iohn Hus, Bachelar of Diuinity, will appeare before the most reuerend father the lord Conrade, archbishop of Prage, and legat of the apostolike seat, in the next conuocation of all the prelats and clergy of the kingdome of Boheme, being ready alwaies to satisfie all men which shall require him to giue a reason of his faith and hope that he holdeth. And to heare and see all such as will lay vnto his charge either any stubbornnes of error or heresie, that they should write in their names there, as is required both by Gods law and mans. And if so be that they could not law fully proue any stubbornnes of error or heresie against him, that then they should suffer the like punishments that he should haue had, vnto whom all together he will answer at the next general councell at Constance, before the archbishop and the prelats, and according to the decrees and canons of the holy fathers, shew forth his innocency in the name of Christ. Dated the Sunday next after the feast of Saint Bartholomew.

The Intimations following, were drawne out of the Bohemian tongue.

Another intimation of Iohn Hus set vp for his going to Constance.

IMaster Iohn Husinetz, doe signifie vnto all men, that I am ready to come and stand before the face of my lord the archbishop, and to answere to all things whereof I am falsly accused, in the next conuocation of Bachelars; and chiefly to this point, that in many places they doe report me an heretike, not hauing respect vnto iustice or to laws, neither yet to my merits or deserts. Therefore, since that you which doe neuer cease to slander and backbite me with your words, doe vnderstand and know these things, come forth openly before the face and presence of the lord archbishop, and with an open mouth, declare and shew forth what false doctrine or other things ye haue heard me teach contrary to the catholike faith; and if that I shall be found faulty in neuer so small a matter, contrary or against the faith of Christ, or in any false doctrine, and that I doe these that or other things contrary to the faith of Christ, then I will hold my peace, and suffer punishment as an heretike. And if there be no man that will reuile against me, or accuse me in this point, come againe I say vnto you, that I am ready to appeare at Constance in the famous congregation, to the end that I may stand in the company of the Diuines, euen before the face of the pope. Therefore whosoeuer knoweth any false doctrine contrary to the faith of Christ in me, let him come thither and shew it forth boldly, if he haue any thing to say against me, and for my part I will not be slacke, if I may vnderstand or know it, to answere as well to small as great, as touching the truth which I haue receiued of God, and desire to be defended. All you good men therefore which loue the truth, say now whether by these my words I doe thinke or goe about any thing, either contrary to the law of God or man. If I be not admitted then to be heard, bee it knowne and manifest vnto all men, that it happeneth not through my fault the same day. The offer of Iohn Hus to his enemies.

❋ This Epistle which followeth, was set vpon the gates of the kings palace, translated into Latin, out of the Bohemian tongue.

Setting vp Iohn Hus at the kings gates.

VNto the Kings maiesty; the Queene, and to all such as are of his counsell, and to all other rulers and magistrates, which now are in the kings court, I Iohn Hus doe signifie and publish, that I haue vnderstood, not by any vaine rumor or tale, that there be letters brought from the pope to the kings maiesty, the contents whereof is this; That the kings maiesty should bring to passe, that the heretikes which were now lately sprung vp in his kingdome and dominions, should not take any firme or strong root. For so much as without any desert, as I trust by Gods grace, the same or more is sprung and blowne abroad: it shall be our part to foresee and take heed, that neither the kings maiesty, neither the noble kingdome of Boheme, should be driuen to beare or suffer any reproch or slander for me. Wherefore now of late I haue sent my letters to and fro, which I haue with great labour and diligence, caused to be openly set vp, to this intent, that I might thereby cause the archbisshoppe to be carefull and diligent about the matter, signifying openly, that if there were any man in all Boheme, which did know me to bee a follower of any false or corrupt doctrine, that he should professe his name in the archbishoppe his court, and there to shew forth and declare what he thought. And forasmuch as there would none bee found or come forth, which would accuse me, the archbisshop commanded me and my procurers to depart in peace. Wherefore I require and desire the kings maiesty, which is the defender of the truth, also the Queene, and their counsellers, and all other rulers and magistrates, that they would giue me a faithfull testimoniall of this matter. Forsomuch as I haue oftentimes willed and attempted this, and no man hath either accused me or troubled me. I doe it moreouer to be knowne vnto all Boheme, and to all nations, that I will bee present euen at the first time before the councell of Constance, in the most famous place, in the presence of the pope, the pope being president: and finally, in the presence of all others which will come to that most famous place; and that whosoeuer hath any suspition of me, that I haue either taught or defended any thing contrary vnto the faith of Christ, let him come thither also, let him declare there before or in the presence of the pope, and all the doctors of Diuinity, what erroneous or false doctrine I haue at any time followed or holden. More, if hee shall conuince me of any error, or proue that I haue taught any thing contrary vnto the christian faith, I will not refuse to suffer whatsoeuer punishment shall bee due for an heretike. But I hope and trust euen from the bottome of my heart, that God will not giue the victory to vnfaithfull and vnbeleeuing men, the which doe willingly kicke and spurne against the truth.

The same time Iohn Hus sent his procurers to the lord bishop of Nazareth, ordained by the Apostolike Sea Inquisitor of heresie of the citie and dioceese of Prage, requiring him, that if he had found any error in him, he would declare it openly. But the said bishoppe before the said procurers, and the publike Notary, with many other credible witnesses, answered, that he had often talked with Iohn Hus, and that he neuer knew any thing in him, but as becometh a godly and faithfull man; and this his testimony of Iohn Hus, hee approoued by his letters, the copie whereof is heere vnder written.

❋ The bishop of Nazareth his testimoniall.

The testimony of the good bishop of Nazareth.

WEe Nicolas by the grace of God Bishop of Nazareth, and Inquisitor, specially deputed by the Apostolike seat, for heresies both of the citie and dioceese of Prage, by these presents we doe it to be knowne vnto all men, that wee in times past haue often communed and talked with that honourable man, master Iohn Hus, Bachelar of Diuinity, of the famous Vniuersitie of Prage, and haue had diuers and sundry conferences with him, both of the Scriptures and diuers other matters, and in all his sayings, doings, and behauiour, we haue prooued and found him to bee a faithfull and a catholike man, finding no manner of euill, finister, or by any meanes erroneous doings in him vnto this present. We do witnesse and protest moreouer, how the said Iohn Hus, of late, in the cathedrall church of Prage, and in other both collegiate and parish churches, and in the Colledges of the Vniuersitie of Prage, and in the gates and porches of the most noble prince and lord, the Lord Wenceslaus king of Romans and of Boheme: also in the gates of the reuerend father the lord Conrade, archbisshoppe of Prage, legat of the Apostilike see, and chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Prage, and of other princes and barons, then being in the citie of Prage, hath set vppe his letters written both in Latine, and in the Bohemian tongue, containing sententially in effect, how the foresaid master Iohn Hus would appeare before the reuerend father the lord Conrade, the foresaid archbishoppe of Prage, and all the prelates and clergie of the kingdome of Boheme, that shall bee congregated and called together by the said archbisshoppe, at the day appointed in the said citie of Prage, ready alwaies to satisfie euery man that shall desire and require him to shew a reason of his faith and hope that hee holdeth, and to see and heare all and euery one which could prooue any obstinacie of error or heresie law fully against him, vnder the paine to receiue the like punishment: vnto whom all together hee would by Gods help, answere in the councell of Constance, which was now at hand, before the said lord archbishoppe and vs, with all other prelats, and there in Christs name, according to the decrees and canons of the holy The bishop of Nazareth witnesseth with Iohn Hus.

holy fathers, to declare and shew forth his innocency. After the which letters, as is aforesaid, by the said master Iohn Hus openly set vp, there did no man appeare before vs, the which would accuse the said master Iohn Hus of any error, either of any heresie. For the euident witnes of all which things, we haue commanded these present letters to be made, and confirmed the same with the setting to of our seale. Dated in Prage xxx. of August, an. M. iiij. C. xiiij.

Vpon which matter also, a publike instrument was drawn, testified with the hand and seale of the publike Notary, named Michael Pruthatitz. The copy of which instrument here vnder followeth.

¶ An Instrument of Recognition, or protestation of the Lord inquisitor of Heresies.

IN the name of God, Amen. In the yeere of his natiuity, 1414. the thirtith of August, in the fifth yeere of the bishopricke of the most holy Father in Christ, Iohn, by the grace of God Pope, the three and twentith of that name, in the vppermost parlor of the house of the famous man the Lord Peter of Zwogsta, called Zuirgliez, master of the mint, of the most famous prince and lord, the lord Wencesslaus, king of the Romans and of Boheme, in the greater citie of Prage, about the abby of Saint Iames the Apostle, in the presence of me the publike Notary here vnder written, and certaine witnesses here within written, specially called for that purpose. There was personally present master Iohn Iessenitz, master of Art, procurer in the name of the honourable man, master Iohn Hus, Bachelar, formed in Diuinity of the Vniuersitie of Prage. Hee most humbly and earnestly required the reuerend father in Christ and Lord, Nicolas Bishop of Nazareth, Inquisitor of Heresies for the citie and diocesse of Prage, specially appointed by the apostolike See, being there also present, saying: Reuerend father, doe you know any error or heresie in master Iohn Hussenetz, otherwise called Hus? The which said Lord Nicolas, not compelled or constrained, but of his owne will and accord, freely and openly did there recognise, saying these or the like words in the Bohemian tongue:

I haue often and many times been conuersant with master Iohn Hus, and haue eaten and drunke with him: also I haue been often present at his sermons, and diuers of his collations which he hath made vpon diuers places of the scripture, and I neuer found or perceiued in him any error or heresie, but in all his words and deeds I haue found him alwaies a true and a catholike man, neither haue I found any thing that doth sauor of any error or heresie.

Againe, the said master Iohn his procurer, in the behalfe as aboue, required and asked the said lord Nicolas, Bishop and Inquisitor, whether any man haue accused the said master Iohn Hus of any heresie before him, being inquisitor for heresie, and hath conuicted him of heresie. He answered, that since the time he knew Iohn Hus, and that he was made inquisitor for heresie in the citie and diocesse of Prage, as is afore said) neuer any man accused, either conuicted the said master Iohn Hus of any heresie before him vnto this present time. Adding moreouer, that he the said master Iohn Hus did openly set vp his letters patents this present yeare aforesaid, in the said moneth of Aug. vpon the porches of the cathedrall church of Prage, and other collegiate and parish churches of the citie of Prage, and vpon the gates of our said lord, our lord the king, and the archbishop of Prage, containing in them this effect, how that he would appeare before Conrade archbishop of Prage, and all the prelats and clergy of the kingdome of Boheme, which should be congregated and called together at a certaine day of the month aforesaid, ready alwaies to satisfie all men as touching the faith and hope which he held, and to see and heare all or singuler that would lay any obstinacy of error or heresie vnto him, that they should determine themselues there, to suffer the like punishment, according to the extremity both of Gods law and mans law, vnto whom altogether hee would answere in his owne right before the said archbishop of Prage, and the said lord Nicolas, bishop and inquisitor aforesaid, and the prelats, euen in the next generall councell of Constance, and there according vnto the canons and decrees of the holy Fathers, declare and shew foorth his vprightnesse and innocency, vpon all and singuler which proceedings, master Iohn de Iessenitz procurer, and in the procurers name or behalfe as afore, required and desired, that he might haue one or many publike instruments made vnto him by me the publike Notary here vnder written. These things were done the yeere, indiction, day, moneth, houre, place, and bishopricke, as is afore said, in the presence of these noble & famous men, the L. William de Zwirgelitz. Baron of the kingdome of Boheme, Peter his sonne, the lord Hlawaczion de Renow, likewise Baron, Wenceslaus de Lunarx, Vssone de Miekoniz, Burgraue of the castell of Liechtenburg, Cythorius de Bodanetz, Esquier, and William de Dupore, Knight of the said diocesse of Prage, with many other worthy and credible witnesses, which were specially desired and required vnto the premisses. And I Michael, sometimes the sonne of Nicolas de Prachatitz, of the diocesse of Prage, and by the imperiall authority, publike Notary, was present, with the witnesses aforenamed, at the affaires aforesaid, at the request, demand, answere, and petition, and all and singuler the doings within written, and did see and heare all these things to be done in the foresaid manner and forme. But being busied with other matters, I haue caused this to be faithfully drawne and written, and subscribing the same with mine owne hand, haue published and reduced it into this forme, and haue signed it with my seale and name, accustomed, being called and required to beare witnes of all and singuler the premisses.

After this, as all the barons of Boheme were assembled in the abby of Saint Iames, about the affaires of the realme, where as the archbishoppe of Prage was also present; there the said Iohn Hus presented Supplications: by the which hee most humbly desired the barons, that they would shew him this fauor towards the said archbishop, that if the said archbishoppe did suspect him of any error or heresie, that he would declare it openly, and that he was ready to endure and suffer correction for the same at his hands. And if that he had found or perceiued no such thing in him, that hee would then giue him a testimoniall thereof, through the which he being as it were armed, hee might the more freely goe vnto Constance. The said archbishop confessed openly before all the assembly of Barons, that he knew not that the said Iohn Hus was culpable or faulty in any crime or offence; and this was his onely counsell, that the said Iohn Hus should purge himselfe of the excommunication hee had incurred: This report, which the archbishoppe had giuen of Iohn Hus, both appeare by the letters which there were the barons of Boheme sent vnto the emperor Sigismund by the said Hus, in the towne of Constance. Conrade the archbishop cleareth Iohn Hus.

Finally, all the prelats and clergy assembled together in the towne of Prage, in the archbishoppe his court, where as appeared personally the worshipfull master Iohn Iessenitz, doctor of decretals and procurer, in the name and behalfe of the honourable man master Iohn Hus, requiring that either the said master Iohn Hus, or that he in the name and behalfe of him, might be suffered to come into the said archbishops court, to the presence of the archbishop, and the prelats which were there congregated together, for so much as master Iohn Hus is ready to satisfie all men which shall require him to shew any reason of his faith or hope which he holdeth, and to see and heare all and singuler which were there gathered together, that is to say, the lord archbishop and prelats, or any of them, which would lay any manner of obstinacy, or error, or heresie vnto him, that they should there write in their names, and according both vnto Gods law and mans, and the canon law, prepare themselues to suffer like punishment, if they could not lawfully proue any obstinacy of error or heresie against him: vnto whom altogether he would, by Gods helpe, answere before the said archbishop and the prelats in the next generall councell holden at Constance, and stand vnto the law, and according to the canons and decretals of the holy fathers, shew forth and declare his innocency in the name of Christ: Vnto the which master Iohn of Iessenitz doctor, one called Vlricus Siwabe of Suluenitz, Marshall of the said archbishoppe, comming forth of the said court, did vtterly deny vnto the said master doctor and his party, all manner of ingresse and entrance into the court, and to the presence of the archbishoppe aforesaid, and of the prelats there gathered together. Pretending that the archbishoppe, with the prelats aforesaid, were occupied about the kings affaires, requiring the said master doctor, that hee would tarie in some place without the said Court, that when the archbishoppe and the prelats had finished the kings affaires, hee might then returne, and haue liberty to come into the court there. The said master Iohn Hus, and the doctor of law tarried a while, intreating to be admitted into the archbishoppes court: but seeing hee could preuaile nothing, he made there a solene protestation of his request, that both he, and also master Iohn Hus and his part, could not be suffered to come into the archbishops court, to the presence of the archbishop and the prelats. Requiring of the sayd Notary, publike instruments to be made of the same, which also was done. John Hus testimony of his faith, and could not be admitted.

And these were the things which were done, before Iohn Hus tooke his iourney to the generall councell of Constance, the which I minded briefly to rehearse, whereunto I will also annex somewhat, as touching his iourney thitherwards.

About the 1 des of October, 1414. Iohn Hus being accompanied with two noble Gentlemen, that is to wit, Wenceslat of Duba, and Iohn of Clum, he parted from Prage, and take his iourny towards Constance. And in euery place as he passed, he notified his presence by his letters which he sent abroad, and especially in euery good towne or citie of name, the tenor whereof insueth. John Hus setteth his iourny to Constance.

The letters which Iohn Hus set vp in cities as he passed to Constance.

MAster Iohn Hus goeth now vnto Constance, there to declare his faith which he hath hitherto holden, and euen at this present doth hold, and by Gods help will defend and keepe euen vnto death. Therfore euen as he hath manifested throughout all the kingdome of Boheme by his letters and intimations, willing before his departure to haue satisfied and giuen an account of his faith vnto euery man, which should obiect or lay any thing against him in the generall conuocation holden in the archbishop of Prages court: So likewise he doth manifest and signifie, that if there be any man in this noble and imperiall citie, the which will impute or lay any error or heresie vnto him, that hee should prepare himselfe to come vnto the councell, for so much as the said master Iohn Hus is ready to satisfie euery man at the said councell, which shall lay any thing vnto his charge as touching his faith.

The enemies of Hus procure against him.

Iohn Hus was receiued by the way going vp to the councell.

In all cities as he passed by, and principally when he was parted out of Boheme, and entred into Almaine, a great number of people did come vnto him, and he, was very gently receiued and entertained of his hoste through all the townes of Germany, and specially of the citizens and burgesses, and ofttentimes of the curats. Insomuch as the said Hus did confesse in a certain epistle, that he found in no place so great enemies as in Boheme. And it it happened that there were any brute or noise before of his comming, the streets were alwaies full of people, which were desirous to see Iohn Hus and gratifie him: and amongst all other, specially at Nurrenberge, whereas certaine merchants which went before, certified the citizens of his comming. In the same citie there were many curats which came vnto him, desiring that they might talke with him in secret apart: vnto whom hee answered, that he loued much rather to pronounce and shew forth his mind and opinion openly before all men, then in hugger mugger, for he would keepe nothing close nor hidden. So after dinner, vntill it was night, he spake before the priests and senators, and diuers other citizens, insomuch that they all had him in great estimation and reuerence, one only doctor except, which was a Charterhouse monk, and the curat of saint Sebauld, who did improue all that he had said.

Charterhouse monke against Iohn Hus.

The twentith day after that he departed out of the town of Prage, which was the third day of November, he came vnto Constance, and lodged at an honest mattons house, being a widow named Faith, in Saint Galles streete.

John Guffes doth call himself named Faith.

The morrow after, the gentleman master Iohn de Clum, and master Henry Latzenboge, went to speake with the pope, and certified him that Iohn Hus was come, whom they had brought to Constance to the generall Councell, vnder the emperor his safe-conduct; desiring him also that hee on his part would grant the said Iohn Hus liberty to remaine in Constance, without any trouble, vexation, or interruption. Vnto whom the pope answered; that albeit that Iohn Hus had killed his brother, yet would he goe about as much as in him lay, that no outrage or hurt should be done vnto him during his abode in the towne of Constance.

The pope confirmeth to the safe-conduct of Iohn Hus.

In this meane time, the greatest aduersarie that Iohn Hus had, named master Steuen Paletz, the which was also a Bohemian borne, was come vnto Constance. But his companion master Stanislaus Znoma, was not yet passed the borders of Boheme, when he was stricken with an impostume, whereof he died. As soone as the said Paletz was come to Constance, hee did associate vnto him one Michael de Causis, the which had before falsely accused and blamed the said Iohn Hus. And this may not bee forgotten, that the said Paletz had been familiarly conuersant and acquainted with the said Iohn Hus from his youth vpward: but after that, there was a bull brought vnto Prage from pope Iohn the 23. against the king of Apulia, named Ladislaus, the said Iohn Hus withstood it openly, for so much as he saw that it was wicked and naught.

Stanislaus Znoma, Hussites monus, going to Constance, died by the way.

Steuen Palets, and Michael de Causis, obiect errors to Hus. Hus bull against Ladislaus king of Apulia.

And as touching the said Paletz, albeit that he had confessed at a certaine banquet in the presence of the said Iohn Hus, that the said bull was contrary to all equity and right: yet notwithstanding for so much as he was obliged and bound vnto the pope, by meanes of certaine benefices receiued at his hand, he maintained and defended the said bull against Iohn Hus. And this was the cause of the discord and falling out betweene them. As for Michael de Causis, the companion of master Paletz, he was sometime the curat of new Prage: but he not being content therewith, but seeking after a further prey, dreamed and imagined out a new deuice how to attaine vnto it, for he made a semblance that he had found out a new inuention or meane, whereby the mines of gold in Siloy, which were perished and lost, might be renewed & set on worke againe. By this meanes he did so much with the king Wencesslaus, that he did put a great sum of money into his hands, to doe that withall which he had promised.

This honest man, after he had laboured and trauelled certaine daies about it, and perceiuing that he brought nothing to passe, and that by that meanes he was vtterly in despaire of his purpose, he conueied himselfe priuily out of the realme of Boheme with the rest of the money, and withdrew himselfe as a worthy bird for such a nest into the court of Rome. Such a man of such conditions was easily corrupt with money, and that by the aduersaries of the said Hus, and promised them to doe what he could for them, the which he did shortly after. The two lolly roisters, Steuen Paletz and Michael de Causis, drew out certaine articles against the said Hus, saying, that they had gathered them out of his owne writings, and specially out of his treatise which he had written of the Church. They trotted vp and downe, hither and thither, taking great paines to shew the said articles vnto the cardinals, bishops, monks, and lusty others of that sort, doing them also to vnderstand, that there were other matters of greater importance, which the said Iohn Hus had committed and done against the holy constitutions and other ordinances of the pope and the church: which it needs were, they said they would propound before the Councell. Through the kindling of this their fire, they did so incense the cardinals, and all the priests, that all they with one mind and consent, thought to cause the good man to be taken and laid hands on.

The 26. day after the said Hus was come to Constance, during all which time he was occupied in reading, writting, and familiar talke with his friends, the cardinals throughout the instigation and motion of Paletz and Michael de Causis, sent two bishops, to wit, the bishop of Augusta, and of Trident, and with them the Burrowmaster of the town of Constance, and a certaine knight, to the place where Iohn Hus lodged about dinner time, which should make report vnto him, that they were sent by the pope and his cardinals, to admertise him that hee should come to render some knowledge or witnesse of his doctrine before them, as he had oftentimes desired, and that they were ready for to heare him.

Michael de Causis.

Vnto whom Iohn Hus answered: I am not come for no such intent, as to defend my cause particularly before the pope and his cardinals, protesting that I neuer desired no such thing, but that I would willingly appeare before the whole assembly of the Councell, and there answer for my defence openly, without any feare or doubt, vnto all such things as shall be demanded or required of me. Notwithstanding, said he, for all much as you require me so to doe, I will not refuse to go with you before the cardinals. And if it happen that they cuill intreat or handle me, yet neuertheless I trust in my Lord Iesus, that he will be comfort and strengthen me, that I shall deffie much rather to die for his glorys sake, then to denie the veritie and truth which I haue learned by his holy scriptures. Wherefore it came to passe, that the bishops being instant vpon him, and not shewing any outward semblance, that they bare any malice or hatred against him in their hearts, albeit they had priuily laid garrisons both in the house where they were assembled, and also in other houses: Iohn Hus tooke his horse which he had at his lodging, and went vnto the court of the pope and the cardinals. Iohn Hus desired to plead his cause before the whole councell.

When he was come thither, and had saluted the cardinals, they began to speake to him in this sort: We haue heard many reports of you, the which if they be true, are in no case to be suffered. For men say that you haue taught great and manifest errors, all contrary and against the doctrine of the true church; and that you haue solued your errors abroad through all the realme of Boheme, by a long space of time: wherefore wee haue ceused you to be called hither before vs, that we might vnderstand and know how the matter standeth. Iohn Hus is come before the pope and the cardinals. The words of the pope and the cardinals to Iohn Hus.

Vnto whom Iohn Hus answered in few words: Reuerend fathers, you shall vnderstand that I am thus minded and affectioned, that I would rather chuse to die, then I should be found culpable of one only error, much lesse of many and great errors. For this cause I am the more willingly come vnto the generall Councell, which is here appointed, to shew my self ready euen with all my heart to receiue correction, if any man can proue any errors in me. The cardinals answered him again, that his sayings pleased them very well, and vpon that they went their way, leauing the said Iohn Hus, with master Iohn de Clum, vnder the gard and keeping of the armed men. The answer of Iohn Hus to the pope and the cardinals.

In the meane season, they did subborne and furnish out a certaine Diuine, a Frier Franciscane, a subtill and crafty man, and a malicious hypocrite, for to question with the said Iohn Hus, which was compassed round about with armed men. This man drawing nere, in his monkish gesture, said: Reuerend master, I a simple and rude idiot am come vnto you for to learne, for I haue heard many strange and contrary things against the catholike faith, to be ascribed vnto you, the which doe diuersly moue my mind, being vtterly inclined to the truth. Wherefore I doe desire you, euen for the loue which you beare vnto the truth, and to all good and godly men, that you would teach mee most simple and miserable man, some certaintie and truth. And first, men say that you hold opinion after the consecration and pronuntiation of the words in the sacrament of the altar, there remaineth onely materiall bread. Iohn Hus answered: that it was falsly attributed and imputed vnto him. Then said he: I pray you, is not this A Frier Minor pitteth two questions to Iohn Hus. Dolus malus Cardinalium. Et saterly Iudas.

yeut opinion: No verily, said John Hus, I doe not so thinke of it. When the monke asked this question the third time, master John de Clum being somewhat moued with him, said: Why art thou so importunate vpon him? Verily, if any man had affirmed or denied any thing vnto me but once, I would haue beleued him. And thou, albeit he hath affirmed this his minde so often, yet ceasest not to trouble him. Then said the monke: Gentle master, I pray you pardon me a poore idiot and simple frier; surely I did it of a good mind and intent, being willing and desirous to learne. This frier put forth another question vnto him, protesting his simplicitie and ignorance, what manner of brittle of the Sobbead and manhood was in the person of Christ? When John Hus had heard this question, he turning himselfe vnto master John de Clum, in the Bohemian language said: Truly this frier is not simple as he doth pretend, for hee hath propounded vnto me a very hard question. And afterward turning himselfe to the frier, hee said vnto him: Brother, you say that you are simple, but as I haue heard of you, I perceiue very well, that you are double and craftie, and not simple. It is not so verily, said the frier. Well, said John Hus, I will cause you well to vnderstand that it is so. For as touching the simplicitie of a man, it is required in things that concerne ciuilitie and manners, that the spirit, the vnderstanding, the heart, the words, and the mouth, should agree together; and I doe not perceiue that this is in you. There is in your mouth a certaine semblance of simplicitie, the which would very well declare you to be an idiot and simple, but your deeds shew plainly and euidently a great subtilitie and craft in you, with a great quicknesse and liuelinesse of wit, in that you haue propounded vnto me so hard and difficult a question.

Notwithstanding I will not feare to shew you my mind in this question. And when he had made an end, the monke gaue him great thanks for his gentlenesse, and so departed. After that, the popes garrison which were about the said John Hus, told him, that this frier was called in maner Diuace, who was esteemed and counted the greatest and most subtill diuine in all Lumbardy. Oh, said Hus, that I had knowne that afore, I would haue handled him after another sort and fashion; but I would to God they were all such, then through the helpe and aid of the holy Scriptures, I would feare none of them. In this maner the said Hus, and master John de Clum, were left vnder the keeping of these men of armes, vntill foure of the clocke at after noone. After which time, the cardinals assembled againe in the popes court, to deuise and take counsell what they should doe with John Hus. Then Stephan Paletz, and Sichel de Caulis, with diuers other of their adherents, made earnest sute that he should not be let goe at libertie againe, and hauing the fauor of the Iudges on their part, they bragged vp and downe in a manner, as they had bin mad men, and mocked the said John Hus, saying: Now we will hold thee well enough, thou art vnder our power and iurisdiction, and shalt not depart vntill such time as thou hast paid the vttermost farthing.

A little afore night, they sent the Prouost of the Romane court vnto master John de Clum, to shew him that he might returne to his lodging: but as for John Hus, they had otherwise promised for him. When master John de Clum heard these newes, he was wonderfully displeased, for inough as through their crafts, subtilties, and glosing words, they had so trained this good man into their snares, whereupon he went vnto the pope, declaring vnto him all that was done; most humbly beseeching him, that he would call to remembrance the promise which he had made vnto him and master Henry Latzembog, and that he would not so lightly falsifie and breake his faith and promise. The pope answered, that all these things were done without his consent or commandement, and said further to master Clum apart: That reason is it that you should impute this deed vnto mee, seeing that you know well enough that I my selfe am in the hands of these cardinals and bishops.

In mine opinion, for so much as pope Iohn feared that, which indeed did after follow, that he should be deprived of his dignitie, he thought to win the fauor of these Herodian cardinals and bishops, by betraying this good man vnto them. So the said master Clum returned very pensiuelly and sore: he complained very sore both priuily and openly, of the iniury and outrage that the pope had done, but all preuailed nothing. After this, the said John Hus was led by the officers to the chapter house of the great church of Constance, where hee was kept prisoner by the space of eight daies: from thence he was carried vnto the Iacobines, hard by the riuer of Rhine, and was shut vp in the prison of the abby, the which was hard by the Sogards.

After he had bin enclosed there a certaine time, he fell sore sicke of an ague, by meanes of the ayrish of the place, and became so weake, that they despaired of his life. And for feare lest this good man should die in prison, as others are wont to doe, the pope sent vnto him certaine of his Physitions for to cure and helpe him. In the midst of his sicknesse, his accusers made importunate sute to the principals of the councell, that the said John Hus might be condemned, and presented vnto the pope these articles hereunder written.

¶ Articles presented against John Hus.

FIrst, hee doth erre about the sacraments of the church, and specially about the sacrament of the body of Christ, for so much as he hath openly preached, that it ought to be ministred openly vnto the people vnder both kindes, that is to say, the body and bloud. This article is cuident, for so much as his disciples at this instant in Prage, doe minister the same in both kinds. Moreouer, it is affirmed by diuers, that he hath taught both in the schooles and in the church, or at the least that he doth hold this opinion, that after the words of consecration pronounced vpon the altar, there remaineth still materiall bread in the sacrament. This article shall be knowne by his examination.

Articles against John Hus.

The suppers of the Lord.

Secondly, hee doth erre as touching the ministers of the Church, for so much as hee saith, that they cannot consecrate or minister the sacraments when they are in mortall sinne. This article shall likewise bee knowne by his examination. Notwithstanding all that which is here contained, may bee gathered by his writings De ecclesia; the which if hee denie, let there then bee some Diuines and doctors appointed, to peruse and take ouer his said writings of the church. Moreouer, he saith, that other men beside priests may minister the sacraments. This article is cuident, for so much as his disciples doe the same at Prage, the which of themselues doe violently take the sacrament out of the treasury, and communicate among themselues, when the holy communion is denied vnto them. By this and other things also, it is sufficiently euident, that hee hath taught that euery man being without mortall sinne, hath the power of orders or priesthood, for so much as such one is as hane taken orders, ought to minister the sacraments vnto themselues. And because hee proceedeth from small matters vnto great and weighter, it doth consequently appeare and follow, that those ought be in state of grace, can bind and loose.

Of the sacraments ministred vnder both kindes.

Of the administration of the sacraments.

Thirdly, he doth erre as touching the church, and specially for that he doth not allow and admit that the church signified by the pope, cardinals, archbishops, and the clergy vnderneath them; but faith, that this signification was deuised out from the scholemen, and in no case to be holden or allowed. This article is manifest by his said treatise vpon the Church.

Of the church.

Moreouer, he doth erre concerning the church, in that he saith, that the church ought not to haue any temporall possessions. And that the temporall Lord may take them away from the church and the clergy without any offence. This error is cuident, for so much as through his doctrine and inticements, many churches in the kingdome of Bohemie, and in the citie of Prage, are already spoiled and robbed of a great part of their temporalties and goods. He saith also, that Constantinus and other secular princes erred by inriching and indowing churches and monasteries. This article is manifest by that which goeth next before.

Ecclesiasticall reuenewes.

Fourthly, he erreth as touching the church, in that he saith, that all priests are of like power, and therefore affirmeth, that the reseruations of the popes casualities, the ordering of bishops, and the consecration of the priests, were inuented onelie for couetousnesse. This article doth somewhat appeare by those afore going, but by his examination shall be more euident.

The bishops power.

Fifthly, he erreth concerning the church, in that he saith, that the church being in sinne, hath no power of the keies, when as the pope, cardinals, and all other of the priests and clergy are in deadly sinne; the which he saith is possible enough. This also doth appeare in his treatise vpon the Church, in his first error as touching the ministers of the church.

The power of the keies of the church.

Sixthly, hee erreth touching the church, for as much as through contempt he doth not feare excommunication. This doth notoriously appeare by his owne doings, that he did contemne and despise the Apostolike and ordinary censure, and in all the Apostolike excommunications and iniunctions, he hath borne himselfe vpon the diuine commandements, and in contempt of the keies, to the setting out of his hypocrisie, he hath said masse all the waies betweene this and the citie of Prage, and thereby hath prophanat the processe and authority of the church.

Excommunication.

Seuenthly, hee erreth againe as touching the church, because he kéepeth not the institutions and innouations thereof, but holdeth opinion that euery man hath authority to inuell and appoint any man to the cure of soules. This is cuident by his owne doings, for so much as many in the kingdome of Bohemie, by their defenders and fauorers, or rather by himselfe, were appointed and put into parish churches, the which they haue long ruled and kept, not being appointed by the Apostolike sea, neither yet by the ordinarie of the citie of Prage.

Innouations.

Eighthly, hee erreth as touching the church, in that hee holdeth opinion, that a man being once ordained a priest or a deacon, cannot bee forbidden or kept backe from the office of preaching. This is likewise manifest by his owne doings, for so much as hee himselfe could neuer be letted from preaching, neither by the apostolike sée, neither yet by the archbishop of Prage.

Office of preaching.

Lupus agnum accusat quod carnibus non pascatur.

And to the intent that the said John Husse, who is clothed in sheepes clothing, and inwardly a rauening Wolfe, may be the better knowne by his fruits, for the better information of you most reuerend fathers; I say, that from the first time that he tooke in hand, or went about to sow such errors and heresies, the which afterward he did indeed, hee vnderstanding and perceiuing himselfe to bee withstanded and gainesaid, by the Germaines, which were in the Vniuersitie of Prage, forsomuch as he could conclude nothing, because they had three voices, and he on his part had but one only voice: hee went about and brought to passe, and that by the secular power, that the Germaines should haue but one voice, and hee and his parte three voices: the which thing when the Germaines once perceiued, rather then they would lose or forsake any part of their right, which they had in voices, or bee in danger in their persons, the which would then haue ensued vpon it, to saue themselues, they vnanimely with one consent agreed together to depart out of Prage, and by this meanes this solemne and famous Vniuersitie of Prage was made desolate, that had brought forth so many notable men in diuers sciences. Behold this his first fruits which diuided that so famous Vniuersitie, forsomuch as grapes are not gathered of thornes, neither figges of brambles.

A heaping together of many grieuous crimes.

The departure of the Germaines from the Vniuersitie of Prage.

Moreouer, when there were questions moued amongst the diuines of the Vniuersitie of Prage vpon the 45. articles of John Wickliffe, and that they had called a conuocation, and all the diuines of Bohemie (for the Germaines were alreadie departed) they concluded that euery one of those articles were either heretical, seditious, or else erroneous. Hee alone held the contrarie opinion, that none of those articles were either heretical, seditious, or erroneous, as afterward he did dispute, hold, and teach in the common schooles of Prage, whereof enough followeth, that he doth affirme those articles of Wickliffe, the which are not only condemned in England, but also by the whole church, because they were first inuented and set forth by the members of Antichrist.

The 45. articles of Catticlue.

Moreouer, hee being complained of to the archbishop of Prage, that hee preached and set forth certaine articles which were heretical, false and seditious, hee was forbidden by the said archbishop to preach any more, and proceeded against him, according to the canonicall sanctions, the which processe is confirmed by the apostolike sée, and published as well in the court of Rome, as without: the which John Hus and his adherents haue diuers & manifold waies violated and prophaned. And wholeouer did speake against him, they were enjoined of their benefices, and others placed in, which haue ruled, and yet doe rule the said churches, and the flockes pertaining to the same, not hauing any cure or charge of the soules committed vnto them, neither by the apostolike sée, neither yet by the ordinarie of the place.

The office of preaching forbidden by the archbishop.

Also as many, as well priests as lay men in the citie of Prage and kingdome of Bohemie, which haue spoken against the doctrine of Hus, and the prophanation of the processe aforesaid, or at the least not alloweing the same, haue suffred manifold hatred and persecutions, and yet to this day doe suffer. But yet at this present it is dilluminded vntill the end of the processe against John Hus. Wherfore if he be now let goe againe, without doubt they shall suffer great persecution both in body and goods, and throughout all the realme of Bohemie, houle shall be against houle, and this mischiefe will creepe, yea suddainely spring vp throughout all Germany, and innumerable soules shall be infected, so that there shall bee such perdition of the clergie and faithfull, as hath not beene since the time of the emperour Constantine to this present day: for hee easelie not to mone and stir vp the laity, against the clergie and faithfull christians. And when any of the clergie would go to him away, to call him from his herésie, and for that cause doth forbid him to preach, that he doe not teach no heresies: then saith he, and teacheth that the clergie doth that of enuie and malice, because he rebuketh their vices and faults: that is to say, their simony and pride, and couetousnesse.

Insurrections feared in Bohem against the clergie.

Moreouer, hee stirreth vp the secular princes against the prelates of churches, monasteries, and Vniuersities, and generally against the whole clergie. Going about by this meanes, he preacheth and teacheth that prelats and other men of the church ought not to haue any temporall goods or possessions, but onely to liue vpon almes. And by this meanes hee hath done incéadie bery much hurt, and annoyed diuers and many prelates, clerkes and churches in the kingdome of Bohemie, and citie of Prage, forsomuch as thereby they are already spoiled and robbed of their possessions. Yea, hee teacheth also that it is lawfull for the lay people without sin to withhold and kéepe backe the tithes and oblations, or to giue the church goods to any other minister: all the secular princes are greatly inclined hereunto, but specially the laity, who followeth euery man his owne will.

The power of the keies of the church.

He hath generally tolde for himselfe all those heretickes which doe but verie finally regard the ecclesiasticall censures, and hath the authority of the Romane church, yea doe bitterly detest and abhorre the same: the which thing will more and more were made as mocking flockes, and derided of all men, yea euen of the dames and base people. Wherefore they tooke counsell and concluded together to present their request in writing vnto the whole councell, or at the least vnto the foure nations of Almaine, Italy, France, and England: this request was presented the 14. day of May, An. 1415. the tenor here consueth.

¶ The first Schedule or Bill, which the Nobles of Boheme delivered vp to the councell for the deliverance of Iohn Hus, the 14. day of May. Anno 1415.

MOst reuerend fathers and lords: The nobles and lords of Boheme and Pole here present, by this their present writings doe shew and declare vnto your fatherly reuerences, how that the most noble king and lord, the lord Sigismund, king of Romains, alwaies Augustus, king of Hungarie, Croatia, Dalmatia, &c. hearing of the great dissention that was in the kingdome of Boheme, as here, king and lord succesor, willing and intending to foresee and prouide for his diuine honour, he sent these noble men, master Wenceslate de Dubs, and Iohn de Clum here present, that they would bring and assure master Iohn Hus vnder the king his name and safe-conduct. So that he would come to the sacred generall councell of Constance, vnder the safe-conduct of the said king, and the protection of the sacred Empire, openly giuen and granted vnto the said master Iohn Hus, that he might purge himselfe and the kingdome of Boheme from the slander that was raised vpon them, and there to make an open declaration of his faith to euery man that would lay any thing to his charge. The which the said nobles with the forenamed master Iohn Hus haue performed and done, according to the kings commandement.

The safe-conduct of the emperor shall be shewed.

When as the said master Iohn Hus, was freely of his owne accord come vnto Constance vnder the said safe-conduct, and grieuously imprisoned before hee was heard, and at this present is tormented both with fetters and also with hunger and thirst. Albeit that in times past at the councell holden at Pavian 1410. peare of our Lord, the heresiches which were condemned, were suffered to remaine there at liberty, and to depart home freely: notwithstanding this master Iohn Hussie, neither being conuicted nor condemned, no not so much as once heard, is taken and imprisoned, when as neither king or any prince elector, either any embassadour of any Vniuersitie was yet come or present. And albeit the lord the king, together with the nobles and lords here present most instantly required and desired, that as touching his safe-conduct they would foresee and haue respect vnto his honour: And that the said master Iohn Hus might bee openly heard, forsomuch as he would render and shew a reason of his faith: and if hee were found or conuicted obstinately to affirme or maintaine any thing against the truth of holy Scripture, that then he ought to correct and amend the same according to the sentence and determination of the councell: yet could he neuer obtaine this. But the said master Iohn Hussie, notwithstanding all this, is most grieuously oppressed with fetters and irons, and so weakened with thirst and slender diet, that it is to bee feared lest that his power and strength being hereby consumed and wasted, he should be put in danger of his wit or reason.

The extremity Iohn Hus suffered in prison.

And although the lords of Boheme here present are greatly slandered, because they seeing the said master Iohn Hus so to be tormented and troubled, contrary to the kings safe-conduct, have not by their letters put the king in mind of his said safe-conduct, that the said lord and king should not any more suffer any such matters, forsomuch as they tend to the contempt and disregard of the kingdome of Boheme, which from the first originall and beginning, since it receiued the catholike faith, it neuer departed or went away from the obedience of the holy church of Rome: yet notwithstanding they haue suffered and borne all these things patiently hitherto, lest by any meanes occasion of trouble or vexation of this sacred councell might arise or spring thereof.

Thy refore most reuerend fathers and lords: The nobles and lords before named, doe lowly and most earnestly desire and require your reuerences here present, that hauing for the honour of the safe-conduct of our said lord the king, and also for the preseruation and increase of the worthie fame and renowne both of the foresaid kingdome of Boheme, and your owne also, that you will make a short end about the affaires of master Iohn Hus: forsomuch as by the meanes of his straite handling he is in great danger by any longer delay, euen as they do in it specially trust vpon the most vpright conscience and diligences of you fatherly reuerences. But forasmuch as most reuerend fathers and lords, it is now come to the knowledge and vnderstanding of the nobles and lords of Boheme here present, how that certaine backbiters and slanderers of the most famous kingdome of Boheme aforesaid, haue declared and told vnto your reuerences, how that the Sacrament of the most precious blood of our Lord is caried vp and downe through Boheme in vessels not consecrate or hallowed, and that cobblers do now heare confessions, and minister the most blessed body of our Lord vnto others: The nobles therfore of Boheme here present require and desire you, that you will giue no credit vnto false promoters and tale tellers, for that as most wicked and naughtie slanderers and backbiters of that kingdome aforesaid, they do report and tell vntruthes: requiring also your reuerences, that such slanderous persons of the kingdome aforesaid, may be named and knowne. And the lord the king together with your reuerences, shal well perceiue and see that the lordes of Boheme will goe about in such maner to resell and put away the false and friuolous slanders of those naughtie persons, that they shall be ashamed to appeare hereafter before the lord the king and your reuerences.

The confutation of certaine slanders.

As soone as this their supplication was read, the bishop of Luthonis rising vp, said: Most reuerend fathers, I well perceiue and vnderstand that the last part of this writing both touch me, my familiars and friends, as though the kingdome of Boheme were slandered by vs. Wherefore I desire to haue time and space of deliberation, that I may purge my selfe from this crime that is laid against me. The principall of the councell appointed him the 17. day of May, at the which day the lords of Boheme should be present againe, to heare both the answere of the councell, and also the excuse of the bishop of Luthonis: the which thing indeed was afterward performed: for the 17. day of May, which was the fourth day before Whitsontide, they met there againe: where first of all a certaine bishop in the name of the whole councell answered by word to the nobles of Boheme the contents of whose answere may easily be known by the second supplication, which the Bohemians put vp to the councell. What first I haue here in these few words following shewed how the bishop of Luthonis defended himselfe against that which is before written.

The bishop of Luthonis.

✻ The answere of the Bishop of Luthonis, to the last part of the supplication, which the nobles of Boheme presented vnto the councell.

MOst reuerend fathers and noble lords, as Peter de Pladoneywitz bachelor of art, in the name of certaine of the nobles of the kingdome of Boheme in his writings, amongst other things did propound how that certaine slanderers and backbiters of the said kingdome haue brought to the eares of your reuerences, that the most precious blood of Christ is caried vp and downe in Boheme in bottels, and that Coblers doe heare confessions, and minister the body of Christ vnto others; whereupon most reuerend fathers and lords, albeit that I together with the other prelats, doctors, masters, and other vnnumerable catholikes of the said kingdome, the which doe desire as much as in them lieth to defend the faith of Christ, haue laboured for the extirpation and rooting out of that most wicked and detestable sect of Wickliffites, which now (alas for sorow) beginneth to spring and rise in the said kingdome, as it is well knowne: Notwithstanding, here in this time of conuention, not for any shame or reproofe, but for the honour of the kingdome aforesaid, I haue prepounded, and declared a certaine new sect, which is now lately sprung vp in the said kingdome, the followers whereof doe minister and communicate the sacraments in many cities, townes and places of the said kingdome, vnder both kinds both of bread and wine, and doe constantly teach the common people both men and women that it is so to be communicated, obstinately affirming the same, and that the clergie which doe repugne or say nay vnto it, are to bee counted church robbers, as for the writings of their allertions being directed and presented hither shall openly appeare.

The answere and accusation of the bishop of Luthonis against Iohn Hus.

Moreouer, by the report and fame which goeth here abrode, and by the writings which were sent ouer vnto me, I haue prepounded that it came to my knowledge, that the blood of Christ is caried about in vessels not consecrated, approuing the foresaid erroneous assertion of the Wickliffists, that affirme it necessarie for saluation, that the people should communicate vnder both kinds of bread and wine; and that it is necessarie, as the body of Christ is caried in the pire or bore, so the blood of Christ should be caried in bottles, or other necessarie vessels from place to place, and specially about the ministration of the sicke. Also I declared not of my selfe, but I heard it to be declared by others, both great and credible persons, that there was a certaine woman a follower of that sect, the which taking by violence the body of Christ out of a priests hands, did communicate vnto her selfe, and affirmed that all men ought to doe so, if the priests should denie them the communion. And the same woman amongst many other errours, of the which she was conuicted, did affirme that a good lay woman might better consecrate and giue absolution, then an euill priest: affirming that an euill priest can neither consecrate nor absolue. But I know that neither I, neither any of my assistance in this matter, haue brought this at any time into your eares, that Coblers in the said kingdome doe heare confession, or minister the Sacrament of the body of Christ, as is alledged by the said Peter, in the behalfe of the said supplicants. Notwithstanding that, wee did feare if meanes were not found to recounter or stoppe the the offences before named, that this would immediately follow vpon it. Wherefore most reuerend fathers, lest that the kingdome might bee defamed any more by such pestiferous seats, and that the christian faith might happen to be endangered; with all reuerence and charity I doe desire you, euen by the bowels of mercy of our Lord Iesus Christ, that this most sacred councell would prouide some speedie remedie for this kingdome, as touching the premisses.

Moreouer, whether the they backbiters and slanderers, or wicked and false enuiers of the kingdome of Boheme, the which do let the errours aforesaid, and many others more, which are sowen by the Wickleuists in the said kingdome, and also elsewhere, which alls both do labour and haue laboured for the extirpation and rooting out of those errours out of the kingdome aforesaid, and as catholicke men, for the zeale of their faith haue manfully put forth themselues against the maintainers of the said errours, or such as doe maintaine, and defend the teachers of those errours: this answere I haue here presented before your reuerences, alwaies wholly submitting my selfe and assistance vnto your iudgement, and to the definition of this most sacred councell of Constance.

¶ The answere of the nobles of Boheme.

The bishop of Luthonius answere confuted.

THe day before Whitsontide, the nobles of Boheme did confute this their answere made two daies before in the councell to their former writing, as here followeth: Most reuerend fathers and lords, forsomuch as vpon thursday it was answered in the behalfe of your reuerences to the requests of the nobles and lords of Boheme, that the said lords were misinformed of diuers points contained in the declaration of their said bill: therefore the foresaid lords haue now determined and decreed to declare their former propounded requests more at large vnto your reuerences, not minding hereby to argue or reprooue your fatherly wisdomes and circumspections, but that your reuerences (their desires being partly on this behalfe fulfilled) might the more effectually and distinctly discerne and iudge as touching this matter.

And first of all, whereas the lords alledged and said, how that master Iohn Hus was come hither vnto Constance, freely of his owne good will, vnder the safe-conduct of the lord the king, and the protection of the sacred empire: it is answered on the behalfe of your reuerences, how that the said lords are misinformed, as touching the safe-conduct, and that you haue vnderstood by such as are worthie credit, that the friends and fauourers of the said master Iohn Hus, did first procure and get his safe-conduct fifteene daies after his imprisonment.

The bishops do quarrell about the safe-conduct of Iohn Hus.

The lords of Boheme, and specially the lord Iohn de Clum here present, whom this matter doth chiefly touch, doth answere, that not onely the fifteenth day after, but euen the very same day that Iohn Hus was apprehended and taken, when as our reuerend father the pope, in the presence of all his cardinals, demanded of master Iohn de Clum, whether master Iohn Hus had any safe-conduct from the king his son: he answered, Sholl holy father and cardinals, know ye that he hath a safe-conduct; and when he was asked the question against the second time, he answered in like maner.

The safe-conduct of Iohn Hus obteined and shewed before the imprisonment of Iohn Hus.

Yet notwithstanding none of them required to haue the safe-conduct shewed vnto them: and against the third day following, the lord Iohn de Clum complained vnto our lord the pope, how notwithstanding the safe-conduct of our soueraigne lord the king, he obtained and kept master Iohn Hus as prisoner, depriuing the said safe-conduct vnto many. And for a further truth herein, hee referreth himselfe vnto the testimonies and witnesses of diuers earles, bishops, knights, gentlemen, and famous citizens of the city of Constance, the which all together at this present did see the said safe-conduct, and heard it read; whereupon the said Iohn de Clum is readie to bind himselfe vnder what penaltie shall be required, euidently to proue and confirme that which he hath promised, whosoeuer say to the contrary.

The bishops of the councell falsly informed touching the safe-conduct of Iohn Hus.

Moreouer, the lords of Boheme refer themselues vnto the knowledge of certaine princes electors, and other princes, bishops, and many other noble men, which were present before the kings maiestie, where when as the said safe-conduct was granted and giuen out by the speciall commandement of our said lord the king.

Hereby your fatherly reuerences may vnderstand and perceiue that the said lords of Boheme, are not euill informed as touching the said safe-conduct: but rather they which by such reports haue falsified and vntruely informed your reuerences. And first of all they haue offended against the lord our king, and his chancellors. Secondarily, against the lords and nobles of Boheme, as though we had priuilie and by stealth, purchased the said safe-conduct. Wherefore the lords aforesaid make humblie requite and desire your reuerences, that you will not so lightly beleeue such as be not worthie of credit, but rather hearing the contrary part, to labour and discusse that the truth may the more euidently appeare.

Secondly, whereas the lords aforesaid, alledging how master Iohn Hus, comming vnto Constance, of his owne free will, being neither condemned nor heard, was imprisoned. Iohn Hus imprisoned before he was either condemned or heard.

Iohn Hus by procurers cuill intreated at Rome.

Iohn Hus falsly reported to haue openly preached at Constance.

Iohn Husheb many well wishers in Bohemia.

pour reuerences haue made answere thereunto, that hee the said master Iohn Hus, in the time of Alexander the fifth, was infamed and slandered vpon certaine heresies, and thereupon cited personally to appeare in the court of Rome, and there was heard by his procurers.

And forsomuch as hee refused obstinately to appeare, hee was excommunicated: in the which excommunication he continued (as you affirme) by the space of fiue yeares, for the which he was iudged, and counted not onely a simple and plaine heretick, but an heresiarch, that is to say, an inuenter and sower of new and strange heresies, and that hee comming toward Constance, did preach by the way openly. To this the lords aforesaid doe answere, that as touching his slander and citation, they can affirme nothing, but by report. But as touching that hee did not personally appeare, they say they haue heard both himselfe and diuers other credible persons say, yea euen the most famous prince Wenceslaus king of Boheme, and almost all the whole nobility is witnesse, that hee would willingly haue appeared at Rome, or elsewhere, if hee might safely haue come thither, and that deadly enmitie had not letted: and moreouer, his procurers which hee sent vnto the court of Rome, alleaging reasonable causes for his non appearance, some of them were cast into prison, and others were euill intreated.

As for the excommunication which he hath so long sustained, they haue heard him often say, that he hath not refused against the same by contumacie, or stubbornesse, but vnder euident appellation, and thereupon referreth himselfe vnto the acts of his causes, which were pleaded in the court of Rome, wherein all this is more largely contained, the which your reuerences may euidently perceiue and see in this our present publike transumpt, which we haue offered vnto you vpon certaine points aforesaid.

As concerning his preaching, wherewithall his enemies doe report and charge, that master Iohn Hus did preach openly in the city of Constance: the lords aforesaid, and specially the lord Iohn de Clum here present, doe answere, that he hath continually lodged with the said master Iohn Hus here in Constance; and that whosoeuer they be, that haue beene so bold, or dare bee so bold to say and affirme that master Iohn Hus has preached (as is premised) or that which leseth, since the time of his comming vnto this city, euen vnto the very day and time of his captiuitie and imprisonment, that he went but one step out of the house of his lodging, the which lord Iohn de Clum, will and is content to bind himselfe with any such, as shall affirme the same, vnder what penalty soeuer it be, of money or otherwise, that which hee hath falsly reported vnto your reuerences, he shall neuer be able iustly and truely to affirme and proue.

Thirdly, whereas your reuerences do say, that you do not vnderstand or know, what the lords do meane, by the heresies condemned, at the councell holden at Pisa, whether the mocking or deriding of the pope, whose ambassadors came thither for vnity or concord, the which were suffered and gently entreated, as their lords were most enclined vnto vnity and peace, or else that they did vnderstand or meane the particular heresies, which were there condemned: adioyning thereunto, that the heretickes also comming vnto the councell, vnder the pretence of that vnity, should bee gently handled and entreated, &c. Reuerend fathers & lords, whether they bee counted the first, or that they be thought the second or last, the lords aforesaid require none other thing, but that the said master Iohn Hus may vse such libertie as they vsed, forsomuch as he came willingly vnto this most sacred councell, not for any other purpose, but onely publikely to recognise his faith. And in what point soeuer he shall seeme to bane from the word of God, and the vnion of the holy mother the church, that in that point he will willingly be vnited and reconciled againe thereunto, and not only himselfe, but also his fauourers and adherents hee would moue and prouoke thereunto, of whom the greater number are in the kingdome of Boheme. Also hee is come hither, that he might purge and cleare the noble kingdome of Boheme, from the sinister and euill slander which was raised vpon it.

Last of all most reuerend fathers and lords, forsomuch as your reuerences haue most fauourablie answered vnto the principall request made by the lords aforesaid, that the processe of master Iohn Hus through Gods helpe should bee determined and ended with all expedition and gentlenesse: the lords aforesaid do render most hearty thankes vnto your reuerences, and whensoeuer their desire by Gods helpe shall come to the end or effect long wished or looked for, they will not only heare, but also before the whole kingdome of Boheme, and in all other places whersoeuer they come, render most immortall thankes vnto your reuerences for euer.

¶ This declaration of the nobles of Boheme aboue prefixed, may serue not only to the confutation of the bishop Luthonius this Bohemian, but also against the cauillations of Alanus Copus Anglus, Dial. 6. pag. 929. touching the safe-conduct of Iohn Hus, whereof sufficiently before hath beene said: vide supra, pag. 548.

When as the noble men of Boheme by long time could receiue no answere of those supplications which they had alreadie put vp, they determined the last daie of Map following vp an other supplication being put vp vnto the principals of the councell, to entreat that Iohn Hus might be deliuered out of prison, and defend his owne cause openly: they also put vp the testimonall of the bishop of Nazareth, as touching Iohn Hus. The copie whereof is expressed in the beginning of this historie, as vp by worde.

¶ Another supplication of the nobles of Boheme.

An other supplication of the Bohemians for Iohn Hus.

MOst reuerend Fathers and Lords in Christ, of late there was a supplication put vp vnto your reuerences on the behalfe of the Lords and Nobles of Boheme, and the nation of Pole, wherein they most humblie desired your reuerences to consider how the informations which were put vp vnto your reuerences, by the enemies of M. Iohn Hus, were insufficient; and with reuerence be it spoken, in manie points vntrue, as in the safe-conduct graunted by the Kings maiestie, and also in other articles, as more plainelie appeareth in the Schedule, which was then offered vnto you vpon the which said Schedule and other things at that present being put vp, they could not as yet receiue any answere. Wherefore the Lords aforesaid, most humblie require your fatherlie reuerences, that it would please you to consider the said supplication, and to giue some answere to the Lords aforesaid thereupon, and specialliie hauing respect vnto the great iniuries and griefes which are done vnto the said M. Iohn Hus, the which may be vnderstood and knowne by the Schedule aforesaid, that you will mercifullie consider and foresee, that all those griefes and euils so farre different from all brotherlie loue and charitie are done vnto him by his enemies euen for very malice & hatred.

The Lords could not haue no answere of their supplication.

To the intent therefore that the rancour and malice may be confounded and ouerthrowne, and the plaine and euident truth appeare, it may please your fatherly reuerences to vnderstand, that it is notified and knowne vnto the Barons, Nobles, Citizens, Clergie and Laitie of the kingdome of Boheme, that M. Iohn Hus in all his acts and doings as well Scholasticall as Ecclesiasticall, and specialliie in all his publike and open sermons, he hath made and hath accustomed to make these maner of protestations, the which without any thing to the contrarie, he hath alwaies endeuoured to haue them strong and firme, as by this his protestation here following, which he made about the determination of a certaine question, it may most euidentlie and plainelie appeare vnto euerie man which would behold and looke vpon the same: the forme and tenour whereof here followeth, and is such.

¶ The protestation of Iohn Hus.

The protestation of I. Hus.

FOr so much as aboue all things I do desire the honour of God, the profit of the holie Church, and that I my selfe may be a faithfull member of our Lord Iesu Christ, which is the head and husband of the holie Church which he hath redeemed: therefore as heretofore oftentimes I haue done, euen so now againe I make this protestation, that I neuer obstinatlie said, or hereafter will say any thing that shall be contrarie vnto the truth and veritie: and moreouer, that I haue alwaies holden, do hold, and firmelie desire for to hold the verie true and infallible truth and veritie; so that before that I would defend and maintaine anie error contrarie thereunto, I would rather choose by the hope and helpe of the Lord to suffer extreme punishment, euen vnto death: yea and through the helpe of God I am readie, euen to offer this my miserable life vnto death for the law of Christ, the which I doe beleeue euery part and parcell thereof to be giuen and promulgate for the saluation of mankind, by the counsell and determination of the most holie Trinitie, and the Saints of God, &c.

Vid. in print. edit. pag. 207.

By the which his protestation, and also other protestations by the said M. Iohn Hus, being well obserued and noted, it may be easilie gathered and known that his whole intent & purpose was and is, that he neither would nor will haue spoken or written anie thing in his bookes, treatiles, doctrines, or publike sermons, or else to haue affirmed anie articles, the which willinglie and wittinglie he did vnderstand or know to be erroneous, offensiue, seditious, heretical, or offending the godlie eare; albeit that these and such like things are falselie imputed vnto him by his enemies. But it hath alwaies beene his chiefe intent and purpose, and so is, that euerie point, conclusion or article contained in his bookes or articles, to haue put & affirmed them to this end, according to the truth of the Gospell, the holie Doctors and writers vpon the holie Scriptures, and to that end and purpose, as is before expressed in his protestations: and if in anie point he should be found to varie or go astraie, or that he were not well vnderstood of others, by like information to be informed, vnderstood, corrected and amended, and that he will by no meanes sustaine or defend any maner of article against the holie Church of Rome, or the Catholicke faith.

Wherefore most reuered fathers, the premisses notwithstanding, his enemies, through the extreame hatred which they beare vnto him, haue picked and taken out by piece meale certaine articles out of the bookes of M. Iohn Hus, reiecting and not looking vpon the allegations and reasons, neither hauing anie relation vnto the distinction of their equiuocations, haue compounded and made thereof certaine falle and fained articles against him, to this end, that all charitie and loue being set apart, they might the better ouerthrow him, and bring him vnto death, contrarie vnto the safe-conduct vpon good and iust occasion openly assigned, and giuen vnto the said master Iohn Hus, by the most noble Prince the Lord Sigismund, King of the Romanes and of Hungarie, for his iust defence, against all the friuolous accusations and assaults of the enemies, not onelie of the said master Iohn Hus, but also of the famous kingdome of Boheme, and for the quiet appeasing of all such tumults and rumours rising and springing in the said kingdome of Boheme, or elsewhere: the auoiding of which most perilous vprores, the said King of Romans doth greatlie desire and wish, as the right heire and successour of the said kingdome.

VVhereupon the Barons and Nobles aforesaid, most humblie desire and require, the premisses being considered, and respect had vnto the great infamie and slander which may happen by the premisses vnto the said kingdome and inhabitants thereof, that you will put to your hands, and take some order and meane, that master Iohn Hus may be distinctlie heard by some famous men, diuines alreadie deputed, or otherwise to be appointed vpon all and singuler such articles as shall be laid vnto him, to declare his owne minde and intent, and also the minde of the doctours alleaged for his purpose, with the manifold distinctions and equiuocations: in the which the trauers out of the most part of his articles haue also made equiuocations, that so according vnto the disposition of the witnesses, of the which a great number of them are and haue a long time bene his mortall enemies, that at the friuolous instigation of his enemies, when he was miserablie detained prisoner, that he should not be condemned vnheard. For so much as by the said declarations your fatherlie reuerences might be the more better informed of the truth, he himselfe is readie alwaies to submit himselfe vnder the determination of this most sacred Councell. For your reuerences, by the craftie and fained perswasions of his enemies, are thus informed, that master Iohn Hus hath bene vncurablie obstinate by a long time in most perilous articles, the which your reuerences may now plainelie perceiue to be vntrue: and for the more euidence herein to be shewed, there is presented vnto your reuerences an instrument of publike recognition of the most reuerend father in Christ the Lord Nicolas Bishop of Nazareth and Inquisitour of heresies, specially appointed by the Apostolike see in the dioces of Prage, the which by your reuerences is more diligentlie to be hearkened vnto.

The Counsell euill informed against I. Hus.

VVherefore it may please your fatherlie reuerences to command the said M. Iohn Hus neither conuicted nor condemned, to be taken and brought out of his bonds and chaines, in the which he is now most grieuouslie deteined and kept, and to put him into the hands of some reuerend Lords Bishops, or Commissioners, appointed or to be appointed by this present Councell: that the said M. Iohn Hus may somewhat be relieued, and recouer againe his health, and be the more diligentlie and commodiouslie examined by the Commissioners: and for the more assurance, the Barons and Nobles aforesaid of the kingdome of Boheme, will prouide most sure & good sureties, the which will not breake their fidelitie and faith for anie thing in the world. VVhich also shall promise in his behalfe, that he shall not flee or depart out of their hands, vntill such time as the matter be fully determined by the said Commissioners. In the execution of the which premises, we haue determined to prouide and foresee vnto the fame and honour of the said kingdome of Bohemie, & also to the safe-conduct of the most worthie Prince, the king of Romans, lest that the enemies and detractours of the honour and fame of the kingdome aforesaid, might not a little slander and reproouse the said Lords, pretending and shewing forth hereafter, that they had made vnreasonable or vnlawfull requests: for the withstanding of which mischiefe we require your fathelie reuerences, that you will decree, and most gratiouslie consent, that this our petition & supplication may be drawne out againe by your Notarie, and reduced into a publicke forme and order.

The noble men required that Iohn Hus not being conuicted nor condemned, should be deliuered out of prison.

After this supplication was read before the deputies of the foure nations, the Patriarch of Antioch answered in the name of them all vnto euerie article of the said supplication; but it was done in fewe words.

The malitious crew of the councell of the popish band.

First, as touching the protestation of Iohn Hus, whether it be true or false, it shalbe made euident in the processe of his cause. Moreouer, whereas they saie that the aduersaries of Iohn Hus haue peruerselie drawne certaine things out of his bookes, that also the matter it selfe shall declare in the end. Whereas if it shalbe found and decreed that Iohn Hus is vntruelie & vntrulie accused, that then it shall come to passe that his aduersaries shall incurre perpetuall ignominie and slander. But as touching sureties, albeit there might be a thousand put in or bound, yet can it not by any meanes be, that the deputies of the Councell with a safe conscience may receiue or take them in this this mans cause, vnto whom there is no faith or credit to be giuen. Vnlesse it thus much they will doe, vpon the fifth day of Iune next Iohn Hus shal be brought againe vnto Constance, and there haue free libertie to speake his mind before the councell, and that they would lauingly and gentlie heare him: but the matter in the end fell out farre contrary to this promise.

Supplication to the emperor Sigismund.

The same day the said barons and lords presented a supplication of this tenour vnto the Emperour: Vnto the most high and mightie prince, the lord Sigismund king of the Romanes, alwaies Augustus, king of Hungarie, Croatia, and Dalmatia, our most gracious lord, faithfull and true seruice in all things, and at all times. Most noble prince, and gracious lord, we signifie vnto your worthinesse, that wee all together with one mind, consent and accord, haue deliuered vp vnto the reuerend fathers and Lords, the deputies of the foure nations, and to the whole sacred councell of Constance, this our supplication here vnder written, as reasonable, iust, and worthie of consideration, the tenour whereof here followeth word by word, and is this.

¶ The copie of the supplication, which was presented by the barons to the deputies of the councell, is before written, vnto which to this followeth was annexed.

The barons supplication to the king for Iohn Hus.

WHerefore wee most humblie require and desire your princely Maiestie, that both for the leaue of iustice, and also of the fame and renoune of that most famous kingdome of Boheme, whereof we acknowledge you vndoubtedly the true lord and heire successour, and also foreseeing vnto the libertie of your safe-conduct, that you will with your fauourable countenance, beholding these most reasonable and iust supplications, which wee haue put vp to the Lords aforesaid, put to your helping hand toward the said most reuerend fathers and lords, that they will effectually heare vs, in this our most iust petition, which we haue offered vp to them, as is aforesaid: lest that the enemie of the renowne and honour of the famous kingdome of Boheme, and such as our slanderers also hereafter may detract and slander vs, that we should make vnreasonable and vnlawfull requests vnto the said reuerend fathers and lords; and therefore we required and desired of them that it would please them to decree by setting to their publike hand and seale to authorise our said publication. Likewise we doe most hartily require your highnesse, that you would vouchsafe in like maner to giue vs your testimony of the premises.

The king forced by the importunitie of the cardinals to breake promise.

But that answere the emperor made hereunto, we could neuer vnderstand: know; but by the processe of the matter a man may easilie iudge, that this good emperour was brought and led euen vnto this point, though the obstinate mischefe of the cardinals and bishops, to breake and falsifie his promise and faith which he had made and promised; and this was their reason whereby hee was driuen thereunto, that no defence could or might be giuen either by safe-conduct, or by any other meane vnto him, which was suspected or iudged to bee an heretike. But by the epistles and letters of Iohn Hus, a man may easilie iudge what the kings mind was. Now we will procede in the historie.

The fifth day of Iune, the cardinals, bishops, and the rest of the prelats, all that were almost in Constance, assembled to a great number, at the couent of the Franciscans in Constance, and there it was commanded, that before Iohn Hus should be brought forth, in his absence they should rehearse the witnesses and articles, which they had slanderously gathered out of his bookes: the which articles with Iohn Hulles answere, we will hereafter repeate. By chance there was then present a certaine Notary, named Peter Mladonowitz, the which long great time and amitie vnto the said Hus, who as soone as he perceiued that the bishops and cardinals were alreadie determined and appointed to condemne the said articles in the absence of Iohn Hus, hee went with all speede vnto master Wencelate de Duba, and Iohn of Clum, and told them all the matter, who incontinent made repoat thereof to the emperor. Who vnderstanding their intent, sent Lewes the county Palatine of Heydelberge, and the lord Fredericke, Burgraue of Nuremberge, to signifie vnto them, which ruled the councell, that nothing should be resolued or done in the case of Iohn Hus, before that it were first heard with equitie, and that they should send him all such articles as were laid against the said Hus, which were either false or hereticall, and he would doe so much, that the said articles should bee examined, by good and learned men. Then according to the emperors will, the iudgement of the principals of the councell was suspended, vntill such time as Iohn Hus were present.

Iohn Hus in no case must be bailed.

In the meane season these gentlemen, master of Duba and of Clum, did giue vnto the two princes which the Emperour had sent, certaine small treatises which the said Hus had made, out of the which they had drawne certaine articles to present vnto them which rule the councell, vnder this condition, that they would render them againe, when they should demand them. The intent and meaning of these barons was, that by this meanes the aduersaries of Iohn Hus might the more easilie bee reproued, the which of a naughtie and corrupt conscience, had picked out corrupt sentences out of the said bookes of Iohn Hus. The bookes were deliuered vnto the cardinals and bishops; and that done, Iohn Hus was brought forth, and the princes which were sent by the emperour, departed backe againe. After they shewed the bookes vnto Iohn Hus, and he confessed openly before the whole assemblie that he had made them, and that he was readie, if there were any fault in them, to amend the same.

Iohn Hus forced to read his bookes openly before the bishops and priests.

The like was done in the house of master Nicolas Bazilla where he was driuen at length to answere against the godly articles.

Now hearken a little to the holy procedings of these reuerend fathers, for here happened a strange and vnmindfull matter. With much adoe they had scarcely read one article, and brought forth a few witnesses vpon the same against him, but as he was about to open his mouth to answere, all this mad heard or flocke began so to crie out vpon him, that he had not leisure to speake one onely word. The noise and trouble was so great and so vehement, that a man might well haue called it a brute or noise of wild beasts, and not of men, much lesse was it to be iudged a congregation of men gathered together, to iudge and determine so graue and waighthie matters. And it it happened that the noise and crie did neuer so little cease, that he might answere anie thing at all, out of the holy Scriptures or ecclesiasticall Doctors, by and by he should heare these goodly replies vpon him: That maketh nothing to the purpose.

An outrageous councell.

Besides all this, some did outrage in words against him, and other some spitefully mocked him: so that hee seeing himselfe ouerwhelmed with these rude and barbarous noises and cries, and that it profited nothing to speake, he determined finally with himselfe to hold his peace and keepe silence. From that time forward al the whole rout of his aduersaries thought that they had won the battell of him, and cried out all together, now he is dumbe, now he is dumbe: This is a certaine signe and token, that he both consent and agree vnto their errors. Finally, the matter came to this point, that certaine of the most moderate and honest among them, seeing this disorder, determined to procede no further, but that all thomb to be referred and put off vntill an other time. Though their aduise, the prelats and others departed from the councell so that present, and appointed to mete there against the morrow after to procede in iudgement.

A great eclipse of the Sunne.

The next day, which was the seuenth of June, on which day the sunne was almost wholly eclipsed, somewhat after about seuen of the clocke, this same flocke assembled againe in the cloister of the friers Minors, and by their appointment Iohn Hus was brought before them, accompanied with a great number of armed men. Thither went also the emperor, whom the gentlemen, Master of Duba, and Clum, and the Bohemie named Peter, which were great friends of the said Hus, did follow to see what the end would be. When they were come thither, they heard that in the accusation of Michael de Causis, they read these woords following: Iohn Hus hath taught the people diuers and many errours both in the chapell of Bethleem, and also in many other places of the citie of Prage, of the which errours some of them hee hath drawen out of Wicklifes bookes, and the rest hee hath forged and inuented of his owne head, and doth maintaine the same very obstinatly and stiffely.

They went forth with woords and fauour, as it had bene to take a theefe.

Peter's Iohn follow Christ into the bishops house.

Firſt, that after the consecration and pronunciation of the woords in the Supper of the Lord, there remaineth material bread; and this is proued by the witnesse of Iohn Protiuiate, parish Priest of saint Clements in Prage, Iohn Pecklow preacher at saint Giles in Prage, Wenslie preacher in the castle of Prage, Andrew Wods, Chanon of Prage, and diuers other priests. Vnto this Iohn Hus taking a solemne oth, answered, that he neuer spake any such woord, but thus much he did grant, that at what time the archbishop of Prage forbad him to vse any more that terme or woord bread, hee could not allow the bishops commandement: for so much as Christ in the 6. chapter of Iohn doth oftentimes name himselfe the bread of angels, which came downe from heauen, to giue life vnto the whole world. But as touching material bread, hee neuer spake any thing at all. Then the cardinall of Cambray taking a certaine bill in his hand, which he said hee receiued the day before, said vnto Iohn Hus, Will you put any vnlearned things a parte rei. i. as touching the thing. When Iohn Hus answered, that he would, because saint Anselme, and diuers others had so done, the cardinall did proceed to gather his argument in this manner.

Master made against I. Hus.

False witnesse against I. Hus.

The answere of Iohn Hus.

Naming of bread to shin by the archbishop.

The cardinall sophistically reasoneth with I. Hus.

It followeth then, said he, that after the consecration is made, there remaineth the substance of material bread, and that I doe thus proue: that the consecration being done, whiles the bread is changed and transubstantiated into the body of Christ, as you say, either there doth remaine the common substance of material bread, or contrariwise. If the substance do remaine, this is our purpose at an end. If contrariwise, then doth it follow, that by the decision of the singularity, the vniuersall ceaseth any more to be. Iohn Hus answered, truely it ceaseth to be in this singular material bread, by meanes of this transubstantiation, when as it is changed and transubstantiated into the body of Christ: but notwithstanding in other singularities, it is made subiect.

The disputation of the Englishman.

Then a certaine Englishman by that argument would proue out of the first position, that there remained material bread. Then said Iohn Hus, that is a childish argument, which every day in the schooles knowen, and thereupon gaue a definition. Then an other Englishman would proue, that there remained materiall bread in the Sacrament, because the bread after the consecration was not annihilate. Unto whom John Hus answered: Although, said he, that the bread be not annihilate or consumed, yet singularly it ceaseth there to bee by meanes of the alteration of his substance into the bodie of Christ. Here an other Englishman stepping forth, said: John Hus semeth vnto me to vse the same kind of craftie speech which Wicklieffe vsed, for hee granted all these things which this man hath done, and yet in very deed was fully perswaded that materiall bread remained in the Sacrament after the consecration. The which when John Hus had denied, saying, that he spake nothing but onely sincerely and wrightly, according to his conscience, the Englishman proceeded to demand of him againe, whether the body of Christ be totally and really in the Sacrament of the altar. Whereunto John Hus answered: verily, I do thinke that the body of Christ is really and totally in the Sacrament of the altar, the which was borne of the virgine Mary, suffered, died, and rose againe, and sitteth on the right hand of God the father almightie. When they had disputed a good while to and fro, as touching vniuersalities, the Englishman which before would proue that materiall bread remained in the Sacrament, because that the bread was not annihilate, interrupting and breaking their talke, said: to what purpose is this disputation vpon vniuersalities, the which maketh nothing to the purpose, as touching faith: for as far as I can perceiue or heare, this man holdeth a good opinion, as touching the Sacrament of the altar.

An Englishman.

John Hus answered with the like in the Sacrament.

Then an other Englishman, named Stokes, said: I haue seene at Prage (said he) a certaine treatise, the which was ascribed vnto this man John Hus, wherein it was plainely set forth, that after the consecration, there remained materiall bread in the Sacrament. Verily, said John Hus, sauing your reuerence, that is not true.

Stokes an Englishman.

False witnesse.

Then they returned againe vnto the witnesses of them which were spoken of a little before, who euery man for himselfe affirmed with an oth that which hee had said. Amongst whom John Postwyay, parish priest of saint Clements in Prage, when he should come to confirme his testimony, added more, that John Hus should say, that saint Gregorie was but a rimer, when he did alledge his authoritie against him. Unto whom John Hus answered, that in this point they did him great iniurie, forsomuch as he alwaies esteemed and reputed saint Gregory, for a most holy Doctor of the church.

John Hus belike meaneth for calling S. Gregorie a rimer.

These contentions and disputations being somewhat appeased, the cardinall of Florence turned himselfe toward John Hus, and said: Master, you know well enough that it is written that in the mouth of two or three witnesses all things is firme and stable: and here you see now almost twentie witnesse against you, men of authoritie and worthy of credit, amongst the which some haue heard you teach these things themselues, the other by report & common bute or voice, do testifie of your doctrine, & all together generally bring firme reasons and proofes of their witnesse, vnto the which we are forced and constrained to giue credit; and for my part, I see not how you can maintaine and defend your cause against so many notable and well learned men. Unto whom John Hus answered in this maner: I take God and my conscience to witnesse, that I neuer taught any thing, neither was it euer in my mind or fantasie to teach in such sort or maner, as these men here haue not feared to witnesse against me that which they neuer heard. And albeit they were as many more in number as they are, for all that, I do much more effeeme, yea and without comparison regard the witnesse of my Lord God, before the witnes and iudgement of all mine aduersaries vpon whom I do in no point stay my selfe. Then said the Cardinall against vnto him, it is not lawfull for vs to iudge according to your conscience, for we cannot thinke, but that wee must needs stay our selues vpon the firme and euident witnesse of these men here. For it is not for any displeasure or hatred that these men do witnes this against you, as you do alledge; for they alledge and bring forth such reasons of their witnesse, that there is no man that can perceiue any hatred in them, or that wee can in any case be in doubt thereof. And as touching matter betweene Palez, whereas you say, you do suspect him that he hath craftily and deceitfully drawen out certaine points or articles out of your bookes for to betray them afterwards: it seemeth that in this point you do him great wrong, for in mine aduice he hath vsed and shewed a great fidelitie and amitie toward you, in that he hath alleviated and moderated many of your articles much more then they are in your owne bookes. I vnderstand also that you haue like opinion of diuers other notable men, and specially you haue said, that you do suspect M. Chancellor of Paris, then whom there is no more excellent and christian man in all the whole world.

Twentie witnesses generally bring firme reasons against John Hus, but the testimonie of all Boheme would not serue on his part.

The cardinall of Florence.

The cardinall of Cambray.

Then was there read a certaine article of accusation, in the which it was alledged that John Hus had taught, and obstinately defended certaine erroneous articles of Wicklieffes in Boheme. Whereunto Hus answered, that he neuer taught any errours of John Wicklieffes, or of any other mans. Wherefore if it be so that Wicklieffe hath holded any errours in England, let the Englishmen looke to that themselues. But to confirme their article, there was alledged that John Hus did withhold and the condemnation of Wicklieffs articles, the which was first condemned at Rome: and afterward also, when the archbishop Swinco, with other learned men, held a conuocation at Prage for the same matter, when as they should haue beene there condemned for this cause, that none of them were agreeing to the catholike faith or doctrine, but were either heretical, erroneous, or offensiue: he answered, that he durst not agree thereunto, for offending his conscience, and specially for these articles, that Silvester the pope and Constantine did erre in bestowing those great gifts and rewards vpon the church. Also, that the pope or priest being in mortall sinne, cannot consecrate nor baptise. This article, said hee, I haue thus determined, as if I should say, that bee doth vniuersallie consecrate or baptise, when as he is in deadly sinne, and that he is an vniuersall minister of the Sacraments of God. Here his accusers, with their witnesses, were earnest and instant that the article of Wicklieffe was written by the very same words in the treatise which John Hus made against Stephen Palez. Verily, said John Hus, I feare not to submit my selfe, euen vnder the danger of death, if you shall not find it so as I haue said. When the booke was brought forth, they found it written as John Husse had said. Hee added also moreouer, that hee durst not agree vnto them which had condemned Wicklieffes articles, for this article: the tenthes were pure almes.

Certaine articles of Wicklieffe that John Hus stood in.

Here the Cardinall of Florence abiected vnto him his argument, as touching the almes: it is required that it should be giuen freely without bond or duty: But tenthes are not giuen freely without bond or duty: therefore are they no almes. John Hus denying the Maior of this Syllogisme, brought this reason against him. For asmuch as rich men are bounden vnder the paine of eternall damnation, vnto the fulfilling of the 6. workes of mercy, which Christ repeateth in the 25. chap. of Matthew, and these workes are pure almes: Ergo, almes is also giuen by bond and duety. Then an archbishop of England stepping vp, said, if we all be bound vnto those 6. workes of mercy, it doth follow that poore men, which haue nothing at all to giue, should be damned. I answere, said Hus, vnto your antecedent, that I spake diuersly of rich men, and of those which had where withall to do those workes: they, I say, were bound to giue almes vnder paine of damnation.

Whether tenthes be pure almes.

Almes stand of duetie.

Hee answered moreouer vnto the Minor of the first argument, that tenthes were at first giuen freely, and afterward made a bond and duety: and when as hee would haue declared it more at large, he could not be suffered. Hee declared also diuers other causes, why he could not with safe conscience consent vnto the condemnation of Wicklieffes articles. But howsoeuer the matter went, he did affirme and say, that hee did neuer obstinately maintaine any articles of Wicklieffe, but onely that he did not allow and consent that Wicklieffes articles should bee condemned before that sufficient reasons were alledged out of the holy Scripture for their condemnation: and of the same mind, saith John Hus, are a great many other Doctors & maisters of the Universitie of Prage. For whereas Swinco the archbishop commanded all Wicklieffes bookes to be gathered together in the whole citie of Prage, and to bee brought vnto him, I my selfe brought also certaine bookes of Wicklieffes, which I gaue vnto the archbishop, desiring him, that if he found any errour or heresie in them, that he would note and marke them, and I my selfe would publish them openly. But the archbishop, albeit that he beheld in me no errour nor heresie in them, burned my bookes, together with those that were brought vnto him, notwithstanding that hee had no such commandement from pope Alexander the fifth of that name. But notwithstanding by a certaine policie he obtained a bull from the said pope by meanes of Jarollaus bishop of Sarepte, of the order of Franciscans, that al Wicklieffes bookes for the manifold errours contained in them (whereof there was none named) should be taken out of all mens hands.

John Hus denieth that Wicklieffes bookes are condemned.

John Hus his mind touching the condemnation of Wicklieffes articles.

Wicklieffes bookes burned in Prage by the archbishop Swinco.

The archbishop vsing the authority of this bull, thought he should bring to passe that the king of Boheme and the nobles should consent to the condemnation of Wicklieffes bookes; but therein he was deceiued. Yet nuerthelesse, hee calling together certaine diuines, gaue them in commission to sit vpon Wicklieffes bookes, and to procede against them by a definitiue sentence in the canon law. These men by a generall sentence iudged all those bookes worthie to be burned. The which when the Doctors, maisters and schollers of the Universitie heard report of, they all together with one consent and accord (none excepted but onely they, which before were chosen by the archbishop to sit in iudgement) determined to make supplication vnto the king to stay the matter. The king granting their request, sent by and by certaine vnto the archbishop to examine the matter. There he denied that hee would decree any thing as touching Wicklieffes bookes contrarie vnto the kings will and pleasure. Whereupon, albeit that hee had determined to burne them the next day after, yet for feare of the king, the matter was passed ouer.

A narration concerning Wicklieffes bookes.

The Universitie of Prage maketh supplication to the king for saueing of Wicklieffes bookes.

In the meane time pope Alexander the fifth being dead, the archbishop fearing lest the bull which hee had receiued of Wicklieffes bookes burned in Kings against the kings will.

A decree that no man should teach any more in chapels.

of the pope, would be no longer of any force or effect, priuilie calling vnto him his adherents, and shutting the gates of his court round about him, being garded with a number of armed souldiers, he consumed and burned all Wicklieffes bookes. Beside this great iniury, the archbishoppe by meanes of his bull aforesaid, committed another no lesse tolerable. For he gaue out commandement, that no man after that time vnder paine of excommunication, should teach any more in chapels. Whereupon I did appeale vnto the pope, who being dead, and the cause of my matter remaining vndetermined, I appealed likewise vnto his successor John 23. Before whom, when as by the space of two yeeres, I could not be admitted by my aduocates to defend my cause, I appealed vnto the high Judge Christ. When John Hus had spoken these words, it was demanded of him, whether he had received absolution of the pope or no? He answered, No. Then againe, whether it were lawful for him to appeale vnto Christ or no? Whereunto John Hus answered: Verily I doe affirme here afore you all, that there is no more iust or effectuall appeale, then that appeale which is made vnto Christ, forasmuch as the law doth determine, that to appeale, is no other thing then in a cause of griefe or wrong done by an inferior Judge, to implore and require aid and remedy at a higher Judges hand. Who is then an higher Judge then Christ? Who, I say, can know or iudge the matter more iustly, or with more equitie? then as in him there is found no deceit, neither can he be deceiued: or who can better helpe the miserable and oppressed then he? While John Hus with a deuout and sober countenance was speaking and pronouncing those words, he was derided and mocked of all the whole councell.

John Hus appealed to the pope, and from the pope to Christ.

A question of the councell whether it be lawfull to appeale to Christ or no.

The popish church disclosed by Christ.

Then was there rehearsed another article of his accusation in this maner: that John Hus for to confirme the heresie which he had taught the common and simple people out of Wicklieffes bookes, said openly these words: that at what time a great number of monks and friers, and other learned men were gathered together in England in a certaine church, to dispute against John Wicklieffe, and could by no meanes bee ouerthrowen, or giue him the foile, suddenly the church doore was broken open with lightning, so that with much ado Wicklieffes enemies hardly escaped without hurt. He added moreouer, that he wished his soule to be in the same place where John Wicklieffes soule was. Whereunto John Hus answered, that a dozen yeeres before that any bookes of Diuinitie of John Wicklieffes were in Boheme, hee did set certaine words of Philosophie of his, the which he said, did marueilously delight and please him. And when he vnderstood the good and godly life of the said Wicklieffe, he spake these words: I trust, said he, that Wicklieffe is saued: and albeit that I doubt whether he be damned or no, yet with a good hope I wish, that my soule were in the same place where John Wicklieffes is. Then againe did all the company fall and laugh at him.

John Hus accused for iudging that Wicklieffes soule is saued.

It is also in his accusation, that John Hus did counsell the people, according to the example of Moses, to resist with the sword against all such as did gainsay his doctrine. And the next day after he had preached the same, there were found openly in diuers places certaine inhibitions, that euery man being armed with his sword about him, should incite and prouoke, and that brother should not spare brother, neither one neighbor an other. John Hus answered, that all these things were falsly laid vnto his charge by his aduersaries, for hee at all times when he preached, did diligently admonish and warne the people, that they should all arme themselues to defend the truth of the Gospell, according to the saying of the Apostle, with the helmet and sword of saluation, and that he neuer spake of any materiall sword, but of that which is the sword of God. And as touching inhibitions or Moses sword, hee neuer had nothing to doe with all.

Sedition laid to his charge.

John Hus his mind touching the condemnation of Wicklieffes articles.

It is moreouer affirmed in his accusation and witnes, that many offences are sprung vp by the doctrine of Hus. For first of all, he sowed discord betweene the ecclesiasticall and the politike state: whereupon followed the persecution, spoiling and robbery of the clergy and bishops. And moreouer, that hee through his dissension, dissolued the Vniuersitie of Prage. Hereunto John Hus briefly answered, that these things had not happened by his meanes or default. For the first dissension that was betweene the ecclesiasticall & politike state, sprang and grew vpon this cause, that pope Gregory the 12. of that name, promised at his election, that at all times at the will & pleasure of the cardinals, he would depart from, and giue ouer his seat againe: for vnder that condition he was elect and chosen. This man, contrary and against Wincelaus king of Boheme, who was then also king of the Romans, made Lewes duke of Bauaria emperor.

John Hus accused for mouing certaine tumults against the clergie and diuision in the Vniuersity of Prage.

A Pope of popes.

A few yeeres after it happened, that when as pope Gregorie would not refuse and giue ouer his seat and office at the request of the cardinals, that the whole college of cardinals sent letters to the king of Boheme, requiring him, that together with them, he would renounce and forsake his obedience vnto pope Gregory, and so it should come to passe, that by the authority of a new bishop, he should recouer againe his imperiall dignitie. For this cause the king consented to the will of the cardinals, as touching a neutralitie; that is to say, that hee would neither take part with pope Gregory, neither yet with Benedict the twelfth, bishop of Auinion, which was then named pope, as it doth appeare by chronicles. In this cause then, forsomuch as the archbishop Swinco with the clergy, were against the king, and abstaining from the diuine seruice many of them departed out of the citie, and the archbishop himselfe breaking downe the tombe of the lord Wincelate, contrary and against the kings will, did also take Wicklieffes bokes and burned them: Hereupon the king without any gainsaying, suffered that certaine gods of theirs, which of their owne wils were fled away, should be spoiled, because they should not consent or accord with the bishop. Whereupon it is easie to be vnderstood and knowne, that John Hus was falsly accused for that matter. Holweit a certaine man, one Nasi, riling vp, said; The clergy (said he) did not abstaine from the diuine seruice, because that they were spoiled and robbed of their goods and substance. And the cardinall of Cambray, who was one of the Judges, said: Here I must say somewhat which is come into my mind.

This doctor saith Hus was counseller to king Wincelaus.

When as I came from Rome, the same yere that these things were done, by chance I met on the way certaine prelats of Boheme. Whom when I demanded what newes they had brought out of Boheme, they answered, that there was happened a wonderfull cruell and hainous fact, for all the clergie were spoiled of all their substance, and very ill intreated and handled. Then John Hus alledging the same cause which he did before, went forward into the second part of the article which was obiected against him, denying also that it happened through his fault, that the Germans departed from the Vniuersitie of Prage. But when as the king of Boheme, according to the foundation of Charles the fourth his father, granted three voices vnto the Bohemes, and the fourth vnto the Germanes; whereat the Germans grudging, that they should be exempted from their voices, of their owne accord departed and went their waies, binding themselues with a great oth, and vnder a great penalty, both of their fame, and also money, that none of them should returne againe vnto Prage. Notwithstanding, I am not ashamed to confesse, that I did approue and allow the doings of the king, vnto whom of duty I owe obedience for the commoditie and profit of my country. And because you shall not thinke that I haue spoken any vntruth, here is present Albert Warren Trapius, which was deacon of the facultées, who had swome to depart with the rest of the Germans: he, if that he will say the truth, shall easily cleere me of this suspition.

A declaration how the Germans departed from the Vniuersitie of Prage.

The penalties of money was ordained there.

But when as Albert would haue spoken, hee could not be heard. But the forsaid Nasi, of whom before is made mention after he had asked leaue to speak, said: This matter do I vnderstand well enough, for I was in the kings court when these things were done in Boheme, when as I saw the maisters of the three nations of the Germans, Wanarians, Saxons, and Silesians, amongst whom the Polonians were also numbred, most humbly come vnto the king, requiring that he would not suffer the right of their voices to be taken from them. Then the king promised them, that he would foresee and prouide for their requests. But John Hus and Jerome of Prage, with diuers others, perswaded the king that hee should not so doe. Whereat the king at the first being not a little moued, gaue him a sore checke, that he and Hierome of Prage did so much intermedle themselues, and moued such open controuerlies, insomuch that he threatned them, that except they would forsee & take heed, he would bring it to passe that the matter should be determined and decided by fire. Wherefore most reuerend fathers, you shall vnderstand that the king of Boheme did neuer fauor with his heart these men, whose vnhappinesse well is such, that they feared not euen of late, to intreat vnto euill, being so much in the kings fauor and credit. After him stepped forth Palez, saying: Verily most reuerend fathers, not onely the learned men of other nations, but also of Boheme it selfe, are through the counsell of John Hus and his adherents, banished out of Boheme, of the which number, some remaine in exile in Sprania. Hereunto John Hus answered: How can this be true, said he, sithence I was not at Prage at that time, when as these men you speake of departed and went away from thence? These things were thus debated the day aforesaid as touching John Hus.

Palez speaketh against John Hus.

This done, the said John Hus was committed to the custody of the bishop of Reigen, vnder whom Hierome of Prage was also prisoner. But before that he was led away, the cardinall of Cambray calling him backe againe in the presence of the emperor, said: John Hus, I haue heard you say, that if you had not been willing of your owne mind to come into Constance, neither the emperor himselfe, neither the king of Boheme could haue compelled you to doe it. Unto whom John Hus answered: Under your licence most reuerend father, I neuer vsed any such kinde of talke or words. But this I did say, that three yeeres in Boheme a great number of gentlemen and noble men, which did fauor and loue mee, the which also might easilie haue kept mee in some sure and secret place, that I should not haue beene constrained to come into this towne of Constance, neither at the will of the emperor, neither neither of the king of Bohemie. With that the cardinall of Cambray, enter for very anger began to change his colour, and despitcously saide: Do you not see the brightnesse of the manhere? And as they were murmuring and whispering on all parts, the lord John de Clum, ratifying and confirming that which John Hus had spoken, saide; that John Hus had spoken very well: for as for my part, saide he, which in comparison of a great many others, am but of small force in the realme of Bohemie, yet alwaies if I would haue taken it in hand, I could haue defended him easily by the space of one yeere, euen against all the force and power of both these great and mighty kings. How much better might they haue done it which are of more force & puissance then I am? and haue stronger castels and places then I haue? After that the lord de Clum had spoken, the cardinall of Cambray saide, Let vs leaue this talke. And I tell you John Hus, and counsell you that you submit your selfe vnto the sentence and mind of the councell, as you doe promise in the prison: and if you will doe so, it shall be greatly both for your profit and honor.

John Hus committed vnto custody of Hierome of Prage.

The Emperour & the Bishops.

The emperor himselfe began to tell him the same tale, saying: Albeit that there be some which say, that the fifteenth day after you were committed to prison, you obtained of vs our letters of safe-conduct; notwithstanding I can well prooue by the witnesse of many princes and noble men, that the said safe-conduct was obtained and gotten of vs by my lord de Dube and de Clum, before you were carted out of Prage, vnder whose gard we haue sent for you, to the end that none should doe you any outrage or hurt, but that you should haue full liberte to speake freely before all the Councell, and to answere as touching your faith and doctrine; and as for me, my lords the cardinals and bishops haue so dealt with you, that we doe very well perceiue their good will towards you, for the which wee haue great cause to thanke them. And forsomuch as diuers haue told vs, that we may not ought not of right to defend any man which is an heretike, or suspect of heresie: therefore now wee giue you euen the same counsell which the cardinall of Cambray hath giuen you already, that you bee not obstinate to maintaine any opinion, but that you bee submit your selfe vnder such obedience as you owe vnto the authoritie of the holy Councell, in all things that shall be laide against you, and confirmed by credible witnesses. The which thing if you doe according to our counsell, we will giue order that for the loue of vs, of our brother and the whole realme of Bohemie, the councell shall suffer you to depart in peace, with an easie and tollerable penance and satisfaction. The which thing if you doe contrariwise refuse to doe, the presidents of the councell, shall haue sufficient wherewithall to proceed against you. And for our part be ye well assured, that we will soner prepare and make the fire with our owne handes to burne you withall, then we will endure or suffer any longer that you shall maintaine or vse this sickenesse of opinions, which you haue hi therto maintained and vsed. Therefore our aduice and counsell is, that you submit your selfe wholly vnto the iudgement of the councell. Vnto whom John Hus answered in this sort: O most noble emperor, I render vnto your highnesse most immortall thanks for your letters of safe-conduct. Vpon this, lord John de Clum did breake him of his purpose, and admonished him that he did in no point excuse himselfe of the blame of obstinacie.

The emperour speaketh to John Hus.

The cardinall of Cambray speaketh to the emperour.

Then said John Hus: O most gentle Lord, I doe take God to my witnesse, that I was neuer minded to maintaine any opinion euer obstinately, and that for this same intent and purpose, I did come hither of mine owne good will, that if any man could lay before me any better or more holy doctrine then mine, that then I would change mine opinion without any further doubt. After he had spoken and said these things, hee was sent away with Sergeants.

The morrow after, which was the eight day of June, the very same company which was assembled the day before, assembled now againe at the Couent of the Franciscans. And in this assembly were also John Hus his friends, lord de Dube, and lord de Clum, and Peter the Notary. Thither was John Hus also brought: and in his presence there were read about thirtie nine articles, the which they said, were drawne out of his bookes. Hus acknowledged all those that were faithfully and trulie collected and gathered, to be his; of the which sort there were but very few. The residue were counterfeited and forged by his aduersaries, and specially by Steuen Palecz, the principall author of this mischiefe: for they could finde no such thing in the bookes out of the which they said they had drawne and gathered them; or at the least, if they were, they were corrupted by slanders, as a man may easilie perceiue by the number of articles.

The articles of John Hus.

These be the same articles in a manner which were shewed before in the prison to John Hus, and are rehearsed here in an other order. Howbeit there were more articles added vnto them, and otherwhile corrected and inlarged. But now we will shew them one with another, and declare what the said Hus did answere both openly before them all, as also in the prison: for he left his answeres in the prison briefly written with his owne hand in these words.

I John Hus, vnworthy minister of Jesus Christ, maister of Art, and Bachelar of Diuinity, doe confesse that I haue written a certaine final treatise intituled, Of the church, the copie whereof was shewed me by the notaries of the three presidents of the councell, that is to say, the Patriarch of Constantinople, the bishop of Castle, and the bishop of Liboufle: the which deputies or presidents in respect of the said treatise, deliuered vnto me certaine articles, saying, that they were drawne out of the said treatise, and were written in the same.

The author of John Hus confessing his booke to be the church.

The first article. There is but one holy vniuersall or catholike church, which is the vniuersall companie of all the predestinate. I doe confesse that this proposition is mine, and is confirmed by the saying of S. Augustine vpon S. Iohn.

The second article. S. Paul was neuer any member of the diuell, albeit that he committed, and did certaine acts like vnto the acts of the malignant church. And likewise S. Peter which fell into an horrible sin of periury and denial of his master, it was by the permission of God that he might the more firmely and stedfastly rise againe and be confirmed. I answer, according to S. Augustine, that it is expedient that the elect and predestinate should sinne and offend.

S. Paul was neuer any member of the diuell.

Hereby it appeareth, that there is two manner of separations from the holy church. The first is, not to perdition, as all the elect are diuided from the church. The second is to perdition, by the which certaine heretikes are through their deadly sinne, diuided from the church. Yet notwithstanding by the grace of God, they may returne againe vnto the flocke, and be of the fold of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom he speaketh himselfe saying; I haue other sheepe which are not of this fold: John 11.

Two manner of separations from the church.

The third article. No part or member of the church doth depart or fall away at any time from the body, for so much as the charitie of predestination, which is the bond and chaine of the same, doth neuer fall. This proposition is thus placed in my booke: As the reprobate of the church proceed out of the same, and yet are not as parts or members of the same, for so much as no part or member of the same doth finallie fall away, because that the charitie of predestination, which is the bond and chaine of the same, doth neuer fall away. This is proued by the 13. chapter of the first to the Corinthians, and to the Romans, the 8. chapter. All things turne to god to them which loue God. Also I am certaine that neither death nor life can separate vs from the charity and loue of God, as it is more at large in the booke.

The members of the church neuer fall finally away.

The church is taken sometime for the congregation of the elect and faithfull, and so is the article taken in the Creed.

The fourth article. The predestinate, although he be not in the state of grace, according to present iustice, yet is he actually a member of the vniuersall church. This is an error, if it be vnderstood of all such as be predestinate: for thus it is in the booke, about the beginning of the fifth chapter, where it is declared, that there be diuers maners and sorts of being in the church; for there are some in the church, according to a militant faith, and other some according to predestination, as christians predestinate now in sinne, but shall returne againe vnto grace.

The predestinate is also a member of the vniuersall church, although not in present iustice.

The church builded vpon Peter, how.

The fifth article. There is no degree of honor, or dignitie, neither any humane election, or any sensible signe, that can make any man a member of the vniuersall church. I answere, this article is after this manner in my booke: And such subtilities are vnderstood and knowne by considering that it is to be in the church, and what it is to be a part or member of the church, and that predestination doth make a man a member of the vniuersall church, the which is a preparation of grace for the present, & of glorp to come: and not any degree of dignitie, neither election of man, neither any sensible signe. For the traitor Iudas Iscariotb, notwithstanding Christs election, and the temporall graces which were giuen him for his office of Apostleship, and that he was reputed and counted of men a true Apostle of Jesus Christ, yet was he no true disciple, but a wolfe couered in a sheepes skinne, as S. Augustine saith.

To be in the church, and a member of the church.

Predestination.

The sixth article. A reprobate man is neuer no member of the holy church. I answere, it is in my booke with sufficient long probation out of the 26. Psalme, and out of the fifth chapter to the Ephesians, & also by S. Bernards saying, The church of Jesus Christ is more plainly and euidently his body, then the body which he deliuered for vs to death. I haue also written in the 5. chapter of my booke, that the holy church is the barne of the Lord, in the which are both good and euill, predestinate and reprobate; the good being as the good corne or graine, and the euill as the chaffe: and thereunto is added the exposition of S. Augustine.

Both good and bad in the church.

The seuenth article. Judas was neuer no true Disciple of Jesus Christ. I answere, and I doe confesse the same. This appeareth by the fifth article, which is passed afore, and by S. Augustine in his booke of penance, where he doth expound the meaning of Saint John, in his first Epistle and second chapter, where he said: They came out from amongst vs, but they were none of vs. He knew from the beginning all them which should beleeue, and him also which should betray him, and said: And therefore I say vnto you, that none commeth vnto me, except it be giuen him of my father. From that time many of the Disciples parted from him, and were not those also called the Disciples, according to the words of the Gospell? And yet notwithstanding they were no true Disciples, because they did not not remaine and continue in the word of the Sonne of God, according as it is said: If you remaine in my word, you be my disciples. Forsomuch then as they did not continue with Christ as his true disciples, so likewise are they not the true sonnes of God: although they seeme so, vnto him they are not so, vnto whom it is knowne what they shall be: that is to say, of good, euill. Thus much writeth S. Augustine: It is also euident that Judas could not be the true disciple of Christ, by meanes of his couetousnesse: for Christ himselfe said in the presence of Judas, as I suppose, Except a man forsake all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple. Forsomuch then as Judas did not forsake all things, according to the Lords will, and follow him, he was a theefe, as it is said John the 12. and a diuell, John the 6. whereby it is euident by the word of the Lord, that Judas was not his true, but fained disciple. Whereupon S. Augustine writing vpon John, declaring how the shep heare the voice of Christ, saith; What maner of hearers, thinke we, his sheepe were? Truly Judas heard him and was a wolfe, yet followed he the shepheard: but being clothed in a sheps skinne, he lay in wait for the shepheard.

The eighth Article. The congregation of the predestinate, whether they be in the state of grace or no, according vnto present iustice, is the holy vniuersall church, and therefore it is an article of faith, and it is the same church which hath neither wrinckle, neither spot in it, but is holy and vndefiled, the which the sonne of God doth call his owne. The answere: The words of the booke out of the which this Article was drawne, are these: Thirdly, the church is vnderstood and taken for the congregation and assembly of the faithfull, whether they be in the state of grace, according to present iustice or not. And in this sort it is an article of our faith, of the which Saint Paul maketh mention in the fifth chapter to the Ephesians: Christ so loued his church, that he deliuered and offered himselfe for the same, &c. I pray you then, is there any faithfull man the which doth doubt that the church doth not signifie all the elect and predestinate, the which we ought to beleeue to be the vniuersall church, the glorious spouse of Jesus Christ, holy and without spot? Wherefore this article is an article of faith, the which we ought firmely to beleeue according to our Creed: I beleeue the holy catholike church; and of this church doth saint Augustine, saint Gregory, saint Jerome, and diuers other make mention.

The ninth Article. Peter neuer was, neither is the head of the holy vniuersall church. The answer: This article was drawne out of these words of my booke: All men doe agree in this point, that Peter had receiued of the rocke of the church (which is Christ) humility, pouerty, stedfastnesse of faith, and consequently blessednesse. Not as though the meaning of our Lord Jesus Christ was, when he said, Vpon this roche I will build my church, that he would build euery militant church vpon the person of Peter, for Christ should build his church vpon the rocke which is Christ himselfe, from whence Peter receiued his stedfastnesse of faith, forsomuch as Jesus Christ is the onely head and foundation of euery church, and not Peter.

Peter neuer was head of the whole vniuersall church.

The tenth article. That that is called the vicar of Jesus Christ, doe follow Christ in his life, then he is his true vicar. But if so be it, he doe walke in contrary paths and waies, then is he the messenger of antichrist, and the enemy and aduersarie of Saint Peter, and of our Lord Jesus Christ, and also the vicar of Judas Iscariot. I answere: The words of my booke are these: If he which is called the vicar of saint Peter, walke in the waies of Christian vertues aforesaid, we doe beleeue verily that hee is the true vicar and true bishop of the church which he ruleth: but if he walke in contrary paths and waies, then is he the messenger of antichrist, contrary both to Saint Peter, and our Lord Jesus Christ. And therefore Saint Bernard in his fourth booke did write in this sort vnto pope Eugenie: Thou delightest and walkest in great pride and arrogancie, being gorgeously and sumptuously arraied, that fruit or profit doe thy flocke or sheepe receiue by thee? If I durst say it, these be rather the pastures and feedings of diuels then of sheep. Saint Peter and S. Paul did not so: therefore you seemest by these thy doings to succeed Constantine, and not saint Peter. These be the very words of S. Bernard. It followeth after in my book, that if the manner and fashion of his life and liuing, be contrary to that which S. Peter vsed, or that he be giuen to auarice and couetousnesse, then is he the vicar of Judas Iscariotb, which loued and chose the reward of iniquity, and did set out to sale the Lord Jesus Christ. As some as they had read the same, those which ruled and gouerned the councell, beheld one another, making mocks and mowes, they nodded their heads at him.

The vicar of Christ, how he is to be taken.

Bernard. ad Eugenium, lib. 4.

The eleuenth Article. All such as do vse simony, and priests liuing dissolutely and wantonly, doe hold an vntrue opinion of the seuen sacraments, as vnbeleeuing bailards, and not as children, not knowing what is the office and duty of the holie orders, censures, rites, and ceremonies, neither of the diuine seruice of the church, or of veneration or worshipping of reliques, neither of the orders constituted and ordained in the church, neither yet of indulgences or pardons. I answere, that it is placed in this manner in my booke: This abuse of authority or power is committed by such as doe sell and make merchandise of holy orders, and get and gather together riches by simony, making faires and markets of the holy sacraments, and liuing in all kind of voluptuousnesse and dissolute manners, or in any other filthy or villanous kind of liuing: They doe pollute and defile the holy ecclesiasticall state. And albeit that they professe in words that they doe know God, yet do they deny it against by their deeds, and consequently beleeue not in God: But as vnbeleeuing bailards they hold a contrary and untrue opinion of the seuen sacraments of the church. And this appeareth most euidently, forsomuch as all such doe vtterly contemne and despise the name of God, according to the saying of Malachi, the first chapter: Vnto you O priests, be it spoken, which do despise and contemne my name.

Prelates making merchandise of holy orders.

The twelfth Article. The papall dignity hath his originall from the emperors of Rome. I answere, and marke well what my words are: The preeminence and institution of the pope is spring and come of the emperors power and authority. And this is proued by the 96. distinction: for Constantine granted this priuiledge vnto the bishop of Rome, and other after him confirmed the same: That like as Augustus for the outward and temporall goods bestowed vpon the church, is counted alwaies the most high king aboue all others: so the bishop of Rome should be called the principall father aboue all other bishops. This notwithstanding the papall dignity hath his originall immediatly from Christ, as touching his spirituall administration and office, to rule the church. Then the cardinall of Cambray said: In the time of Constantine, there was a generall councell holden at Nice, in the which, albeit the highest rowme and place in the church was giuen to the bishop of Rome, for honors cause, it is ascribed vnto the emperor: Wherefore then doe you not allwell affirme and say that the papall dignitie take his originall rather from that councell, then by the emperors authoritie and power?

12 The pope taketh his originall from the emperors. 96. dist.

The thirteenth Article. No man would reasonably affirme (without relation) neither of himselfe nor of any other, that he is the head of any particular church. I answer: I confesse it to be written in my booke, and it followeth straight after: Albeit that through his good liuing, he ought to hope and trust that he is a member of the holy vniuersall church, the spouse of Jesus Christ, according to the saying of the Preacher: No man knoweth whether he be worthy and haue deserued grace and fauor, or hatred. And Luke the 17. When ye haue done all that ye can, say that you are vnprofitable seruants.

13 The pope is not the head of any particular church.

The fourteenth Article. It ought not to be beleeued that the pope, whatsoeuer he be, may be the head of any particular church, vnlesse he be predestinat or ordained of God. I answer, that I do acknowledge this proposition to be mine, and this is easie to proue, forsomuch as it is necessary that the christian faith should be deprawed, forsomuch as the church was deceiued by Peter, as it appeareth by S. Augustine.

The fifteenth Article. The popes power as Vicar, is but vaine and nothing worth, if he doe not conforme and addresse his life according to Jesus Christ, and not follow the maners of S. Peter. I answer, that it is thus in my booke; that it is meet and conuenient that he which is ordained vicar, should addresse and frame himselfe in maners and conditions, to the authority of him which did put him in place. And John Hus said moreouer before the whole councell: I vnderstand that the power and authority in such a pope as doth not represent the maners of Christ, is fruitlesse and void, as touching the merit and reward, which he should obtaine and get thereby, and doth not get the same: but not as concerning his office. Then certaine others standing by, asked of him saying; Where is that glosse in your booke? John Hus answered, You shall finde it in my treatise against maister Paletz: whereat all the assistance (looking one vpon another) began to smile and laugh.

15 The popes power vaine.

Distinction of merit and of office.

The fifteenth Article. The pope is most holy, not because he doth supply and hold the rowme and place of S. Peter, but because he hath great reuenewes. I answer, that my words are mutilate, for thus it is written: He is not most holy because he is called the vicar of S. Peter, or because he hath great and large possessions: but if he be the follower of Jesus Christ in humility, gentlenes, patience, labor and trauell, and in perfect loue and charity.

16 Holinesse commeth not by lording but by following.

The seuenteenth Article. The cardinals are not the manifest and true successors of the other Apostles of Jesus Christ, if they liue not according to the fashion of the Apostles, keeping the commandements and ordinances of the Lord Jesus. I answer, that it is thus written in my booke, and it proueth it self sufficiently: For if they enter in by another way then by the doze, which is the Lord Jesus, they be murtherers and theeues.

17 The cardinals be not the successors of the Apostles.

Then said the cardinall of Cambray: Behold both this and all other Articles before rehearsed, he hath written much more detestable things in his booke then is presented in his articles. Truly John Hus thou hast kept no order in thy sermons and writings. Had it not been your part to haue applied your remonstrances according to your audience? For to what purpose was it, or what did it profit you before the people to preach against the cardinals, when as none of them were present? It had been meeter for you to haue told them their faults before them all, then before the laity. Then answered John Hus: Reuerend father, father, for so much as I did see many priests and other learned men present at my sermons, for their sakes I spake those words. Then said the cardinall, thou hast done very ill, for by such kind of talke thou hast disturbed and troubled the whole state of the church.

The eighteenth Article; An heretike ought not to be committed to the secular powers to be put to death, for it is sufficient onely that he abide and suffer the ecclesiasticall censure. These are my words: That they might be ashamed of their cruell sentence and iudgement, specially forsomuch as Jesus Christ, bishop both of the old and new testament, would not iudge such as were disobedient by ciuill iudgement, neither condemne them to bodily death. As touching the first point; it may be euidently seene in the 12. chapter of S. Luke. And for the second it appeareth also by the woman which was taken in adultery, of whom it is spoken in the eighth chapter of S. John. And it is said in the eighteenth chapter of S. Matthew; If thy brother haue offended thee, &c. Marke therefore what I doe say: That an heretike whatsoeuer he be, ought first to be instructed and taught with christian loue and gentleness by the holy scriptures, and by the reasons drawne and taken out of the same, as S. Augustine and others haue done, disputing against the heretikes. But if there were any which after all these gentle and louing admonitions and instructions, would not cease from or leaue off their stiffnesse of opinions, but obstinately resist against the truth, such, I say, ought to suffer corporall or bodily punishment.

As soone as John Hus had spoken those things, the Iudges read in his booke a certaine clause, wherein he seemed grieuously to inueigh against them which deliuered an heretike vnto the secular power, not being confuted or convicted of heresie, and compared them vnto the high Priests, Scribes and Pharisies, which said vnto Pilat; It is not lawfull for vs to put any man to death, and deliuered Christ vnto him: and yet notwithstanding according vnto Christs owne witnesse, they were greater murtherers then Pilat: For he, said Christ, which hath deliuered me vnto thee, hath committed the greatest offence. Then the cardinals and bishops made a great noise, and demanded of John Hus, saying; Who are they that thou dost compare or assimule vnto the Pharisies? Then he said, all those which deliuered vp any innocent vnto the ciuill sword, as the Scribes and Pharisies deliuered Jesus Christ vnto Pilat. No, no, said they againe, for all that, you spake here of bishops. And the cardinall of Cambray, according to his accustomed manner said: Truly they which haue made and gathered these articles, haue vsed great lenity and gentlenesse, for his writtings are much more detestable and horrible.

The nineteenth Article. The nobles of the world ought to constraine and compell the ministers of the church to obserue and keepe the law of Jesus Christ. I answere, that it standeth thus word for word in my booke: Those which be on our part doe preach and affirme that the church militant, according to the parts which the Lord hath ordained, is diuided, and constituted in these parts: That is to say: Ministers of the church, which should keep purely and sincerely the ordinances and commandements of the sonne of God, and the nobles of the world that should compell and bring them to keepe the commandements of Jesus Christ, and of the common people, seruing to both these parts and ends, according to the institution and ordinance of Jesus Christ.

The twentith Article. The ecclesiasticall obedience, is a kind of obedience, which the priests and monks haue inuented without any expresse authority of the holy scriptures. I answer and confesse, that those words are thus written in my booke: I say, that there be three kinds of obedience, spirituall, secular and ecclesiasticall. The spirituall obedience is that which is onely due according to the law and ordinance of God, vnder the which the Apostles of Jesus Christ did line, and all christians ought for to line. The secular obedience is that which is due according to the ciuill lawes and ordinances. The ecclesiasticall obedience is such as the priests haue inuented, without any expresse authority of Scripture. The first kind of obedience doth vtterly exclude from it all euill, as well on his part which giueth the commandement, as on his also which doth obey the same. And of this obedience it is spoken in the 24. chapter of Deut. Thou shalt doe all that which the priests of the kindred of Leui shall teach and instruct thee, according as I haue commanded them.

The twenty one Article. He that is excommunicated by the pope, if he refuse and forsake the iudgement of the pope and the generall councell, and appealeth vnto Jesus Christ, after he hath made his appellation all the excommunications and curses of the pope cannot annay or hurt him. I answere, that I doe not acknowledge this proposition; but indeed I did make my complaint in my book, that they had both done me, & such as fauoured me great wrong, and that they refuse to heare me in the popes court. For after the death of one pope, I did appeale to his successor, and all that did profit me nothing. And to appeale from the pope to the councell, it were too long, and that were euen as much as if a man in trouble should seeke an vncertaine remedy. And therefore last of all I haue appealed to the head of the church my Lord Jesus Christ, for he is much more excellent and better, then any pope, to discusse and determine matters and causes, forsomuch as he cannot erre, neither yet hath iniustice to him that doth aske or require it in a iust cause, neither can he condemne the innocent. Then spake the cardinall of Cambray vnto him, and said; Wilt thou presume aboue Saint Paul, who appeales vnto the emperor, and not vnto Jesus Christ? John Hus answered: Forsomuch then as I am the first that doe it, am I therefore to be reputed and counted an heretike? And yet notwithstanding, S. Paul did not appeale vnto the emperor of his owne motion or will, but by the will of Christ, which spake vnto him by reuelation and said: Be firme and constant, for thou must goe vnto Rome. And as he was about to rehearse his appeale againe, they mocked him.

¶ Forsomuch as mention here is made of the appeale of the said Hus, it seemeth good here to shew the manner and forme thereof.

The copie and tenor of the appeale of John Hus.

FOrasmuch as the most mighty Lord, one in essence, three in person, is both the chiefe and first, and also the last and vttermost refuge of all those which are oppressed, and that he is the God which defendeth verity and truth throughout all generations, doing iustice to such as bee wronged, being ready and at hand to all those which call vpon him in verity and truth, vnbinding those that are bound: and fulfilling the desires of all those which honor and feare him, defending and keeping all those that loue him, and vtterly destroying and bringing to ruine the stiffenecked and vnpenitent sinner, and that the Lord Jesus Christ very God and man, being in great anguish compassed in with the Priests, Scribes and Pharisies, wicked Iudges and witnesses, willing by the most bitter and ignominious death, to redeeme the chosen children of God, before the foundation of the world, from euerlasting damnation; hath left behind him this godly example for a memory vnto them which should come after him, to the intent they should commit all their causes into the hands of God, who can doe all things, and knoweth and seeth all things, saying in this maner: O Lord, behold my affliction, for my enemy hath prepared himselfe against me, and thou art my protector & defender. O Lord thou hast giuen me vnderstanding, and I haue acknowledged thee: thou hast opened vnto me all their enterprises; & for mine owne part I haue been as a meeke lambe which is led vnto sacrifice, and haue not resisted against them. They haue wrought their enterprises vpon me, saying: Let vs put wood in his bread, and let vs banish him out of the land of the liuing, that his name be no more spoken of nor had in memory. But thou O Lord of hosts, which iudgest iustly and seest the deuices and imaginations of their hearts, hasten thee to take vengeance vpon them, for I haue manifested my cause vnto thee, forsomuch as the number of those which trouble me is great, and haue counselled together, saying: The Lord hath forsaken him, pursue him & catch him. O Lord my God, behold their doings, for thou art my patience; deliuer me from mine enemies, for thou art my God: doe not separate thy selfe far from me, forsomuch as tribulation is at hand, and there is no man which will succor me. My God my God looke downe vpon me, wherefore hast thou forsaken me? So many dogs haue compassed me in, and the company of the wicked haue besieged mee round about, for they haue spoken against mee with deceitfull tongues, and haue compassed me in with words full of despite, and haue enforced me without cause. In stead of loue towards me, they haue slandered me, and haue recompenced me with euill for good, and in place of charity they haue conceiued hatred against me.

Wherefore behold I staying my selfe vpon this most holy and fruitfull example of my Sauiour and redeemer, doe appeale before God for this my griefe and hard oppression from this most wicked sentence and iudgement, and the excommunication determined by the Bishops, Scribes, Pharisies, and Iudges, which sit in Moises seat, and resigne my cause wholly vnto him; so as the holy Patriarke of Constantinople John Chrysostome, appealed twice from the councell of the bishops and clergy; and Andrew bishop of Prage, and Robert bishop of Lincoln, appealed vnto the soueraigne and most iust Iudge, the which is not defiled with cruelty, neither can bee be corrupted with gifts and rewards, neither yet bee deceiued by false witnesse. Also I desire greatly that all the faithfull seruants of Jesus Christ, and especially the princes, barons, knights, esquires, and all other which inhabit our country of Boheme, should vnderstand and know these things, and haue compassion vpon me, which am so greeuously oppressed by the excommunication which is out against me, the which was obtained and gotten by the instigation and procurement of Michael de Causis my great enemy, and by the consent and furtherance of the canons of the cathedrall church of Prage, and giuen and granted out by Peter of Saint Angels, deane of the church of Rome, and cardinall, and also ordained Iudge by pope John xxiij. who hath continued almost these two yeeres, and would giue no audience vnto my aduocates and procurators, which they ought not to deny: no not to a Iew or Pagan, or to any heretike whatsoeuer he were) neither yet would he receiue any reasonable excuse for that I did not appeare personally, neither would he accept the testimonials of the whole Vniuersity of Prage with the seale hanging at it, or the writings of the syvorne Notaries, and such as were called vnto witnesse. By this all men may euidently perceiue, that I haue not incurred any fault or crime of contumacie or disobedience, forsomuch as that I did not appeare in the court of Rome, was not for any contempt, but for reasonable causes.

And moreouer, forsomuch as they had laid ambushments for mee on euery side by waies where I should passe, and also because the perils and dangers of others, haue made mee the more circumspect and aduised, and forsomuch as my procurers were willing and consented to binde themselues euen to abide the punishment of the fire, to answere to all such as would oppose or lay anything against me in the court of Rome; as also because they did imprison my lawfull procurator in the said court, without any cause, demerit, or fault, as I suppose. For somuch then as the order and disposition of all ancient lawes, as well diuine of the old and new testament, as also of the canon lawes, is this, that the Iudges should resort vnto the place where the crime or fault is committed or done, and thereto enquire of all such crimes as shall be obiected and laid against him which is accused, or slandered, and that of such men as by conuersation haue some knowledge or vnderstanding of the party so accused (the which may not be the euill willers or enemies of him which is so accused or slandered: but must bee men of an honest conuersation, no common quarrell pickers or accusers, but seruent louers of the law of God) and finally, that there should be a fit and meet place appointed, whither as the accused party might without danger or perill, resort or come, and that the iudge and witnesses should not be enemies vnto him that is accused: And also forsomuch as it is manifest, that all these conditions were wanting and lacking, as touching my appearance for the safegard of my life, I am excused before God from the friuolous pretended obstinacie and excommunication. Wherupon I John Hus doe present and offer this my appeale vnto my Lord Jesu Christ, my iust Iudge, who knoweth and defendeth, and iustly iudgeth euery mans iust and true cause.

The twenty two article. A vicious and naughty man liueth viciously and naughtily; but a vertuous and godly man liueth vertuously and godly. I answere: My words are these: That the diuision of all humane works is in two parties, that is, that they be either vertuous, or vicious: for somuch as it doth appeare, that if any man be vertuous and godly, and that he do any thing, he doth it then vertuously and godly. And contrariwise, if a man be vicious and naught, that which he doth is vicious and naught. For as vice, which is called crime or offence, and thereby vnderstand deadly sinne, doth vniuersally infect or depraue all the acts and doings of the subiect, that is, of the man which doth them: so likewise vertue and godlinesse doth quicken all the acts and doings of the vertuous and godly man: in somuch, that he being in the state of grace, is said to pray and do good works euen sleeping, as it were by a certaine meanes working: as Saint Augustine, Saint Gregory, and diuers other affirme. And it appeareth in the sixth chapter of Luke: If thine eye, that is to say, the mind or intention be simple, not depraued with the peruersitie of any sinne or offence, all the whole body, that is to say, all the acts and doings shall be cleere and shining, that is, acceptable and gratefull vnto God. But if thine eye be euill, the whole body is darkened. And in the second to the Corinthians, 10. chapter: All things that you doe, doe them to the glory of God. And likewise in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, and last chapter, it is said: Let all your doings be done with charity. Wherefore all kind of life and liuing according vnto charity, is vertuous and godly: and if it be without charity, it is vicious and euill. This saying may well be proued out of the 23. chapter of Deuteronomy, where God speaketh vnto the people, that he that keepeth his commandements, is blessed in the house and in the field, out going, and in comming, sleeping and waking: but he that doth not keepe his commandements, is accursed in the house and in the field, in going out and in comming in, sleeping and waking, &c. The same also is euident by S. Augustine vpon the Psal. where he writeth; that a good man in all his doings doth praise the Lord. And Gregory saith, that the sleep of saints and holy men doth not lacke their merit. How much more then his doings which proceed of good zeale, be not without reward, and consequently be vertuous and good? And contrariwise it is vnderstood of him which is in deadly sinne, of whom it is spoken in the law, that whatsoeuer the vncleane man doth touch, is made vncleane.

To this end doth that also appertaine which is before repeated out of the first of Malachi. And Gregory in the first booke and first question, saith: We do defile the bread, which is the body of Christ, when as we come vnworthily to the table, and when we being defiled, doe drinke his bloud. And Saint Augustine vpon the 146. Psalme, saith: If thou doest exceed the due measure of nature, and doest not abstaine from gluttony, but gorge thy selfe vp with drunkennes, whatsoeuer laud or praise thy tongue doth speake of the grace and fauor of God, thy life doth blaspheme the same. When he had made an end of this article, the cardinall of Cambray said: The Scripture saith that we be all sinners. And againe; If we say we haue no sinne, we deceiue our selues, and so we should aliuates liue in deadly sinne. John Hus answered: The Scripture speaketh in that place of veniall sinnes, the which doe not vtterly expell or put away the habit of vertue from a man, but doe all ariate themselues together. And a certaine Englishman whose name was Wi. said: But those sinnes doe not associate themselues with any act morally good. John Hus alledged against Saint Augustines place vpon 146. Psalme; the which when he rehearsed, they all with one mouth said; What makes this to the purpose?

The twenty three article. The minister of Christ living according to his law, and hauing the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Scriptures, and an earnest desire to edifie the people, ought to preach, notwithstanding the pretended excommunication of the pope. And moreouer, if the pope or any other ruler doe forbid any priest or minister so disposed, not to preach, that he ought not to obey him. I answere, that these are my words: That albeit the excommunication were either threatned or come out against him, in such sort that a Christian ought not to doe the commandements of Christ, it appeareth by the words of Saint Peter and the other Apostles, that we ought rather to obey God then man. Thereupon it followeth, that the minister of Christ liuing according vnto his law, &c. ought to preach notwithstanding any pretended excommunication. For it is euident that it is commanded vnto the ministers of the church to preach the word of God, Acts 5. God hath commanded vs to preach and testifie vnto the people, as by diuers other places of the Scripture, and the holy fathers, rehearsed in my treatise, it doth appeare more at large. The second part of this article followeth in my treatise in this manner.

By this it appeareth, that for a minister to preach, and a rich man to giue almes, are not indifferent works, but duties and commandements. Whereby it is further euident, that if the pope or any other ruler of the church doe command any minister appointed to preach, or a rich man disposed so to giue almes, not to giue, that they ought not to obey him. And he added moreouer, to the intent that you may vnderstand me the better, I call that a pretended excommunication, the which is vniustly disordered and giuen forth, contrary to the order of the law and Gods commandements. For the which the meete minister appointed thereunto, ought not to cease from preaching, neither yet to feare damnation.

Then they obiected vnto him, that he had said that such kind of excommunications were rather blessings. Clerik, said Hus, euen so I do now say againe, that euery excommunication, by the which a man is vniustly excommunicat, is vnto him a blessing afore God: according to that saying of the Prophet: I will curse where as you blesse: and contrariwise, they shall curse, but thou O Lord shalt blesse. Then the cardinall of Florence, which had alwaies a Notary ready at his hand to write such things as he commanded him, said: The law is, that euery excommunication, be it neuer so vniust, ought to be feared. It is true, said John Hus: for I doe remember eight causes, for the which excommunication ought to be feared. Then said the cardinall; Is there no more but eight? It may be, said John Hus, that there be more.

The twenty foure article. Euery man which is admitted vnto the ministery of the church, receiueth also by speciall commandement, the office of a preacher, and ought to execute and fulfill that commandement, notwithstanding any excommunication pretended to the contrary. The answere: My words are these: For so much as it doth appeare by that which is aforesaid, that whosoeuer commeth, or is admitted vnto the ministery, receiueth also by especiall commandement, the office of preaching, he ought to fulfill that commandement, any excommunication to the contrary pretended notwithstanding. Also no Christian ought to doubt but that a man sufficiently instructed in learning, is more bound to counsell and instruct the ignorant, to teach those which are in doubt, to chastise those which are vntruly, and to remit and forgiue those that doe him iniury: then for to doe any other works of mercy. Forsomuch then as he that is rich and hath sufficient, is bounden vnder the paine of damnation, to minister and giue corporall and bodily almes, as appeareth in the twenty fiue chapter of Matthew: how much more is he bound to doe spirituall almes?

The twenty fiue article. The ecclesiasticall censures are antichristian, such as the clergy haue inuented for their owne preferment, and for the bondage and seruitude of the common people. Thereby if the laity be not obedient vnto the clergy at their will and pleasure, it doth multiply their contousnesse, defordeth their malice, and prepareth a way for antichrist. Where by it is an euident figure and token, that such censures proceede from antichrist; the which censures in their processes they doe call Fulminations or lightnings, wherethy the clergy doth chiefely preceed against such as doe manifest and open the wickednesse of antichrist, which thrust themselues into the office of the clergie. These things are contained in the last chapter chapter of his treatise of the Church. I answere, and I deny that it is in that forme. But the matter thereof is largely handled in the 23. chapter. And in the examination of the audience, they haue gathered certaine clauses most contrary thereunto. The which when they had read, the cardinall of Cambray renewed his old song, saying: Truely these are much more grieuous and offensiue, then the articles which are gathered.

The twenty sixth Article. There ought no interditement to be appointed vnto the people, for so much as Christ the high bishop, neither for Iohn Baptist, neither for any iniury that was done vnto him, did make any interditement. My words are these: When as I complained, that for one ministers sake, an interditement was giuen out, and thereby all good men ceased from the land and praise of God. And Christ the high bishoppe, notwithstanding that the Prophet was taken and kept in prison, then whom there was no greater amongst the children of men, did not giue out any curse or interditement, neither when hee was layd beheaded him, neither when hee himselfe was spoiled, beaten, and blasphemed of the Souldiours, Scribes and Pharisies, he did not then curse them, but prayed for them, and taught his Disciples to doe the same, as it appeareth in the fifth chapter of Saint Matthew. And Christs first vicar following the same doctrine and learning, saith in his first Epistle of Saint Peter, and the second chapter: Hereunto are ye called: For Christ hath suffered for vs, leauing vs an example that we should follow his steppes, who when hee was cursed and euill spoken of, did not curse again. And Saint Paul following the same order and way in the twelfth chapter of the Romans saith: Bleese them that persecute you. There were besides these many other places of scripture recited in that booke; but they being omitted, these were only rehearsed, which did helpe or preuaile to stir vp or moue the Iudges minds.

Christ interdited none, but prayed for all.

Rom. 12.

And these are the articles which are alleged out of Iohn Hus his booke intituled, Of the Church.

Other Articles moreouer out of other his bookes were collected, and forced against him, first out of his treatise written against Steuen Paletz, to the number of seuen articles. Also sir other articles drained out of his treatise against Stanislaus Znopma. Thereunto his answers likewise be adioyned, not vntruitfull to be read.

¶ Heere follow seuen Articles, which are said to be drawne out of his Treatise which he wrote against Stephen Paletz.

Articles drawn out of the treatise written against Steuen Paletz.

THe first article. If the pope, bishop, or prelat be in deadly sinne, he is then no pope, bishop, nor prelat. The answer: I grant thereunto, and I send you vnto Saint Augustine, Ierome, Chrysostome, Gregory, Cyprian, and Bernard; the which doe say moreouer, that whosoeuer is in deadly sinne, is no true christian, how much lesse then is he pope, or bishop? of whom it is spoken by the Prophet Amos in his eighth chapter: They haue raigned and ruled, and not through me; they became princes, and I knew them not, &c. But afterward I doe grant that a wicked pope, bishop, or priest, is an vnworthy minister of the sacrament, by whom God doth baptise, consecrate, or otherwise worke to the profit of his church; and this is largely handled in the tert of the booke by the authorities of the holie doctors: for euen hee which is in deadly sinne, is not worthy a king before God, as it appeareth in the first booke of Kings, the fifteenth chapter. Where as God saith vnto Saul by the Prophet Samuel, saying: Forsomuch as thou hast refused and cast off my word, I will also refuse and cast thee off, that thou shalt be no more king. Whiles these things were thus intreating, the emperor looking out at a certaine windowe of the cloister, accompanied with the Countie Palatine, and the Burgraue of Norenberg, conferring and talking much of Iohn Hus: at length he said, that there was neuer a worse or more pernicious heretike then hee. In the meane while, when Iohn Hus had spoken these woords, as touching the worthy king, by and by the emperour was called, and hee was commanded to repeate those words againe; which after that hee had done, his tutor therein being confounded, the emperor answered: A man, saith hee, doth liue without fault. Then the cardinall of Cambray being in a great furie said: Is it not enough for vs, that thou doest contemne and despise the ecclesiasticall state, and goest about by thy writings and doctrine to peruerte and trouble the same, but that now also thou wilt attempt to throw kings out of their state and dignity? Then Paletz began to alledge the lawes whereby he would proue that Saul was king, euen when those woords were spoken by Samuel, and therefore that Dauid did forbid that Saul should not bee slaine, not for the holinesse of his life, the which there was none in him, but for the holinesse of his annointing. And whereas Iohn Hus repeated out of Saint Cyprian, that hee did take vpon him the name of Christian: in vaine, which did not follow Christ in his liuing; Paletz answered: Behold and see what a folly is in this man, which alledgeth those things which make nothing for the purpose: for albeit any man be not a true christian, is hee not therefore true pope, bishoppe, or king? Whereas these are natures of office, and to be a christian is a name of merit and desert; and so may any man be a true pope, bishoppe, or king, although he be no true christian. Then said Iohn Hus; Ipope Iohn the 23. were a true pope, wherefore haue yee deprriued him of his office? The emperor answered: The lords of the Councell haue now lately agreed thereupon that he was true pope: but for his notorious and manifest euill doings, wherewithall he did offend and trouble the church of God, and did spoile and bring to raine the power thereof, he is reiected and cast out of his office.

The second article. The grace of predestination is the bond whereby the body of the church, and euery part and member thereof is strictly knit and ioyned vnto the head. The answere: I acknowledge this article to bee mine, and it is pzued in the tert out of the eighth chapter to the Romans; Who shall separate vs from the charity and loue of Christ? &c. And in the tenth chapter of Iohn: My sheepe heare my voice, and I know them, and they follow mee, and I giue them eternall life, neither shall they perish eternally, neither is there any man which shall take them out of my hands. This is the knot of the body of the church, and of our spirituall head Christ, vnderstanding the church to be the congregation of the predestinate.

The third article. If the pope bee a wicked man, and specially a reprobate, then euen as Iudas the Apostle, hee is a Diuell, a Theefe, and the Sonne of perdition, and not the head of the holy militant church, for so much as hee is no part or member thereof. The answere: My woords are thus: If the pope bee an euill or wicked man, and specially if hee bee a reprobate; then euen as Iudas, so is hee a diuell, a theefe, and the sonne of perdition. Now then is hee the head of the holy militant church? Whereas he is not truely no member or part thereof: for if he were a member of the holy church, then should hee be also a member of Christ; and if hee were a member of Christ, then should hee cleaue and sticke vnto Christ by the grace of Predestination and present iustice, and should bee one spirit with God, as the Apostle saith in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, the sixth chapter: Know yee not that your bodies are the members of Christ?

The fourth article. An euill pope or prelat, or reprobate is no true pastor, but a theefe and a robber. The answere: The tert of my booke is thus: If he be euill or wicked, then is he an hireling, of whom Christ speaketh; he is no shepheard, neither are the sheepe his owne. Therefore when he seeth the wolfe comming, he runneth away, and forsaketh the sheepe: and so finally doth euery wicked and reprobate man. Therefore euery such reprobate, or wicked pope or prelat, is no true pastor; but a very theefe and a robber, as is more at large pzoued in my booke. Then said Iohn Hus: I doe so limit all things, that such as touching their desert, are not truly and worthily popes and shepheards before God, but as touching their office and reputation of men, they are popes, pastors, and priests.

Then a certaine man rising vp behind Iohn Hus clothed all in white, said: My lords, take heede least Iohn Hus deceiue both you, and himselfe with these his glosses, and looke whether these things bee in his booke or not; for of late I had disputation with him vpon these articles, in the which I said, that a wicked pope, &c. was no pope, as touching merit and desert, but as touching his office he was truly pope. Whereupon he vsed these glosses which hee had heard of me, and did not take them out of his booke. Then Iohn Hus turning himselfe vnto him, said: Did you not heare that it was so read out of my booke? and this did easily appeare in Iohn the twenty three, whether he were true pope, or a very theefe and robber. Then the bishoppes and cardinals looking one vpon another, said: that he was a true pope, and laughed Iohn Hus to scorne.

The fifth. The pope is not, neither ought to be called according vnto his office, most holy: for then the king ought also to be called most holy, according to his office. Also the tormentors, lictors, and diuels, ought also to be called holy. The answere: My woords are otherwise placed in this manner; So ought a faithfull man, that if any man be a most holy father, then he doth most holily obserue and keepe his fatherlinesse: and if he be a naughty and wicked father, then doth he most wickedly keepe the same. Likewise, if the bishop be most holie, then is hee also most good; and whereas he saith that he is pope, it is the name of his office.

Thereupon it followeth, that the man which is pope, being an euill and reprobate man, is a most holy man: and consequently by that his office, he is most good. And forsomuch as no man can be good by his office, except he doe exercise and vse the same his office very well: it followeth that if the pope be an euill and reprobate man, he cannot exercise or vse his office well. Forsomuch as he cannot vse the office well, except he be morally good: Mat. 12. How can you speak good things, when you your selues are euill? And immediatly after it followeth: If the pope by reason of

of his office be called most holy, wherefore should not the king of Romans be called most holy, by reason of his office and dignitie? Whereas the king according vnto Saint Augustines mind, representeth the Deitie and Godhead of Christ, and the priest representeth only his humanitie. Wherefore also should not Iudges, yea euen Iomenters be called holie, for so much as they haue their office by ministring vnto the church of Christ? These things are more at large discoursed in my booke; but I cannot find or know, saith Iohn Hus, any foundation whereby I should call the pope most holy, when as this is only spoken of Christ: Thou only art most holy: Thou only art the Lord, &c. Should I then truly call the pope most holy?

The sixth article: If the pope line contrarie vnto Christ, albeit he be lawfully and canonicallie elect and chosen, according to humane election, yet doth he abcend and come in another way then by Christ. The answere: The text is thus; If the pope liue contrarie vnto Christ in pride and auarice, how then doth he not abcend and come another way into the sheepefold, then by the lowlie and meeke waye our Lord Iesus Christ? But admit as you say, that he did abcend by lawfull election, the which I call an election principally made of God, and not according vnto the common and vulgar constitution and ordinances of men, yet for all that, it is affirmed and proued that he should abcend and come in another way; for Iudas Iscariot was truely and lawfullie chosen of the Lord Iesus Christ vnto his bishoppike, as Christ saith in the sixth of Iohn, and yet hee came in another way into the sheepefold, and was a theefe and a Diuell, and the sonne of perdition. Did he not come in another way? when as our Sauiour spake thus of him, he that eateth bread with me, shall lift vp his heele against me.

The same also is proued by Saint Bernard vnto pope Eugenius. Then said Paletz: Behold the furie and madnesse of this man; for what more furious or madde thing can there be then to say, Iudas is chosen by Christ, and notwithstanding hee did abcend another way, and not by Christ? Iohn Hus answered, he like both partes are true, that hee was elect and chosen by Christ, and also that he did abcend, and came in another way, for he was a theefe, a Diuell, and the sonne of perdition. Then said Paletz, cannot a man be truelie and lawfullie chosen pope or bishop, and afterward liue contrarie vnto Christ? And that notwithstanding, he doth not abcend ante other wayes. But I, said Iohn Hus, doe say that whosoeuer doth enter into any bishoppike or like office by simonie, not to the intent to labour and trauell in the church of God, but rather to liue delicately, voluptuously and vnrighteously, and to the intent to aduance himselfe with all kind of pride, euery such man abcendeth and commeth vp by another way, and accoding vnto the Gospell, he is a theefe and a robber.

The seuenth article: The condemnation of the fortie fiue articles of Iohn Wicklisse made by the doctours is vnreasonable and wicked, and the cause by them alleaged is fained and vntrue: That is to say, that none of those articles are catholike, but that euerie of them be either heretical, erroneous or offensiue. The answere: I haue written it thus in my Treatise: The fortie and fiue articles are condemned for this cause, that none of those fortie and fiue, is a catholike article, but each of them is either heretical, erroneous or offensiue.

The cardinall of Cambray.

O maister Doctour, where is your proofe? you faine a cause which you do not proue, &c. As it appeareth more at large in my treatise. Then said the cardinall of Cambray, Iohn Hus, thou didest say that thou wouldest not defend anie errour of Iohn Wicklisses. And now it appeareth in your bookes, that you haue openly defended his articles. Iohn Hus answered: Reuerend Father, euen as I said before, so do I now say againe, that I will not defend any errours of Iohn Wicklisses, neither of anie other mans: but for so much as it seemed vnto mee to bee against conscience, simplie to consent vnto the condemnation of them, no Scripture being alleaged or brought contrarie and against them, thereupon I would not consent or agree vnto the condemnation of them: And for so much as the reason which is copulatiue cannot bee verified in euerie point, according to euerie part thereof.

Articles drawn out of his treatise written against Stanislaus de Znopma.

NOw there remaine sixe articles of thirtie nine: These are said to be drawne out of another treatise which he wrote against Stanislaus de Znopma.

The first article: Noman is lawfully elect or chosen, in that the Electours or the greater part of them haue consented with a liuely voice according to the custome of men to elect and chuse any person, or that he is thereby the manifest and true successour of Christ, or vicar of Peter in the Ecclesiasticall office, but in that that any man doth most abundantlie worke meritoriouslie to the profit of the church, he hath thereby more abundant power giuen him of God thereunto. The answere: These things which follow are also written in my booke. It standeth in the power and hands of wicked Electours to chuse a woman into the Ecclesiasticall office, as it appeareth by the election of Agnes, which was called Iohn, who held and occupied the popes place and dignity by the space of two yeres and more.

It may also be that they do chuse a theefe, a murderer or a diuell, and consequently they may also elect and chuse Antichrist.

It may also be, that for loue, countenaunce, or hatred, they doe chuse some person whom God doth not allow. And it appeareth that that person is not lawfully elect and chosen: In so much as the Electours or the greater part of them haue consented and agreed together, according to the custome of men vpon any person, or that he is thereby the manifest successour or vicar of Peter the Apostle, or any other in the Ecclesiasticall office.

Therefore they which must accordingly vnto the Scripture do elect and chuse, reuelation being set apart, do only pronounce and determine by some probable reason vpon him they do elect and chuse, thereupon whether the Electours do so chuse god or euill, we ought to giue credit vnto the woykes of him that is chosen; for in that point that any man doth most abundantly worke meritoriously to the profit of the church, he hath thereby more abundant power giuen him of God thereunto. And hereupon saith Christ in the tenth of Iohn, giue credit vnto woykes.

The second article: The pope being a reprobate, is not the head of the holy church of God. The answere: I wrote it thus in my treatise, that I would willingly receiue a probable and effectuall reason of the Doctor, how this question is contrarie vnto the faith, to say, that if the pope be a reprobate, how is he the head of the holy church? Behold the truth cannot decay or faile in disputation, for did Christ dispute against the faith, when he demanded of the Scribes and Pharisies, Matthew the eleuenth, O ye stocke and offspring of vipers, how can yee speake good things, when you your selues are wicked and euill? And behold, I demand of the Scribes, if the pope be a reprobate, and the stocke of vipers, how is he the head of the holy Church of God, that the Scribes and Pharisies, which were in the councell house of Caiaphe make answere herein: For it is more possible that a reprobate man should speake good things, for so much as he may bee in state of grace according vnto present iustice, then to be the head of the holy church of God.

Also in the fifth of Iohn, our Sauiour complaineth vpon the Iewes, saying: How can you beleeue which do seeke for glorie amongst your selues, and do not seeke for the glorie that commeth only of God? And likewise doe complaine, how that if the pope be a reprobate, can he be the head of the church of God, which receiueth his glorie of the world, and seeketh not for the glorie of God? For it is more possible that the pope being a reprobate should beleeue, then that he should be the head of the church of God: For so much as he taketh his glorie of the world.

The third article: There is no sparke of apparance, that there ought to be one head in the spiritualtie, to rule the church, the which should bee alwaies conuersant with the militant church. The answere: I do grant it. For what consequent is this, The king of Bohemie is head of the kingdome of Bohemie: Ergo, the pope is head of the whole militant church? Christ is the head of the spiritualtie, ruling and gouerning the militant church by much more and greater necessitie then Cesar ought to rule the temporaltie. For so much as Christ sitteth on the right hand of God the Father, both necessarilie rule the militant church as head. And there is no sparke of apparance that there should be one head in the spiritualtie ruling the church, that should alwaies be conuersant with the militant church, except some infidell would heretically affirme, that the militant church should haue heere a permanent and continuall citie or dwelling place, and not to enquire and seeke after that which is to come. It is also further endent in my booke, how inconsequent the proportion of the similitude is for a reprobate pope to be the head of the militant church, and a reprobate king to be the head of the kingdome of Bohemie.

The fourth article: Christ would better rule his church by his true Apostles dispersed throughout the whole world without such monstrous heads. Answere, that it is in my text, as heere followeth, that albeit that the Doctour doth say, that the bodie of the militant church, is oftentimes without a head; yet notwithstanding we do verily beleeue that Christ Iesus is the head ouer euery church, ruling the same without lacke or default, powring vpon the same a continual motion and sense, euen vnto the latter day: neither can the Doctor giue a reason why the church in the time of Agnes, by the space of two yeres and fiue monethes, liuing according to many members of Christ in grace and fauour, but that by the same reason, the church might be without a head, by the space of many yeres. For so much as Christ should better rule his church by his true Disciples dispersed throughout the whole world, without such monstrous heads. Then said they all together, Behold now hee prophesieth. And Iohn Hus againe further prosecuting his former talke said, but I say that the church in the time of the Apostles was far better ruled and gouerned then now it is. And what doth let and hinder that Christ should not now also rule the same better by his true Disciples without such monstrous heads, as haue been now a late? For behold euen at this present we haue no such head, and yet Christ easilie doth rule his church. When he had spoken these wordes, he was derided and mocked.

The fifth article: Peter was no vniuersall pastor: or shepheard of the sheepe of Christ, much lesse is the bishop of Rome. The answere: These words are not in my booke, but those which do follow. Secondly, it appeareth by the words of Christ, that he did not limit vnto Peter for his iurisdiction, the whole world, no not one only prouince. So likewise neither vnto any other of the apostles. Notwithstanding certaine of them walked through many regions, and otherwhile sower, preaching and teaching the kingdome of God, as Paul which laboured and trauelled more then all the rest, did corporally visit and conuert most prouinces, whereby it is lawfull for any apostle or his vicar to conuert and confirme as much people, or as many prouinces in the faith of Christ, as they are able, neither is there any restraint of their libertie or iurisdiction: but only by disabilitie or insufficiencie.

The sixth article: The Apostles and other faithfull priests of the Lord haue sourly ruled the church in all things necessarie vnto saluation before the office of the pope was brought into the church, and so would they verie possible do still, if there were no pope euen vnto the latter day. Then they all cried out against and said; Behold the prophet. But Iohn Hus said, seeing it is true that the apostles did rule the church stoutly, before the office of the pope was brought into the church. And certainlie a great deale better then it is now ruled. And likewise may other faithfull men which do follow their steps do the same, for as now we haue no pope, and so peraduenture it may continue and endure a peece or more. Besides this were brought against him other nine & twentie articles, obiected vnto him being in prison, which with his answeres to the same here likewise follow. Of the which articles, the first is this:

The first article: Paul according vnto present iustice was a blasphemer and none of the church, and therewithall was in grace, according vnto predestination of life euerlasting. The answere: This proposition is not in the booke, but this which followeth: Thy reby it doth seeme probable, that as Paul was both a blasphemer according to present iustice, and therewithall also was a faithfull child of our holy mother the church, and in grace according to predestination of life euerlasting: So Iscariot was both in grace according vnto present iustice, and was neuer of our holy mother the church, according to the predestination of life euerlasting, for so much as he lacked that predestination. And so Iscariot albeit he was an apostle, and a bishop of Christ, which is the name of his office, yet was he neuertheless no part of the vniuersall church.

The second article: Christ doth more loue a predestinate man being sinfull, then any reprobate is what grace possible soeuer he be. The answere: My words are in the fourth chapter of my booke intituled of the church, and it is euident that God doth more loue any predestinate being sinfull, then a mie reprobate, in what grace soeuer he be for the time: for so much as he will, that the predestinate shall haue perpetuall blessednesse, and the reprobate to haue eternall fire. Wherefore God partly infinitely loueth them both as his creatures, yet he doth more loue the predestinate because he gineth him greater grace, or a greater gift: that is to say, life euerlasting, which is greater and more excellent then only grace, according vnto present iustice. And the third article of those articles before, sounded much nere vnto this, that the predestinate cannot fall from grace, for they haue a certaine radicall grace rooted in them, although they be depriued of the abundant grace for a time. These things are true in the compound sense.

The third article. All the sinfull according vnto present iustice, are not faithfull, but do swarue from the true catholike faith, for so much as it is impossible that any man can commit any deadly sinne but in that point, that he doth swarue from the faith. The answere: I acknowledge that sentence to be mine, and it appeareth, that if they did thinke vpon the punishment which is to be laid vpon sinners, and did fully beleeue, and had the faith of the diuine knowledge and vnderstanding, &c. then vndoubtedly they would not so offend and sin. This proposition is verified by the saying of the prophet Esay; Thy rulers are vnfaithfull, mislouers, fellowes and companions of theeues, they all loue bribes, and follow after rewards. Behold the prophet calleth the rulers of ✠ church infidels for their offences, for all such as do not kepe their faith inuiolate vnto their principall Lord, are vnfaithfull seruants, and they also are vnfaithfull children which kepe not their obedience, feare, and loue vnto God their father.

Item, this proposition is verified, by the saying of the apostle, the first chapter to Titus: They doe confesse that they know God, but by their workes they do denie him. And for so much as they which are sinfull, doe swarue alway from the meritorious worke of blessednes, therefore they do swarue from the true faith grounded vpon charitie, for so much as faith without workes is dead. To this end doth also pertaine that which the Lord speaketh, Matth. 23. of the faithfull and vnfaithfull seruant.

The fourth article: These words of Iohn in his two and twentith chapter, Receiue the holy Ghost: and, Whatsoeuer you shall bind vpon earth, &c. And Matthew the sixteenth and eightenth chapter, for lacke of vnderstanding shall terrifie many christians, and they shall be wonderfully afraid, and others shall be deceiued by them, presuming vpon the fulnesse of their power and authoritie. The answere: This sentence I do approue and allow, and therefore I say in the same place, that it is fit of all to be supposed that the saying of our Sauiour is necessarie, as touching the vertue of the words, for as much as it is not possible for a priest to bind and lose, except that binding and losing be in heauen. But for the lacke of the true vnderstanding of those words, many simple christians shall be made afraid, thinking with themselues that whether they be iust or vniust, the priests may at their pleasures, whensoeuer they will, bind them. And the ignorant priests doe also presume and do take vpon them to haue power to bind and lose when soeuer they will. For manie foolish and ignorant priests do say that they haue power and authoritie to absolue euerie man confessing himselfe, of what sinne or offence soeuer it be, not knowing that in many sinnes it is forbidden them, and that it may happen that an hipocrite do confesse himselfe, or else one as is not contrite for his sinne, whereof peraduenture oftentimes been found, and it is euident, for so much as the letter doth kill, but the spirit doth quicken.

The fifth article: The binding and losing of God, is simple and plainly the chiefe and principall. The answere: This is euident, for so much as it were blasphemous presumption to affirme, that a man may remit and forgiue an euill fact or offence done against such a Lord, the Lord himselfe not approuing or allowing the same. For by the vniuersall power of the Lord, it is necessarie that he do first absolue and forgiue, before that his vicar doe the same; neither is there one article of our faith, which ought to be more common or knowne vnto vs, then that it should be impossible for any man of the militant church to absolue or bind, except in such case as it be conformable vnto the head of the church Iesu Christ. Wherefore euerie faithfull christian ought to take heed of that saying: if the pope or any other pretend by any manner of figure to bind or lose, that he is thereby bound or losed; for he that doth grant or confesse that, must also consequently grant and confesse that the pope is without sinne, and to that he is a God, for otherwise he must needs erre, and do contrarie vnto the keyes of Christ. Thus saying plainly the fact of the pope, who damnes in his absolution presupposeth contrition and confession. Peraduenture, if any letter of absolution be giuen vnto any offender, which doth not declare the circumstances of the offence which ought to be declared, it is said that thereby the letter of absolution is of no force and effect. It is also hereby euident, that manie priests doe not absolue those which are confessed, because that either through shamefastnesse they do cloake or hide greater offences, or else that they haue not due contrition or repentance, for vnto true absolution there is first required contrition. Secondly, a purpose and intent to sinne no more. Thirdly, true confession. And fourthly sledfast hope of forgiuenesse. The first appeareth by Ezechiel, If the wicked do repent him, &c. The second in the fifth and eighth of Iohn. Do thou not sinne any more. The third part by this place of Luke: Shew your selues vnto the priests. And the fourth is confirmed by the saying of Christ: Thy sonne beleeue, and thy sinnes are forgiuen thee. I also added many other probations in my treatise out of the holy fathers, Augustine, Jerome, and the master of the sentences.

The sixth article: The priests do gather and heape vp out of the Scriptures those things which serue for the bellie, but such as pertaine to the true imitation and following of Christ, that they reiect and refuse as impertinent vnto saluation. The answere: This Saint Gregorie doth sufficiently proue in his seuenteenth Homilie, alleaging the saying of Christ: The harueft is great, the workemen are few, speaking also that which we cannot say without griefe or sorrow, that albeit there be a great number which willingly heare good things, yet there lacke such as should declare the same vnto them; for, behold the world is full of priests, but notwithstanding there is a scarsitie of workemen in the harueft of the Lord. We take vpon vs to slinglie priesthood, but we do not fulfill and do the workes and office of priesthood. And immediatlie after he saith, We are fallen vnto outward affaires and businesse, for we take vpon vs one office for honor sake, and we doe exhibite and giue another to ease our selues of labour. We leaue preaching, and as farre as I can perceiue were are called bishops to our paine, which doe retaine the name of honor, but not the vertitie.

And immediatlie after he saith, We take no care for our flocke, we daily call vpon for our stipend and wages, we couet and desire earthly things with a greedie mind, we gape after worldly worldly glorie, we leaue the cause of God vndone, and make haste about our worldly affaires and businesse, we take vpon vs the place of sanctitie and holinesse, and we are wholly wrapped in worldlie cares and troubles, &c. This writeth Saint Gregorie, with manie other things more in the same place. Also in his Pastorall, in his Morals, and in his Register. Also Saint Bernard as in manie other places, so likewise in his 33. sermon vpon the Canticles, he saith, All friends, and all enemies; all kinsfolkes and aduersaries, all of one houshold, and no peace-makers: they are the Ministers of Christ, and serue Antichrist: they go honorable honored with the gods of the loin, and yet they be no honor, &c.

The seuenth article: The power of the pope, which doth follow Christ, is not to be feared. The answere: It is not so in my treatise, but contrariwise, that the subiects are bound willingly and gladly to obey the vertuous and good rulers, and also those which are wicked and euill. But notwithstanding, if the pope do abuse his power, it is not then to be feared as by bondage. And so the lords the cardinals, as I suppose, did not feare the power of Gregorie the twelfth before his depostition, when as they resisted him, saying that he did abuse his power contraric vnto his olme oth.

The eighth article: An euill and a wicked pope is not the successor of Peter, but of Iudas. The answere: I wrote thus in my treatise: If the pope be humble and meke, neglecting and despising the honors and lucre of the world: if he be a shepheard, taking his name by the feeding of the flocke of God (of the which feeding the Lord speaketh, saying: Feed my sheepe) if he feed the sheepe with the word, and with vertuous example, and that he become euen like his flocke with his whole heart and mind: if he doe diligently and carefullie labour and trauell for the church: then is he without doubt the true vicar of Christ. But if he walke contrarie vnto these vertues, for so much as there is no societie betweene Christ and Belial: and Christ himselfe saith, He that is not with me, is against me: how is he then the true vicar of Christ or Peter, and not rather the vicar of Antichrist? Christ called Peter himselfe Sathanas, when he did contrarie him but only in one word, and that with a good affection, euen him whom he had chosen his vicar, and specially appointed ouer his church: Why should not any other then, being more contrarie vnto Christ, be truelie called Sathanas, and consequently Antichrist, or at least the chiefe and principall minister or vicar of Antichrist? There be infinite testimonies of this matter in Saint Augustine, Saint Jerome, Cyprian, Chrysostome, Bernard, Gregorie, Remigius, and Ambrose, &c.

The ninth article: The pope is the same beast of whom it is spoken in the Apocalyps, power is giuen vnto him to make warre vpon the Saints. The answere: I denie this article to be in my booke.

The tenth article: It is lawfull to preach, notwithstanding the popes inhibition. The answere: The article is euident, for so much as the Apostles did preach contrarie to the commandement of the bishops of Jerusalem. And saint Hilarie did the like, contrarie to the commandement of the pope which was an Arrian. It is also manifest by the example of cardinals, which contrarie vnto the commandement of pope Gregorie the twelfth, sent throughout all realmes such as should preach against him. It is also lawfull to preach vnder appeale, contrarie vnto the popes commandement. And finally, he may preach which hath the commandement of God, wherevnto he ought chiefely to obey.

The eleuenth article: If the popes commandement be not concordant and agreable with the doctrine of the Gospell or the Apostles, it is not to be obeyed. The answere: I haue thus written in my booke: The faithfull disciple of Christ ought to weigh and consider whether the popes commandement be expresse and plainly the commandement of Christ or any of his Apostles, or whether it haue any foundation or ground in their doctrine or no: and that being once knowne or vnderstood, he ought reuerentlie and humblie to obey the same. But if he doe certainly know that the popes commandement is contrarie and against the holy Scripture, and huttfull vnto the church; then he ought boldly to resist against it, that he be not partaker of the crime and offence by consenting thereunto. This I haue handled at large in my treatise, and haue confirmed it by the authorities of Saint Augustine, Hierome, Gregorie, Chrysostome, Bernard, and Bede, and with the holy Scripture and canons, the which for breuities cause I do here passe ouer. I will only rehearse the saying of Saint Isidore, who writeth thus: He which doth rule, and doth say or command any thing contrarie and besides the will of God, or that which is euidently commanded in the Scriptures, he is honored as a false witteslie of God, and a church robber. Wherevpon we are bounden to obey no prelat, but in such case as he do command or take counsell of the counsels and commandements of Christ.

Likewise Saint Augustine vpon this saying: vpon the chaire of Moses, &c. saith: Ergo, God teacheth by them: but if they will teach you any of their olwne inuentions, do not giue eare vnto them, neither do as they command you. Also in the saying of Christ, He that heareth you heareth me, all lawfull and honest things be comprehended, in the which we ought to be obedient, according to Christs saying: It is not you which do speake, but the Spirit of my Father which speaketh in you. Let therefore my aduersaries and slanderers learne that there be not only twelue counsels in the Gospell, in the which subiects ought to obey Christ and his appointed ministers, but that there are so many counsels and determinations of God, as there be lawfull and honest things ioyned with precepts and commandements of God, binding vs thereunto, vnder the paine of deadlie sinne, for euerie such thing doth the Lord command vs to fulfill in time and place, with other circumstances, at the will and pleasure of their Minister.

The twelfth article: It is lawfull for the clergie and laitie, by their power and iurisdiction to iudge and determine of all things pertaining vnto saluation, and also of the workes of the prelats. The answere: I haue thus written in my booke, that it is lawfull for the clergie and laitie to iudge and determine of the workes of their heads and rulers. It appeareth by this, that the iudgement of the secret counsels of God, in the court of conscience is one thing, and the iudgement of the authoritie and power in the church is another. Wherefore subiects first ought principally to iudge and examine themselues, 1. Corinthians the eleuenth chapter. Secondly, they ought to examine all things which pertaine vnto their saluation, for a spirituall man iudgeth and examineth all things. And this is alleaged as touching the first iudgement, and not the second, as the enemie doth impute it vnto me. Whereupon in the same place I doe say, that the lay man ought to iudge and examine the workes of his prelat, like as Paul doth iudge the doings of Peter in blaming him. Secondly, to auoid them according to this saying: Beware of false prophets, &c. Thirdly, to rule ouer the Ministerie: For the subiect ought by reason to iudge and examine the workes of the prelats. And if they be good, to praise God therefore and reioyce: But if they be euill, they ought with patience to suffer them, and to be sure for them, but not to doe the like, lest they be damned with them: according to this saying: If the blind leade the blind, both fall into the ditch.

The thirteenth article: God doth suspend of himselfe, euerie wicked prelat from his ministerie, while he is actuall in sinne, for by that meanes that he is in deadly sinne, he doth offend and sinne whatsoeuer he doe: and consequently is forbidden so to doe; therefore also is he suspended from his ministerie. The answere: This is proued as touching suspension from dignitie, by Osee the fourth chapter, and Ezay, and Malachie the first. And Paul in the first to the Corinthians, the eleuenth chapter, suspendeth all such as be sinfull, or in any grieuous crime or offence, from the eating of the bodie of the Lord, and the drinking of his blood, and consequently suspendeth all sinfull prelats from the ministration of the reuerend Sacrament. And God doth suspend the wicked and sinfull from the declaration of his right counselle, Psalme 49. For so much then as to suspend in effect, is to prohibite the ministerie or anie other good thing for the offence take, or as the new lawes do terme or call it, to interdit or forbid; it is manifest by the Scriptures afore rehearsed, that God doth prohibit the sinfull, being in sinne to exercise or vse their ministerie or office, which by Gods commandement ought to be exercised without offence. Wherevpon he saith by Esay the prophet: Be that carrie the vessels of the Lord, be ye cleinsed and made cleane. And to the 6. Corinthians it is said: Let all things be done with loue and charitie, &c. The same thing also is commanded by diuers and sundrie Canons, the which I haue alleaged in my treatise.

The fourteenth article: The answere which he made to the fiue and twentith article in prison sufficeth for this, that is to say, that the clergie for their olwne preferment and exaltation, doth supplant and vndermine the lay people, doth increase and multiplie their couetousnesse, cloketh and defendeth their malice and wickednesse, and prepareth a way for Antichrist.

The first part he proueth by experience, by the example of Peter de Luna, which named himselfe Benedict, by the example of Angelus Coziarius, which named himselfe Gregorie the twelfth, and also by the example of John the three and twentith. Likewise by the thirteenth and twentie fourth of Ezechiel, and out of Gregorie, which saith, What shall become of the flocke, when the shepheards themselues, are become Wolues, &c. Also out of Osee, Micha, and other of the Prophets, and many places of Saint Bernard.

The second part is proued by the eighth chapter of Jeremie, Gregorie in his seuenteenth Homilie, and Saint Bernard vpon the Canticles.

The third part of this article is also proued by experience: for who defendeth the wickednesse of any schisme but only the clergie, alleaging Scriptures, and bringing reasons therefore? Who execrateth simonie, but only the clergie? likewise couetousnesse in heaping together many benefices, luxuriousnesse and fornication: For how many of the clergie are there now a daies which do say it is no deadly sinne, alleaging (albeit disorderlie) the saying of Genesis, Increase and multiplie?

Hereby also is the 4. part of the article easily verified. For the way of Antichrist is wickednesse and sinne: of the which the Apostle speaketh to the Thessalonians: Gregorie in his Register, Bassanus and Morals: also Saint Bernard vpon the Canticles plainely saith; Wicked and euill priests prepare the way for Antichrist.

The fifteenth article. The falsehood of which as of others is manifest by that which I haue afore written.

The fifteenth article: John Hus doth openly teach and affirme that these conclusions afore said are true. The answere is manifest by that which I haue afore written. For some of these propositions I did write and publish, other some mine enemie did faine, now adding, then diminishing and taking away, now falsely ascribing and imputing the whole proposition vnto me: the which thing the commissioners themselues did confesse before me. Whom I desired for the faire inuention and fayning of those articles, that they would punish those, whom they themselues knew and confessed to be mine enemies.

The fifteenth article.

The sixteenth article: Hereby also it appeareth, that it is not true which they haue affirmed in the article following: that is to say, that all the afore said conclusions be false, erroneous, seditious, and such as doe weaken and make feeble the power and strength of the church, inuented contrarie to the holy scriptures and the church. But if there be any such, I am readie most humble to reuoke and recant the same.

The seuenteenth article: There was also an obiection made against me as touching the treatises which I wrote against Palets and Stanislaus de Znoyma. The which I declared for Gods sake, they might be openly read in the audience of the whole councell, and said, that I, notwithstanding my former protestation, would willingly submit my selfe to the iudgement of the whole councell.

The seuenteenth article.

The eighteenth article: There was also another article obiected against me in this forme. Item, John Hus said and preached that he should go to Constance, and if so be that for a time manner of cause he should be forced to recant that he had before taught, yet notwithstanding he neuer purposed to doe it with his mouth so much as what soeuer he had before taught, was pure and true, and the sound doctrine of Christ. The answere: This article is full of lies, to the inuentor whereof I suppose the Lord saith thus: All the day long thou hast imagined mischefe and wickednesse, and with thy tongue as with a sharpe rasour, thou hast wrought deceit. Thou hast delighted and loued rather to talke of wickednesse and mischefe then of equitie and iustice. Verily I doe grant, that I left behind me a certaine epistle to be read vnto the people, the which did containe that all such as did weigh and consider my carefull labors and trauels, should pray for me, and stedfastly persecuere and continue in the doctrine of our Lord Iesu Christ, knowing for a certaintie that I neuer taught them any such errors as mine enemies doe impute or ascribe vnto me: and if it should happen that I were ouercome by false witnesse, they should not be vered or troubled in their minds, but stedfastly continue in the truth.

The eighteenth article.

The nineteenth article: Last it was obiected against me, that after I was come into Constance, I did write vnto the kingdome of Boheme, that the pope and the emperor receiued me honorable, and sent vnto me two bishops to make agreement betweene me and them; and that this seemeth to be written by me to this end and purpose, that they should confirme and establish me and my hearers in the errors which I had preached and taught in Boheme. This article is falsely alleaged of men from the beginning. For how manifestly false should I haue written that the pope and the emperour did honor me, whereas otherwise I had written before, that as yet we knew not where the emperour was: and before the emperor himselfe came vnto Constance, I was by the space of three weekes in prison. And to write that I was honored by my imprisonment, the people of the kingdome of Boheme would repute the honor as no great reuowne and glorie vnto me. Howbeit my enemies may in derision say vnto me, that according to their wils and pleasures, I am exalted and honored. Wherefore this article is wholy throughout false and untrue.

The nineteenth article.

Fiftéene articles drawne out by hostile Bardus against John Hus, John Gerson chancellour of Paris.

Vnto these articles above prefixed, were other articles also to be annexed, which the Parisians had drawne out against matter John Hus, to the number of nineteene. The chiefe author thereof, was John Gerson chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Paris, a great setter on of the pope against good men. Of these articles John Hus both often complaine in his epistles, that he had no time nor space to make answere vnto them. Which articles being falsly collected and wrongfully depraued, although John Hus had no time to answere vnto, yet I thought not vnfit here to set downe for the reader to see and iudge.

2 Articles formally contained or picked out of the Treatise of Iohn Hus of Prage, which he intituled of the church, following in this part or behalfe the errours, as they name them, of Iohn Wickliffe.

1 THe first article: No reprobate is true pope, lord, or prelat. The errour is in the faith, and behauiour and manners, being both of late and manie times before condemned, as well against the poore men of Lions, as also against the Waldenses and Pikardes. The affirmation of which error is temerarious, seditious, offensiue and pernitious, and tending to the subuersion of all humane policie and gouernance, forasmuch as no man knoweth whether he be worthie of loue or hatred, for that all men do offend in many points, and thereby should all rule and dominion be made vncertaine and vnstable, if it should be founded vpon predestination and charitie: neither should the commandement of Peter haue ben good, which willeth all seruants to be obedient vnto their masters and lords, although they be wicked.

2 The second article: That no man being in deadly sinne, whereby he is no member of Christ, but of the diuell, is true pope, prelat, or lord. The erro of this is like vnto the first.

3 The third article: No reprobate or otherwise being in deadly sin, sitteth in the apostolike seate of Peter, neither hath any apostolicall power ouer the christian people. This error is alike vnto the first.

4 The fourth article: No reprobates are of the church, neither likewise any which do not follow the life of Christ. This error is against the common vnderstanding of the doctors, concerning the church.

5 The fifth article: They only are of the church, and sit in Peters seat, and haue apostolike power which follow Christ and his Apostles in their life and liuing. The errour hereof is in faith and manners, as in the first article, but containing more arrogancie and rashnesse.

6 The sixth article: That euerie man which liueth vprightlie according to the rule of Christ, may and ought openly to preach and teach, although he be not sent, yea although he be forbidden or excommunicate by any prelat or bishop, euen as he might and ought to giue almes: for his good life in liuing together with his learning doth sufficiently send him.

This is a rash and temerarious error, offensiue and tending to the confusion of the whole ecclesiasticall hierarchie.

7 The seuenth article: That the pope of Rome being contrarie vnto Christ, is not the vniuersall bishop, neither hath the church of Rome any supremacie ouer other churches, except peraduenture it be giuen vnto him of Cesar, and not of Christ. An error lately and plainly reproued.

8 The eighth article: That the pope ought not to be called most holy, neither that his feet are holy and blessed, or that they ought to be kissed. This error is temerarious, vncurerently and offensiuely published.

9 The ninth article: That according vnto the doctrine of Christ, heretikes, be they neuer so obstinate or stubborne, ought not to be put to death, neither to be accursed or excommunicated. This is the error of the Donatists, temerariously, and not without great offence affirmed against the lawes of the Ecclesiasticall discipline, as S. Augustine doth proue.

10 The tenth article: That subiects and the common people may and ought publikely and openly to detect and reproue the vices of their superiours and rulers, as hauing power giuen them of Christ, and example of Saint Paul so to do. This errour is pernicious, full of offence, inducing all rebellion, disobedience, and sedition, and the curse and maledition of Cham.

11 The eleuenth article: That Christ only is head of the church and not the pope. It is an error according vnto the common vnderstanding of the doctors, if all the reason of the supremacie, and of being head be secluded and taken away from the pope.

12 The twelfth article: That the only church which comprehendeth the predestinate and good liuers, is the vniuersall church, whereunto subiects do owe obedience. And this is consequent vnto the former article. The error is contained as in the former articles.

13 The thirteenth article: That tithes and oblations giuen vnto the church are publike and common almes. This error is offensiue, and contrarie to the determination of the apostle, 1. Corinth. 9. chapter.

14 The fourteenth article: That the clergie liuing wickedlie, ought to be reproued and corrected by the lay people, by the taking away of their tithes and other temporall profits. A most pernicious errour and offensiue, inducing the secular people to perpetrate sacrilege, subuerting the ecclesiasticall libertie.

15 The fifteenth article: That the blessings of such as are reprobate or euill liuers of the clergie are maledictions and cursings before God according to the saying: I will curse your blessings. This error was lately reproued of S. Augustine, against S. Cyprian and his followers, neither is the matter of the sentences allowed of the masters in that point that he seemeth to fauour this article.

16 The sixteenth article: That in these daies and in long time before, there hath ben no true pope, no true church, or faith, which is called the Romish church, whereunto a man ought to obey, but that it both was and is the synagogue of Antichrist and Satan. The error in this article is in this point, that it is denied, and taken his foundation vpon the former articles.

17 The seuenteenth article: That al gift of money giuen vnto the ministers of the church for the ministration of any spirituall matter, it doth make such ministers in y case biers of simonie.

This

This error is seditious and temerarious, for so much as some thing may be giuen vnto the clergie, vnder the title of sustentation or maintaining the minister, without the selling or buying of any spirituall thing.

18 The eighteenth article: That whosoeuer is excommunicate of the pope, if he appeale vnto Christ, he is preserued that he need not feare the excommunication, but vtterly to contemne and despise the same. This errour is temerarious and full of arrogancie.

19 The nineteenth article: That euery deed done without charitie is sin. This errour was reproued and reuoked before this time at Paris, specially if it be vnderstood of deadly sinne, for it is not necessarie that he which lacketh grace should continually sinne and offend anew: Albeit he be continually in sinne.

¶ This following, the masters of Paris by their whole voice and consent did adde and adioyne vnto these nineteene articles, for their reason and determination.

WE affirme that these articles afore said are notoriously heretical, and that they are iudicially to be condemned for such, and diligently to be rooted out with their most seditious doctrines, left they do infect other. For albeit they seeme to haue a zeale against the vices of the prelats and the clergie, the which (the more is the pitie and griefe) doe but too much abound, yet is it not according vnto learning: for a sober and discreet zeale, suffereth and lamenteth those sinnes and offences, which he seeth in the house of God, that he cannot amend or take away; for vices cannot be rooted out and taken away by other vices and errors, for so much as Diuels are not cast out through Belsebub, but by the power of God which is the holy Ghost, who willeth that in correction the measure and meane of prudence be alwaies kept, according to the saying: Sparke, wh, what, where and why, by what meanes and when, prelats and bishops are bound vnder grieuous and expresse penalties of the law, diligently and vigilantly to teache themselues against the foresaid errors and such other like, and the maintainers of them; for let it alwaies be well vnderstood and noted, that the error which is not resisted is allowed, neither is there any doubt of priue affinitie or societie of him, which slacketh to withstand a manifest mischiefe.

These things are entermeddled by the way vnder correction, as by way of doctrine.

Iohn Gerson Chancellour of Paris, vnworthilie.

THese things thus declared, a man may easily vnderstand, that John Hus was not accused for holding any opinion contrarie to the articles of our faith, but because he did stoutly preach and teach against the kingdome of Antichrist for the glorie of Christ, and the reseruing of the church.

The words of the cardinall of Cambay vnto John Hus after his recantation.

Now to returne vnto the storie: when as the first thirtie nine articles, which I haue before rehearsed, were all read ouer together with their testimonies, the cardinall of Cambay calling vnto John Hus, said; Thou hast heard what grieuous and horrible crimes are laid against thee, and what a number of them there are: and now it is thy part to deuise with thy selfe what thou wilt doe. Two waies are proponed and set before thee of the councell, whereof the one of them thou must of force and necessitie enter into.

A double inconuenience for John Hus to fall into.

First, that thou do humble and meekely submit thy selfe vnto the iudgement and sentence of the councell, that whatsoeuer shall bee there determined by their common voice and iudgement, thou wilt patiently beare and suffer the same. The which thing if thou wilt do, we of our part both for the honor of the most gentle emperour here present, and also for the honor of his brother the king of Boheme, and for thy owne safegard and preseruation, will intreat and handle thee with as great humanitie, loue and gentlenesse, as we may. But if as yet thou art determined to defend any of those articles which we haue propounded vnto thee, and dost desire or require to be further heard thereupon, we will not denie thee power and licence thereunto: but this thou shalt well vnderstand, that here are such maner of men, to cleare in vnderstanding and knowledge, and hauing so firme and strong reasons and arguments against thy articles, that I feare it will be to thy great hurt, detriment, and perill, if thou shouldest any longer will or desire to defend the same.

This do I speake and say vnto thee to counsell and admonish thee, and not as in maner of a Iudge.

John Hus answereth.

This Oration of the cardinals many other prosecutting, euery man for himselfe, did exhort and perswade John Hus to the like: vnto whom with a louely countenance he answered: Most reuerend fathers, I haue often said that I came hither of mine owne free will, not to the intent obstinately to defend anie thing, but if that in any thing I should seeme to haue conceiued a peruerse or euill opinion, that I would meekely and patientlie be content to be reformed and taught. Whereupon I desire that I may haue yet further libertie to declare my mind. Whereof except I shall alleage most firme and strong reasons, I will willingly submit my selfe (as you require) vnto your information.

The cardinall of Cambay appointeth John Hus certaine conditions wherein he may be otherwise heard.

Then there start vp one which with a loud voice said; Behold how craftily this man speaketh: He termeth it information and not correction or determination. Verily, said John Hus, euen as you will terme it, information, correction, or determination: for I take God to my witnesse, that I speake nothing but with my heart and mind.

The cardinall of Cambay: for so much then as thou doest submit thy selfe vnto the information and grace of this councell, this is decreed almost by threescore doctours, whereof some of them are now departed hence, in whose roome and place the Parisians are succeded; and also it is approued by the whole councell, not one man speaking the contrarie thereunto:

First of all, that thou shalt humblie and meekely confesse thy selfe to haue erred in these articles, which are alleaged and brought against thee.

Moreouer, that thou shalt promise by an oth, that from henceforth thou shalt not teach, hold or maintaine any of these articles. And last of all, that thou shalt openly recant all these articles.

The answere of John Hus.

Vpon the which sentence: When as many others had spoken their minds, at the length John Hus said; Forsee against do say, that I am readie to submit my selfe to the information of the councell: but this I most humblie require and desire you all, euen for his sake, which is the God of vs all, that I be not compelled or forced to do the thing, which my conscience doth repugne or striue against, or the which I cannot doe without danger of eternall damnation: that is, that I should make renocation by oth to all the articles which are alleaged against me. For I remember that I haue read in the booke of the vniuersalities, that to abiure is to renounce an error which a man hath before holden. And for so much as many of these articles are said to be mine, which I were neuer in my mind or thought to hold or teach, how should I then renounce them by an oth? But as touching those articles which are mine indeed, if there be any man which can teach me contrariwise vnto them, I will willingly performe that which you desire.

The emperour reproueth John Hus to recant.

Then said the emperour, thy maiesti not thou without danger also renounce all those articles which thou saiest are falsly alleaged against thee by the witnesses? For I verily would not thing at all doubt to abiure al errors, neither doth it follow that therfore by and by I haue professed any error. To whom John Hus answered: Most noble emperor, this word to abiure, doth signifie much otherwise then your maiestie doth here vse it. Then said the cardinall of Florence: John Hus, you shal haue a forme of abiuration, which shall be gentle and tollerable enough, written and deliuered vnto you, and then you will easilie and soone determine with your selfe, whether you will do it or no. Then the emperor repeating againe the words of the cardinal of Cambay, said: thou hast heard that there are two waies laid before thee. First, that thou shouldest openly renounce those thy errors, which are now condemned, and subscribe vnto the iudgement of the councell, whereof the one of them thou must of force and necessitie enter into.

The emperour exhorteth the cardinall of Cambay to agree vnto.

Second answere of John Hus.

Second, that thou do humble and meekely submit thy selfe vnto the iudgement and sentence of the councell, that whatsoeuer shall bee there determined by their common voice and iudgement, thou wilt patiently beare and suffer the same. The which thing if thou wilt do, we of our part both for the honor of the most gentle emperour here present, and also for the honor of his brother the king of Boheme, and for thy owne safegard and preseruation, will intreat and handle thee with as great humanitie, loue and gentlenesse, as we may. But if as yet thou art determined to defend any of those articles which we haue propounded vnto thee, and dost desire or require to be further heard thereupon, we will not denie thee power and licence thereunto: but this thou shalt well vnderstand, that here are such maner of men, to cleare in vnderstanding and knowledge, and hauing so firme and strong reasons and arguments against thy articles, that I feare it will be to thy great hurt, detriment, and perill, if thou shouldest any longer will or desire to defend the same.

The false witnesse.

The emperour to John Hus.

Thou art of lawfull age, said the emperor, thou mightest haue easilie vnderstood what I said vnto thee yesterday and this day: for we are forced to giue credit vnto these witnesses which are worthie of credit: for so much as the Scripture saith, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses, all truth is tried: how much more then by so many witnesses of such worthie men:

Wherefore if thou be wise, receiue penance at the hands of the councell, with a contrite heart, and renounce the manifest errors, and promise by an oth that from henceforth thou wilt neuer more teach or preach against them. The which if thou refusest to do, there are lawes and ordinances, wherewith thou shalt be iudged of the councell.

An old bishop of Pole.

Here a certaine verie old bishop of Pole put to his verdict. He said the lawes are euident as touching heretiques, with what punishment they ought to be punished. But John Hus constantly answered as before: in so much that they said he was obstinate and stubborne. Then a certaine well seen priest and gaylie apparelled, cried out vnto the Presidents of the councell, saying: he ought by no meanes to bee admitted to recantation: for he hath written vnto his friends, that although he do sweare with his tongue, yet he will keepe his mund vniuersitie without oth: wherefore he is not to be trusted. Vnto this Master John Hus answered as is said in the last article, affirming that he was not guilte of any errors.

Pallets against John Hus.

Then said Pallets, to that end is this protestation, for so much as thou saiest that thou wilt defend no errors, neither yet the seuentie, he brought forth foure witnesse nine articles of John Wicklisses, and read them openly: and afterward he said; What say I and master Stanislaus in the presence of Cruelius of Austrich duke of Polage, preached against them, he obstinately defended the same, not only by his sermons, but also by his bookes which he set forth. The which except you do here erbidite, we will cause them to be erbidited. So said the emperor also. Vnto whom John Hus answered, I am verie well contented that not only these, but also al other my bookes be brought forth and shewed.

A new kinde of slanders.

In the meane time there was erhibited vnto the councell a certaine article, wherein John Hus was accused, that he had set vp certaine interpreted a certaine sentence of the popes: the which he denied that he did, saying, that he never saw it but in prison, when as the article was shewed him by the commissioners. And when he was demanded who was the author thereof, he answered that he knew not, but that he heard say that master Jeffrets was the author thereof.

John Hus wareth faint and wearie.

What said they, then doe you think or iudge of the interpretation thereof? Then answered John Hus, what should I say thereunto, when as I said I never saw it, but as I have heard it of you. Thus they were all so grieuous and troublesome vnto him, that he waxed faint and wearie, for he had passed all the night before without sleepe, though the paine of his teeth.

Another quarrel picked vnto John Hus, for that he denied the bodies of Saints to be buried at Prage. Fox. 649. 650.

Then was there another article read, in the which was contained that these men were beheaded at Prage, because that through Wicklisses doctrine and teaching, they were contumelious and slanderous against the popes letters: and that they were of the same Hus, with the whole pompe of the scholars, and by the publike consecration or congregation carried out to be buried, and by a publike sermon placed amongst the number of Saints. And the same doctor Hasse, of whom you haue heard record, ministred al reade recited, affirmed the same to be true, and that he himselfe was present, when as the king of Boheme commanded those blaspheamers so to be punished.

John Hus beheaded.

Then said John Hus: both these parts are false, that the king did command any such punishment to be done, and that the coarses were by me conueyed with any such pompe vnto their sepulture or burial: wherefore you doe both iniurie vnto me and the king. Then Pallets confirmed the affirmation of doctour Hasse his fellow, with this argument (for they both laboured to one end and purpose:) That it was prouided by the kings commandement, that no man should once speake against the popes Bulls: And these that spake against the popes Bulls: Ergo, by vertue of the kings commandement they were beheaded. And what John Hus his opinion and mind was as touching these men, it is euident enough by his booke entituled Of the church, wherein he writeth thus: I beleeue they haue read Daniel the prophet, where as is said: And they shall perish with sword and fire, and with captiuitie, and many shall fraudulently and craftily alleviate themselues vnto them. And afterward he saith: how is this fulfilled in these two lay men, who not consenting, but speaking against the fained lies of Antichrist, haue offered their liues therefore, and manie other were readie to do the same, and many were fraudulently alleviate vnto them, which being feared by the threatnings of Antichrist, are fled, and haue turned their backes, &c.

Another quarrel picked by Cruelius against John Hus.

When these things were read, one looking vpon another, as though they had been all in a marueilous strange study, they held their peace for a certaine space. For this Pallets, and the foresaid doctor Hasse had also added that John Hus in an open sermon had inflamed and stirred vp the people against the magistrates, in so much that a great number of the citizens did openly set themselues against the magistrates: and by that meanes was it, that he and those three were readie to suffer death for the truth. And this sedition was hardly appeased by any benefit, or helpe that the king could do. Then the English men erhibited the copie of a certain epistle, which they said was lately conueyed vnto Prage, vnder the title of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, and that John Hus did read the same out of the pulpit vnto the people, that he might commend and praise John Wicklisse vnto the citizens of Prage. Then they had read the same before the councell, the Englishmen demanded of John Hus, whether he had read the same openly or no. Which when he had confessed, because it was brought thither by two scholars vnder the seale of the Vniuersitie: they also inquired of him what scholars they were. He answered: this my friend (meaning Stephen Pallets) knoweth the one of them as well as I, the other I know not what he was.

There Sermons all of Oxford, for Wicklisse brought to Prage.

Then they first enquired of him, as touching the last man, where he was. John Hus answered: I heard say, said he that in his returne into England, he died by the way. As touching the first, Pallets said, that he was a Bohemian and no Englishman, and that he brought out of England a certaine small piece of the stone of Wicklisses sepulchre, which they that are the followers of his doctrine at this present, do reuerence and worship as a thing most holy. Hereby it appeareth for what intent all these things were done, and that John Hus was the author of them all.

A piece of the stone of Wicklisses sepulchre brought for a relike to Prage.

Then the English men erhibited another epistle, contrarie to the first, vnder the seale of the Vniuersitie, the effect and argument whereof was this: The Senate of the Vniuersitie, not without great sorrow and griefe hath experimented and found, that the errors of Wicklisse are scattred and spread out of that Vniuersitie throughout all England. And to the intent that through their helpe and labour, meanes may be found to remedie this mischiefe, they haue appointed for that purpose twelue doctours, men of singular learning, and other matters, which should sit in iudgement vpon the bookes of Wicklisse.

These men haue noted out aboue the number of two hundred articles, the which the whole Vniuersitie haue iudged worthie to be burnt: but for the reuerence of the said sacred councell, the said Vniuersitie hath sent them vnto Constance, referring and remitting the whole authoritie of the iudgement vnto this councell.

Here was great silence kept for a while. Then Pallets rising vp, as though he had finished nowe his accusation, said: I take God to my witnes before the emperours maiestie here present, and the most renerend fathers, cardinals and bishops, that in this accusation of John Hus, I haue not bled any hatred or euil will: but that I might satisfie the oth which I toke, when I was made doctor, that I would be a most cruell and sharpe enemie of all maner of errors, for the profit and commoditie of the holy catholike church. Michael de Causis did also the like. And I, said John Hus, do commit all these things vnto the heauenly Iudge, which shall iustly iudge the cause or quarrels of both parties. Then said the cardinall of Cambray, I cannot a little commend and praise the humanitie and gentlenesse of master Pallets, which he hath vsed in drawing out the articles against master John Hus. For as we haue heard, there are many things contained in his booke, much worse and detestable.

The oth of Pallets.

The oth of Michael de Causis.

John Hus witnesseth the Lord.

Then he had spoken these words, the bishop of Lygen vnto whom John Hus was committed, commanded that the said John Hus should be carried againe safely vnto prison. Then John de Clum following him, did not a little incourage and comfort him. No tongue can expresse what courage and stomacke he received by the shot talke which he had with him: when as in so great a hoole and grieuous hatred, he saw himselfe in a manor forsaken of all men. After that John Hus was carried away, the emperour began to exhort the presidents of the councell in this maner, saying:

John de Clum both comforteth John Hus.

YOu haue heard the manifold and grieuous crimes which are laid against John Hus, which are not only proued by manifest and strong witnesses, but also confessed by him: of the which euery one of them by my iudgement and aduice hath deserued, and are worthie of death. Therefore, except he do recant them all, I iudge and thinke meete that he be punished with fire: and albeit he doe that which he is willed and commanded to do; notwithstanding I do counsell you, that he be forbid the office of preaching and teaching, and also that he returne no more into the kingdome of Boheme. For if he be admitted againe to teach and preach, and specially in the kingdome of Boheme, he will not obserue and keepe that which he is commanded, but hoping vpon the fauour and good will of such as be his adherents and fautours there, he will returne again vnto his former purpose and intent, and then besides these errours, he will also sow new errors amongst the people, so the last error shall be worse then the first.

The emperours oration to the presidents of the councell.

That which Hus planted men shall neuer root vp.

Moreouer, I iudge and think it good that his articles which are condemned, should be sent vnto my brother the king of Boheme, and afterward into Pole and other prouinces, where as mens minds are replenished with his doctrine; with this commandement, that whosoeuer do proceed to hold or keepe the same, they should by the common aid both of the ecclesiasticall and ciuill power, be punished. So at the length shall remedie be found for this mischiefe, if the boughes together with the root, be vtterly rooted and pulled vp: and if the bishops and other prelats, which heere in this place haue laboured and trauelled for the extirpating of this heresie, be commended by the whole voices of the councell vnto the kings and princes, vnder whose dominion they are. Last of al, if there be any found heere at Constance, which are familiars vnto John Hus, they also ought to be punished with such seueritie and punishment as is due vnto them, and specially his scholar Jerome of Prage. Then said the rest, when the master is once punished, we hope we shall find the scholar much more tractable and gentle.

Jerome of Prage manifested and pronounced by the emperour.

After they had spoken these words, they departed out of the Closter, where they were assembled and gathered together. The day before his condemnation, which was the sixth of Julie, the emperour Sigismund sent vnto him foure bishops, accomfoure bishops sent to John Hus.

accomplished with master Wenceslate de Duba, and John de Clum, that they should learne and vnderstand of him what he did intend to doe. When as hee was brought out of prison vnto them, John de Clum began first to speake vnto him, saying.

The pitifull and louing oration of John de Clum vnto John Hus.

MAster John Hus, I am a man vnlearned, neither am I able to counsell or aduertise you, being a man of learning and vnderstanding: notwithstanding I do require you, if you know your selfe guilty of any of those errors, which are obiected and laid against you before the Councell, that you will not bee ashamed to alter and change your mind to the will and pleasure of the Councell: if contrariwise, I will be no author vnto you, that you should doe any thing contrarie, or against your conscience, but rather to suffer and indure any kind of punishment, then to denie that which you haue knowne to bee the truth. Vnto whom, John Hus turning himselfe, with lamentable teares, said: Verily as before I haue oftentimes done, I do take the most high God for my witnesse, that I am readie with my whole heart and mind, if the Councell can instruct or teach me any better by the holy scripture: I will bee readie with all my heart to alter and change my purpose. Then one of the bishops which sate by, said vnto him, that he would neuer bee so arrogant or proud, that hee would preferre his owne mind or opinion before the iudgement of the whole Councell. To whom John Hus answered, neither doe I otherwise mind or intend. For if the which is the meanest, or least in all this Councell, can conuict me of error, I will with an humble heart and mind perfonne, and doe whatsoeuer the Councell shall require of me. Marke, said the bishops, how obstinately hee doth persieuere in his errors. And when they had thus talked, they commanded the keepers to carrie him againe vnto prison, and so they returned againe vnto the Emperour with their commission.

The manerfous constancie of John Hus.

That is no right modestie that moues a regarderth to obey man, then gracious scripture. John Hus answereth.

The next day after, which was Saturday, and the sixth day of Julie, there was a generall Session holden of the Princes and lords, both of the ecclesiasticall and temporall estates in the head Church of the citie of Constance, the emperour Sigismund being president in his imperiall robes and habit: in the midst whereof, there was made a certaine high place, being square about like a table, and hard by it there was a deske of wood, vpon the which the garments and vestiments pertaining vnto priesthood were laid, for this cause, that before John Hus should be deliuered ouer vnto the ciuill power, he should be openly depriued and spoyled of his priestly ornaments. When John Hus was brought thither, he fell downe vpon his knees before that same high place, and prayed a long time. In the meane while the bishop of Londy went vp into the pulpit, and made this sermon following.

The Sermon of the bishop of Londy, before the sentence was giuen vpon John Hus.

They cannot deuide the lattie to rule in any case.

All the popish religion riseth in lands, bishops and liuerties.

The sermon before the sentence

IN the name of the Father, the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost. Trusting by humble inuocation vpon the diuine helpe and aid, most noble prince, and most Christian emperour, and you most excellent fathers, and reuerend lords, bishops, and prelats, also most excellent doctors and masters, famous and noble dukes, and high countes, honourable nobles, and barons, and all other men worthie of remembrance: that the intent and purpose of my mind may the more plainely and euidently appeare vnto this most sacred congregation, I am first of all determined to intreat or speake of that which is read in the Epistle on the next Sunday, in the sixth chapter to the Romans: That is to say: Let the bodie of sinne be destroyed, &c.

State here the popes diuinitie, how the bloud of Christ serueth to purchase them pardemonie.

The theame, Or theame confirmed by Aristotle.

It appeareth by the authoritie of Aristotle, in his booke intituled De cœlo & mundo, how wicked, dangerous, and foolish a matter it seemeth to be, not to withstand peruerse and wicked beginnings. For he saith, that a small errour in the beginning, is very great in the end. It is very damnable and dangerous to haue erred, but more hard to be corrected or amended. Whereupon that worthie doctor Saint Ierome, in his booke vpon the exposition of the Catholike faith, teacheth how necessarie a thing it is, that heretikes and heresies should be suppressed, euen at the first beginning of them, saying thus: The rotten and dead flesh is to bee cut off from the bodie, lest that the whole bodie do perish and putrifie. For a scabbed sheepe is to bee put out of the fold, lest that the whole flocke bee infected. And a little fire is to be quenched, lest the whole house be consumed and burned. Arrius was first a sparke in Alexandria, who because hee was not at the first quenched, hee presumed and went about with his wicked and peruerse imaginations, and phantasticall inuentions, to spot and defile the Catholike faith, which is founded and established by Christ, defended with the victorious triumphs of so many Martyrs, and illuminate and set foorth with the excellent doctrines and writings of so many men. Such therefore must bee suppressed: such heretikes of necessitie must bee suppressed and condemned.

Wherefore I haue truely propounded, as touching the punishment of euerie such obstinate heretike, that the bodie of sinne is to be destroyed. Whereupon it is to be considered according vnto the holy traditions of the Fathers, that some sins are aduerse and contrary vnto another. Other some are annexed or conioined together: other some are, as it were, branches and members of others: and some are as it were the rootes and head of others. Amongst all which, those are to bee counted the most detestable, out of the which the most and worst, haue their originall and beginning. Wherefore, albeit that all sinnes and offences are to be abhorred of vs: yet those are specially to bee eschued, which are the head and roote of the rest. For by how much the peruersenesse of them is of more force and power to hurt, with so much the more speed and circumspection, ought they to bee rooted out and extinguished, with apt preseruatiues and remedies. For somuch then as amongst all sinnes none doth more appeare to be inueterate, then the mischiefe of this most execrable schisme, therefore haue I right well propounded, that the bodie of sinne should be destroyed. For by the long continuance of this schisme, great and most cruell destruction is sprung vp amongst the faithful, and hath long continued: abominable diuisions of heresies are growne: threatnings are increased and multiplied: the confusion of the whole clergie is growne thereupon, and the opprobries and slanders of the Christian people are abundantly sprung vp and increased. And truly it is no maruell, for so much as that most detestable and execrable schisme, is, as it were, a bodie and heape of dissolution of the true faith of God: for what can be good or holy in that place, where as such a pestiferous schisme hath raigned so long a time? For as saint Bernard saith, Like as in the vnitie and concord of the faithfull, there is the habitation and dwelling of the Lord, so likewise in the schisme and diuision of the Christians, there is made the habitation and dwelling of the diuell. Is not schisme and diuision the originall of all subuersion, the denne of heresies, and the nourisher of all offences? for the knot of vnitie and peace being once troubled and broken, there is free passage made for all liuse and debate. Couetousnesse is vttered in othes for lucres sake, lust and will is set at liberty, and all meanes opened vnto slaughter. All right and equitie is banished, the ecclesiasticall power is iniuried, and the calamitie of this schisme bringeth in all kind of bondage, sword and violence doth rule, the laitie haue the dominion, concord and vnitie are banished, and all precript rules of religion vtterlie contemned and set at naught.

Consider most gentle lords, how that during this most pestiferous schisme, how many heresies haue appeared and shewed themselues, how many heretiks haue escaped vnpunished, how many Churches haue been spoiled and pulled do wne, how many cities haue been oppresled, and regions brought to ruine, what confusion hath there hapned in the clergie? What and how great destruction hath been amongst the Christian people I pray you marke how the Church of God, the spouse of Christ, and the mother of all faithfull, is contemned and despised. For who doth reuerence the keies of the Church, who feareth the censures or lawes, or who is it, that doth defend the liberties thereof? But rather who is it, that doth not offend the same, or who doth not inuade it, or else what is hee that dare not violently lay hands vpon the patrimonie or heritage of Iesus Christ? The goods of the clergie, and of the poore, and the releese of pilgrims and strangers, gotten together by the bloud of our Sauiour, and of many martyrs, are spoiled and taken away: behold the abomination of the desolation brought vpon the Church of God, the destruction of the faith, and the confusion of the Christian people, to the ruine of the Lords flocke or fold, and all the whole companie of our most holy Sauiour and Redeemer. This losse is more great or grieuous then any which could happen vnto the martyrs of Christ, and this persecution much more cruell then the persecution of any tyrants, for they did but onely punish the bodies, but in this schisme and diuision the soules are tormented. There the bloud of men was only shed, but in this case the true faith is subuerted and ouerthrowne. That persecution was saluation vnto many: but this schisme is destruction vnto all men. When the tyrants raged, then the faith did increase: but by this diuision it is vtterly decaied. During their crueltie and madnesse, the primitiue Church increased, but through this schisme it is confounded and ouerthrowne. Tyrants did ignorantly offend: but in this schisme, many doe wittingly and willingly euen of obstinacie offend. There came in heretikes, vsers of simonie, and hypocrites, to the great detriment and deceit of the Church: vnder those tyrants, the merits of the iust were increased.

But during this schisme, mischiefe and wickednes are augmented: for in this most cursed and execrable diuision, truth is made an enemie to all Christians, faith is not regarded, loue and charitie hated, hope is lost, iustice ouerthrowne, no kind of courage, or valiantnesse, but onely vnto mischiefe: modestie and temperance cloked, wisdome turned into deceit, humilitie fained, equitie and truth falsified, patience vtterlie fled, conscience small, all wickednesse intended, deuotion counted follie, gentlenesse abiect and cast away, religion despised, obedience not regarded, and all manner of life reprochfull and abominable. With how great and grieuous sorrowes is the Church of God replenished and filled, whilest that tyrants doe oppresse it, heretikes inuade it, vsers of simonie doe spoile and and rob it, and schismatikes goe about vtterly to subuert it? O most miserable and wretched Christian people, whom now by the space of fortie yeeres, wilfulich incurable and continuall schisme, they haue tormented, and almost brought to ruine! O the little barke and ship of Christ, which hath so long time wandred and strayed now in the middest of the whirlepooles, and by and by sticketh fast in the rocks, tossed to and fro with most grieuous and tempestuous stormes! O miserable and wretched boate of Peter, if she most holy father would suffer thee to sincke or drowne, into what dangers and perils haue the wicked pirats brought thee? amongst what rocks haue they placed thee? O most godly and louing Christians, what faithfull deuout man is there, which beholding and seeing the great ruine and decay of the Church, would not bee prouoked vnto teares? what good conscience is there, that can refraine weeping? because that contention and strife is powred vpon the ecclesiasticall rulers, which haue made vs to erre in the way: because they haue not found, or rather would not find the way of vnitie and concord: Whereupon so many heresies, and so great confusion is sprung vp, and growne in the flocke of Peter, and the fold of our Lord.

He stirreth vp the emperour to councell.

Many princes, kings and prelates, haue greatly laboured and trauelled for the rooting out hereof, but yet could they neuer bring to passe, or finish that most wholesome and necessary worke. Wherefore most Christian king, this most glorious and triumphant victorie hath tarried only for thee, the crowne and glorie thereof shall be thine for euer, and this most happy victorie shall be continually celebrate to thy great honour and praise, that thou hast restored againe the Church which was so spoiled, thou hast remooued and put away all inueterate and ouergrowne schismes and diuisions, thou hast trodden downe vsers of simonie, and rooted out all heretikes. Doest thou not behold and see how great, perpetuall and famous renowne and glorie will be vnto thee? For what can bee more iust, what more holy, what more better, what more to bee desired, or finally, what can be more acceptable, then to root out this wicked and abominable schisme, to restore the Church againe vnto her ancient libertie, to extinguish and put away all simonie, and to condemne and destroy all errours and heresies from amongst the flock of the faithfull? Nothing truely can bee better, nothing more holie, nothing more profitable for the whole world, and finally, nothing more acceptable vnto God. For the performance of which most holy and godly worke, thou wast elect and chosen of God, thou wast first deputed and chosen in heauen, before thou wast elect and chosen vpon earth. Thou wast first appointed by the celestiall and heauenlie prince, before the electors of the empire did elect or choose thee, and specially, that by the imperial force and power, thou shouldest condemne and destroy those errors and heresies, which we haue presently in hand to bee condemned and subuerted. To the performance of this most holy worke, God hath giuen vnto thee the knowledge and vnderstanding of his diuine truth and veritie, power of princely maiestie, and the iust iudgement of equitie and righteousnes, as the most highest himselfe doth say; I haue giuen thee vnderstanding and wisedome, to speake and vtter my words, and haue set thee to rule ouer nations and kingdomes, that thou shouldest helpe the people, plucke downe and destroy iniquity, and by exercising of iustice, thou shouldest, I say, destroy all errours and heresies, and specially this obstinate hereticke here present, through whose wickednesse and mischiefe, many places of the world are infected with most pestilent and hereticall poison, and by his meanes and occasion, almost vtterly subuerted and destroyed. This most holy and godly labour, O most noble prince, was reserued only for thee, vpon thee it doth onely lie, vnto whom the whole rule and ministration of iustice is giuen. Wherefore thou hast established thy praise and renowne, euen by the mouthes of infants and sucking babes, for thy praises shall bee celebrate for euermore, that thou hast destroyed and ouerthrowne such and so great enemies of the faith. The which that thou maist prosperously and happily performe and bring to passe, our Lord Iesus may vouchsafe to grant thee his grace and helpe, who is blessed for euer and euer, Amen.

Heere the vile flatterie of these papists is detected, which would haue any thing of the emperour for their purpose.

The matter of the Councell called for the reformation.

¶ When this Sermon was thus ended, the procurer of the Councell riling vp, named Henricus de Piro, required that the processe of the cause against John Hus might bee continued, and proceed vnto the definitiue sentence. Then a certaine bishop, which was appointed one of the Iudges, declared the processe of the cause, which was pleaded long since in the court of Rome and elsewhere, betweene John Hus and the prelates of Prage.

The Cardinall of Cambray commanded John Hus to keepe silence.

At the last he repeated those articles which twe haue before remembred, amongst the which hee rehearsed also one article, that John Hus should teach the two natures of the Godhead and manhood to be one Christ. John Hus went about briefly with a word or two to answere vnto euery one of them; but as often as he was about to speake, the cardinall of Cambray commanded him to hold his peace, saying: hereafter you shall answer to all together, if you will. Then said John Hus, how can I at once answer vnto all those things which are alleaged against mee, when as I cannot remember them all? Then said the cardinall of Florence, twe haue heard the sufficiently. But when as John Hus for all that would not hold his peace, they sent the officers which should force him thereunto. Then began he to intreate, pray, and beseech them, that they would heare him, that such as were present might not credit or beleeue those things to be true which were reported of him. But when all this would nothing preuaile, he kneeling downe vpon his knees, committed the whole matter vnto God, and the Lord Iesus Christ, for at their hands hee beleeued easily to obtaine that which he desired.

John Hus could not be heard in the councell.

John Hus committeth his cause to the Lord Christ.

When the articles aboue said were ended, last of all there was added a notable blasphemie, which they alinputed to John Hus. That is, that hee laid there should be a fourth person in diuinitie, and that a certaine body did beare him speake of the same. When John Hus desired that the doctor might bee named, the bishop which had alleaged the article, said, that it was not needfull to name him. Then said John Hus, O miserable and wretched man that I am, which am forced and compelled to beare such blasphemie and slander.

Sturdie the by shamefastnesse of them to falsifie what they list. John Hus against-dauncerd.

Afterward the article was repeated, how he appealed vnto Christ, and that by name, was called hereticall. Whereunto John Hus answered: O Lord Iesus Christ, whose word is openly condemned here in this councell, vnto this againe I doe appeale: which when thou was euill intreated of thine enemies, diddest appeale vnto God thy father, committing thy cause vnto a most iust Iudge, that by thy example, wee also being oppressed with manifest wrongs and iniuries, should flie vnto thee. Last of all, the article was rehearsed, as touching the contempt of the excommunication by John Hus. Whereunto he answered as before, that he was cruelly by his aduocates in the court of Rome, wherefore he did not appeare when he was cited: and also that it may be proued by the acts, that the excommunication was not ratified: and finally, to the intent he might cleare himself of obstinacie, he was for that cause come into Constance, vnder the emperors safe-conduct. When he had spoken these words, one of them which was appointed Iudge, read the definitiue sentence against him, which followeth thus word for word.

The Councell doth call it hereticall to appeale to Christ.

Contempt of the popes excommunication laid to John Hus.

The sentence or iudgement of the Councell of Constance giuen against John Hus.

The sentence read against John Hus.

The most holy and sacred generall Councell of Constance, being congregate and gathered together, representing the Catholike Church for a perpetuall memorie of the thing, as the veritie doth require, we euill reb bringeth forth euill fruit: hereupon it commeth, that the men of most damnable memorie John Wickliffe, though his pestiferous doctrine not through Iesus Christ by the gospell, as the holy fathers in times past, haue begotten faithfull children, but contrarie vnto the wholesome faith of Iesus Christ, as a most venemous rote, hath begotten many pestilent and wicked children, whom hee hath left behind him, successors and followers of his peruerse and wicked doctrine, against whom this sacred Synode of Constance is forced to rise vp, as against bastards and vnlawfull children, and with diligent care, with the sharpe knife of the ecclesiasticall authoritie, to cut vp their errours out of the Lords field, as most hurtfull brambles and briers, lest they should grow to the hurt and detriment of others.

Many shall come in my name and shall deceive many: Marke 13.

Forsomuch then as in the holy generall Councell lately celebrated and holden at Rome, it was decreed, that the doctrine of John Wickliffe of most damnable memorie, should be condemned, and that his bookes which contained the same doctrine, should be burned as hereticall, and this decree was approued and confirmed by the sacred authoritie of the whole Councell: neuertheless one John Hus here personallie present in this sacred Councell, not the disciple of Christ, but of John Wickliffe, an archheretike, after, and contrarie, or against the condemnation and decree, hath taught, preached and affirmed the articles of Wickliffe, which were condemned by the Church of God, and in times past by certaine most reuerend fathers in Christ, lords, archbishops and bishops, of diuers kingdomes and realmes, masters of diuinitie of diuers Vniuersities: especiallie resisting in his open sermons, and also with his adherents and complices in the schooles, the condemnation of the said articles of Wickliffes, oftentimes published in the said Vniuersitie of Prage, and hath declared him the said Wickliffe, for the fauour and commendation of his doctrine, before the whole multitude of the clergie and people, to bee a Catholicke man, and a true Euangelicall doctor. He hath also published and affirmed certaine and many of his articles worthilie condemned, to bee catholicke, the which are notoriouslie contained in the bookes of the said John Hus.

To appeale to Christ to deliuer vs from the popes hollinesse.

Therefore, after diligent deliberation and full information had vpon the premisses by the reuerend fathers and lords in Christ of the holy Church of Rome, cardinals, patriarks, archbishops, bishops, and other prelates, doctors of diuinitie, and of both lawes in great number assembled and gathered together, this most sacred and holie Councell of Constance declareth and determineth the articles aboue said (the which) which after due conference had, are found in his bookes written with his owne hand, the which also the said John Hus in open audience, before this holy Councell, hath confessed to be in his bookes: not to be catholicke, neither worthie to bee taught, but if many of them are erroneous, some of them to be wicked, other some to be offensiue vnto godly eares, many of them to be temerarious and seditious, and the greater part of them to be notoriouslie hereticall, and euen now of late by the holy fathers and generall councels, reproued and condemned. And forsomuch as the said articles are expressely contained in the bookes of the said John Hus, therefore this said sacred Councell, doth condemne and reproue all those bookes which he wrote in what forme or phrase soeuer they be, or whether they be translated by others; and doth determine and decree, that they all shall be solemnlie and openlie burned in the presence of the clergie and people of the citie of Constance, and elsewhere: adding moreouer for the premisses, that all his doctrine is worthie to be despised and eschewed of all faithfull Christians. And to the intent this most pernitious and wicked doctrine, may be vtterlie excluded and shut out of the Church, this sacred Synode both straitly command, that diligent inquisition be made by the ordinaries of the places by the ecclesiasticall censure, for such treatises and works, and that such as are found, be confumed and burned with fire. And if there be any found, which shall contemne or despise this sentence or decree, this sacred Synode ordaineth and decreeth that the ordinaries of the places, and the inquisitors of heresies, shall proceed against euery such person as suspect of heresie.

The sentence read against John Hus.

Wherefore, after due inquisition made against the said John Hus, and full information had by the commissaries and doctors of both lawes, and also by the sayings of the witnesses which were worthie of credit, and many other things openly read before the said John Hus, and before the fathers and prelates of this sacred Councell (by the which allegations of the witnesses it appeareth that the said John Hus hath taught many euill and offensiue, seditious, and perilous heresies, and hath preached the same by a long time) this most sacred and holy Synode lawfully congregate and gathered together in the holy Ghost, the name of Christ being inuocate and called vpon, by this their sentence which here is set forth in writing, determineth, pronounceth, declareth, and decreeth, that John Hus was and is a true and manifest hereticke, and that he hath preached openly errors and heresies lately condemned by the Church of God, and many other seditious, temerarious, and offensiue things to no small offence of the diuine maiestie, and of the vniuersall Church, and detriment of the catholicke faith and church, neglecting and despising the keies of the Church, and ecclesiasticall censures. In the which his errors he hath continued with a mind altogether indurate and hardned by the space of many yeeres, much offending the faith of Christians by his obstinacie and stubburnesse, when as he made his appeale vnto the Lord Iesus Christ, as the most high iudge, omitting and leauing all ecclesiasticall meanes. In the which his appeale hee alleaged many false, iniurious, and offensiue matters, in contempt of the Apostolike see and the ecclesiasticall censures and keies.

Vtterlie condemned for heretike.

Wherevpon both for the premisses and many other things, the said Synode pronounceth John Hus to be an hereticke, and iudgeth him by these presents to be condemned and iudged as an heretike; and reprooueth the said appeale as iniurious, offensiue, and done in derision vnto the ecclesiastical iurisdiction, and iudgeth the said Hus, not only to haue seduced the Christian people by his writings and preachings, and specialie in the kingdomie of Boheme, neither to haue been a true preacher of the Gospell of Christ vnto the said people, according to the exposition of the holy doctors: but also to haue been a seducer of them, and also an obstinate and stiffnecked person, yea and such a one as doth not desire to returne againe to the lap of our holy mother the Church, neither to abiure the errors and heresies which hee hath openly preached and defended. Wherefore this most sacred Councell decreeth and declareth, that the said John Hus, shall be famouslie deposed and degraded from his priestly orders and dignitie, &c.

John Hus cleareth himselfe of obstinate.

¶ Whilest these things were thus read, John Hus, albeit he were forbidden to speake, notwithstanding he did often interrupt them, and specially when he was reproued of obstinacie, he said with a loud voice: I was neuer obstinat, but as alwaies heretofore, euen so now againe I desire to be taught by the holy Scriptures, and I doe professe my selfe to be so desirous of the truth, that if I might by one onelie word subuert the errors of all heretikes, I would not refuse to enter into that perill or danger forthet it were. When his bookes were condemned, he said: Wherefore haue you condemned those bookes, whereas you haue not proued by any one article, that they are contrary to the Scriptures, or articles of faith? And moreouer, what iniurie is this that you doo to me, that you haue condemned these bookes written in the Bohemian tongue, which you neuer saw, neither yet read? And oftentimes looking vp vnto heauen, he prayed.

They condemne the bookes written in the Bohemian tongue, which they neuer read.

They shall bring you before their consistories, where you shall be sure of no iustice.

You prayed for your enemies.

When the sentence and iudgement was ended, kneeling downe vpon his knees, hee said: Lord Iesus Christ, forgiue mine enemies, by whom thou knowest that I am falsly accused, and that they haue vsed false witnesse and slanders against me; forgiue them I say, for thy great mercies sake. This his prayer and oration the greater part, and specially the chiefe of the priests, did deride and mocke.

Pardon all thing you before kings and principants for my name, &c. Luk. 21.

John Hus commanded to put on the priestly garments.

At the last, the seuen bishops which were chosen out to degrade him of his priesthad, commanded him to put on the garments pertaining vnto priesthood, which thing when hee had done, vntil hee came to the putting on of the Albe, he called to his remembrance the white vesture which Herode put vpon Iesus Christ in mock him withall. So likewise in all other things he did comfort himselfe by the example of Christ. When he had now put on all his priestly vestures, the bishops exhorted him that hee should yet alter and change his mind and purpose, and prouide for his honour and safegard. Then he (according as the manner of the ceremonie is) going vp to the top of the scaffold, being full of teares, hee spake vnto the people in this sort.

John Hus his oration vnto the people.

These lords and bishops doe exhort and counsell me, that I should here confesse before you all that I haue erred; the which thing to doe, if it were such as might be done with the infamie and reproch of any man, they might peraduenture easily perswade me thereunto: but now truely I am in the sight of the Lord my God, without whose great ignominie, and grudge of mine owne conscience, I can by no meanes doe that which they require of me. For I doe well know, that I neuer taught any of those things which they haue falsllie alleaged against me, but I haue alwaies preached, taught, written and thought contrarie thereunto. With what countenance then should I behold the heauens? With what face should I looke vpon them, whom I haue taught, wherof there is a great number, if through me it should come to passe that those things which they haue hitherto knowne to bee most certaine and sure, should now be made vncertaine? Should I by this my example astonish or trouble so many soules, so many consciences, indued with the most firme and certaine knowledge of the Scriptures, and Gospell of our Lord Iesus Christ and his most pure doctrine, armed against all the assaults of Satan? I will neuer doe it, neither commit any such kind of offence, that I should seeme more to esteeme this vile carcase appointed vnto death, then their health and saluation. At this most godly word hee was forced againe to heare by the consent of the bishops, that hee did obstinately and maliciously persuere in his pernitious and wicked errors.

The degrading of John Hus.

Then he was commanded to come down to the execution of his iudgement, and in his comming downe, one of the seuen bishops afore rehearsed, first tooke away the chalice from him which he held in his hand, saying: Deuised Iudas, why hast thou forsaken the counsell and waies of peace, and hast counselled with the Iewes? we take away from thee this chalice of thy saluation. But John Hus received this curse in this manner: but I trust vnto God the father omnipotent, and my Lord Iesus Christ, for whose sake I doe suffer these things, that he will not take away the chalice of his redemption, but haue a stedfast and firme hope that this day I shall drinke thereof in his kingdome. Then followed the other bishops in order, which euery one of them take away the vestiments from him, which they had put on, eth one of them giuing him their curse. Whereunto John Hus answered, that he did willingly embrace and beare those blasphemies for the name of the Lord Iesus Christ. At the last they came to the rasing of his shauen crowne. But before the bishops would goe in hand with it, there was a great contention betweene them, with what instrument it should bee done, with a rasor, or with a paire of sheares.

The words of John Hus when the emperour.

In the meane season John Hus turning himselfe toward the emperour, said: I maruell, that forsomuch as they bee all of like cruell mind and stomacke, yet they cannot agree vpon their kind of cruelti. Notwithstanding, at the last they agreed to cut off the shrine of the crowne of his head with a paire of sheares. And when they had done that, they added these words: Now hath the church taken away all her ornaments and priuiledges from him. Now there resteth nothing else, but that he be deliuered ouer vnto the secular power. But before they did that, there yet remained another knacke of reproch. For they caused to be made a certaine crowne of paper, almost a cubit depe, in the which were painted three diuels of wonderfull vgly shape, and this title set ouer their heads, Heresiarcha. The which when hee saw, hee said: My Lord Iesus Christ for my sake did weare a crowne of thorne: why should not I then for his sake againe weare this light crowne, bee it neuer so ignominious? Truly I will doe it, and that willingly. When it was set vpon his head, the bishops said: now wee commit the soule vnto the diuell. But I, said John Husse lifting his eies vp towards the heauens) doe commit my spirit into thy hands: O Lord Iesus Christ, vnto thee I commend my spirit which thou hast redeemed. These contumelious opprobries thus ended, the bishops turning themselues towards the Emperour, said: This most sacred Synode of Constance, leaueth now John Hus, which hath no more any office, nor doe in the Church of God, vnto the civill iudgement and power. Then the emperor commanded Ludouicus duke of Bauaria, which stood before him in his robes, holding the golden appell with the crosse in his hand, that he should receiue Iohn Hus of the bishops, and deliuer him vnto them which should doe the execution. By whom, as he was led to the place of execution, before the church doores hee saw his bookes burning, whereat he smiled and laughed. And all men that he passed by, hee exhorted, not to thinke that he should die for any errour or heresie, but only for the hatred and ill will of his aduersaries, which had charged him with most false and vniust crimes. All the whole citie in a manner being in armor, followed him.

The protestation of Iohn Hus as he was led to the place of execution.

The place appointed for the execution, was before the gate Gotlebian, betweene the gardens and the gates of the suburbs. Then as Iohn Hus was come thither, kneeling downe vpon his knees, and lifting his eies vp vnto heauen, he prayed, and said certaine Psalmes, and specially the 50. 31. psalmes. And they which stood hard by, heard him oftentimes in his prayer, with a merrie and chearefull countenance repeate this verse: Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit, &c. Which thing when the lay people beheld which stood nere vnto him, they said: that he hath done afore, we know not, but now we see and heare that hee doth speake and pray very deuoutly and godlie. Othersome wished that hee had a confessor. There was a certaine priest by, sitting on horseback in a greene goune drawne about with red silke, which said, hee ought not to bee heard, because he is an hereticke. Yet notwithstanding, whilest he was in prison, he was both confessed, and also absolued by a certaine doctour, a monke, as Hus himselfe doth witnesse in a certaine Epistle which hee wrote vnto his friends out of prison. Thus Christ raigneth vnknowne vnto the world, euen in the midst of his enemies. In the meane time whilest hee prayed, as hee bowed his necke backward to looke vpward vnto heauen, the crowne of paper fell off from his head vpon the ground. Then one of the souldiers taking it vp againe, said: let us put it againe vpon his head, that he may be burned with his masters the diuels vpon he hath serued.

Ex Epist. Ioan. Hus. 31. The paper which diuels fell from his head. At the prayer of Iohn Hus the paper with the diuels fell downe.

Then as by the commandement of the tormentors, he was risen vp from the place of his prayer, with a loud voice he said: Lord Iesus Christ assist and helpe me, that with a constant and patient mind, by thy most gratious helpe, I may beare and suffer this cruell and ignominious death, wherevnto I am condemned for the preaching of thy most holy Gospell and word. Then as before, he declared the cause of his death vnto the people. In the meane season the hangman stripped him of his garments, and turning his hands behind his backe, tied him fast vnto the stake with ropes that were made wet. And where as by chance he was turned towards the East, certaine cried out that hee should not looke towards the East, for hee was an heretike: so he was turned towards the West. Then was his necke tied with a chaine vnto the stake, the which chaine when he beheld, smiling he said, that he would willingly receiue the same chaine for Iesus Christs sake, whom hee knew was bound with a farre worse chaine. Vnder his feete they set two fagots, admiring straw withall, and so likewise from the feet vp to the chin, hee was inclosed in round about with wood. But before the wood was set on fire, Ludouicus duke of Bauaria, with another gentleman with him, which was the same of Clemunt, came and exhorted Iohn Hus, that hee would yet be mindfull of his safegard, and renounce his errors. To whom he said, what errour should I renounce, when as I know my selfe guiltie of none? For, as for those things which are falsly alleaged against me, I know that I neuer did so much as once thinke them, much lesse preach them. For this was the principall end and purpose of my doctrine, that I might teach all men penance and remission of sinnes, according to the veritie of the Gospell of Iesus Christ, and the exposition of the holie doctors: wherefore with a chearefull mind and courage I am here readie to suffer death. When hee had spoken these words, they left him, and making hands together they departed.

Pardon offered against to Iohn Hus.

The last confession of Iohn Hus.

Then was the fire kindled, and Iohn Hus began to sing with a loud voice, Iesus Christ the son of the liuing God haue mercie vpon me. And when he began to say the same the third time, the wind drone the flame so vpon his face, that it choked him. Yet notwithstanding he moued a while after, by the space that a man might almost say three times the Lords prayer. When all the wood was burned and consumed, the vpper part of the body was left hanging in the chaine, the which they threw downe flake and all, and making a new fire burned it, the head being first cut in small gobbets, that it might the sooner bee consumed vnto ashes. The heart, which was found amongst the bowels, being well beaten with staues and clubs, was at last pricked vpon a sharpe sticke, and rosted at a fire apart vntill it was consumed. Then with great diligence gathering the ashes together, they cast them into the riuer of Rhene, that the least remnant of the ashes of that man should not bee left vpon the earth, whose memorie notwithstanding cannot be abolished out of the minds of the godlie, neither by fire, neither by water, neither by any kind of torment.

¶ I know very well that these things are very slenderlie written of me as touching the labors of this most holie martyr Iohn Hus, with whom the labors of Hercules are not to be compared. For that ancient Hercules slew a few monsters: but this our Hercules with a most stout and valiant courage hath subdued euen the world it selfe, the mother of all monsters and cruell beasts. This storie were worthie some other kind of more curious handling; but forsomuch as I cannot otherwise performe it my selfe, I haue endeuoured according ro: dling to the very truth, as the thing was indeed, to commend the same vnto all godly minds: neither haue I heard it reported by others, but I my selfe was present at the doing of all these things, and as I was able I haue put them in writing, that by this my labour and endeuour howsoeuer it were, I might preserue the memorie of this holy man and excellent doctor of the Euangelicall truth.

What was the name of this author which wrote this storie, it is not here expressed. Cochleus in his 2. booke contra Hussitas, supposeth his name to be Ioannes Pizibram, a Bohemian. Who afterward succeeding in the place of I. Hus at Prage, at last is thought to relent to the papists.

M. Iohn Pisybram is thought to be his name. Ex Cochleo lib. 2. de H. Hussita.

This godly seruant and martyr of Christ was condemned by the cruell councell, and burned at Constance, an. 1415. about the moneth of Iulie.

How grieuous this death of I. Hus was taken among the nobles of Boheme and of Pozania, hereafter (Christ willing) shall appeare by their leters which they sent vnto the Councell, and by the letters of Sigismund the king of Romanes, written vnto them. Wherein hee laboureth, all that he can, to purge and excuse himselfe, of Hus his death. Albeit hee was not altogether free from that cruell fact, and innocent from that bloud: yet notwithstanding he pretendeth in words so to wipe away that blot from him, that the greatest part of that crime seemeth to rest vpon the bloudie prelates of that councell, as the words of the king doe purport in forme as followeth.

Ex Cochleo. de hist. Hussit. lib. 4.

The Emperour excuseth himselfe of the death of Iohn Hus.

Interea (inquit) nobis adhuc in partibus Rheni existentibus, peruenit ad Constantiam, &c. i. In the meane time as we were about the coasts of Rhene, Iohn Hus went to Constance, and there was arrested, as is not to you vnknowne. Who if he had first reported vnto vs, and had gone with vs vp to the Councel, perhaps it had been otherwise with him. And God knoweth, what griefe and sorrow it was to our heart, to see it so to fall out, as with no words can be well expressed. Whereof all the Bohemians, which were there present, can beare vs witnes, seeing and beholding how carefull and sollicitous we were in labouring for him: In so much that we many times with anger and furie departed out of the councell and not only out of the councell, but also went out of the citie of Constance taking his part, vnto such time as the rulers of the Councell sending vnto vs, said: That if we would not permit them to prosecute that, which right required in the Councell, what should they then do in the place? Whereupon thus we thought with our selues, that here was nothing else for vs more to doe, nor yet to speake in this case, forasmuch the whole Councell otherwise had been dissolued. Where is to bee noted moreouer, that in Constance the same time there was not one clerke, or two, but there were ambassadours for all kings and princes in Christendome, especially since the time that (Petrus de Luna giuing ouer) all those kings and princes which tooke his part, came to vs: so that whatsoeuer good was to be done, it was now to be passed in this present councel, &c. Ex Epist. Imper. Sigismund. ad Nobiles, &c.

¶ By this it may appeare that the Emperour as partly ashamed and sorie of that which was done, would gladly haue cleared himselfe thereof, and haue washed his hands with Pilate: yet he could not so cleare himselfe, but that a great portion of that murder remained in him to be noted, and well worthy of reprehension: as may both appeare by his last words spoken in the Councell to Iohn Hus, whereof Iohn Hus in his Epistles complaineth, writing to certaine of his friends in Bohemia in his 33. Epistle, as by his words may appeare here following.

Ex Epist. Ioh. Hus 33.

The emperour beseecheth to Iohn Hus.

I Desire you yet againe for the loue of God, that the lords of Bohemie ioyning together, will desire the king for a finall audience to be giuen me. Forsomuch as he alone said to me in the Councell, that they should giue me audience shortly, and that I should answere for my selfe briefly in writing: it will bee to his great confusion, if he shall not performe that which he hath spoken. But I feare that word of his will be as firme and sure, as the other was concerning my safe-conduct granted by him. Certaine there were in Bohemia, which willed me to beware of his safe-conduct. And other said: hee will surely giue you to your enemies. And the Lord Mikest Dwekie told me in secret before M. Iessenitz, saying: Master, know it for certaine you shall be condemned. And this I suppose he spake, knowing before the intention of the king. I hoped well that hee had been well affected toward the law of God and the truth, and had therein good intelligence: now I conceiue that he is not greatly skilfull nor so prudentlie circumspect in himselfe. Hee condemned me before mine enemies did. Who, if it had pleased him, might haue kept the moderation of Pilate the Gentile, which said: I find no cause in this man or at least if he had said but thus: Behold, I haue giuen him his safe-conduct safely to returne. And if he will not abide the decision of the Councel, I will send him home to the king of Bohemia, with your sentence and attestations, that hee with his Clergy may iudge him. But now I heare by the relatiō of Henry Lessl, and of other, that he will ordaine for me sufficient audience: And if I will not submit my selfe to the iudgement of the Councell, he will send me safe, the contrary way, &c.

Blame meete inderate to Christen Emperours in Iohn Hus.

This Iohn Hus being in prison, wrote diuers treatises, as of the commandements, of the Lords prayer, of mortall sin, of matrimonie, of the knowledge and loue of God, of three enemies of mankind, the world, the flesh, and the diuell, of penance, of the Sacrament of the bodie and bloud of the Lord, of the sufficiencie of the law of God to rule the Church, &c. He wrote also diuers Epistles and letters to the lords, and to his friends of Boheme: And in his writings did foreshew many things before to come, touching the reformation of the church: and seemeth in the prison to haue had diuers prophetical reuelations shewed to him of God. Certaine of which his letters, and predictions, I thought here vnderneath to inlert, in such sort, as neither in reciting all I will ouercharge the volume too much: nor yet in reciting of none, I will be so briefe, but that the reader may haue some taste, and take some profit of the Christian writings and doings of this blessed man: First, beginning with the letter of the lord Clum, concerning the safe-conduct of Iohn Hus.

TO all and singuler that shall see and heare these presents, I Iohn de Clum doe it to vnderstand, how master Iohn Hus bachelar of diuinitie, vnder the safe-conduct and protection of the renoumed prince and lord Sigismund of Romans semper Augustus, and king of Hungarie, &c. my gratious lord, and vnder the protection, defence, and safegard of the holie Empire of Rome, hauing the letters patent of the said my lord king of Romans, &c. came vnto Constance to render a full count of his faith in publike audience to all that would require the same. This the said M. Iohn Hus, in this imperiall citie of Constance, vnder the safe-conduct of the said my lord king of Romans, hath bin and yet is detained. And although the pope with the cardinals haue bin seriously required, by solemne Ambassadors of the said my lord king of Romans, &c. in the kings name and behalfe, that the said M. Iohn Hus should bee set at libertie, and bee restored vnto mee, yet notwithstanding they haue and yet doe refuse hitherto to set him at liberty, to the great contempt and derogation of the safe-conduct of the king, and of the safegard and protection of the Empire, or emperiall maiestie. Wherefore I Iohn aforesaid in the name of the king, doe here publish and make it knowne, that the apprehending and detaining of the said M. Iohn Hus, was done wholie against the will of the forenamed king of Romans my lord, seeing it is done in the contempt of the safe-conduct of his subiects, and of the protection of the empire, because that the said my lord was then absent farre from Constance, and if hee had been there present, would neuer haue permitted the same. And when he shall come, it is to be doubted of no man, but that he for this great iniurie, and contempt of this safe-conduct done to him and to the empire, will grieuouslie be molested for the same. Giuen at Constance, in the day of the natiuitie of the Lord, 1414.

¶ In this instrument aboue prefixed note (gentle Reader) three things.

First, the godnesse of this gentle lord Iohn de Clum, being so feruent and zealous in the cause of Iohn Hus, or rather in the cause of Christ.

Secondly, the safe-conduct granted vnto the said Iohn Hus, vnder the faith and protection of the Emperour, and of the empire.

Thirdly, here is to be seene the contempt and rebellion of these proud prelates in disobeying the authoritie of their high Magistrate, who contrarie to his safe-conduct giuen, and the mind of the emperour, did arrest and imprison this good man, before the comming of the said emperour, and before that Iohn Hus was heard. Let vs note, as we haue promised, aduerse some of the epistles of this godly man.

An Epistle of Iohn Hus, vnto the people of Prage in his owne vulgar speech.

A letter of Iohn Hus to the people of Prage.

GRace and peace from our Lord Iesus Christ, that you being deliuered from sinne, may walke in his grace, and may grow in all modestie and vertue, and after this may enioy eternall life.

Dearely beloued, I beseech you which walk after the law of God, that you cast not away the care of the saluation of your soules, when as you hearing the word of God, are premonished wittily to vnderstand that you be not deceiued by false Apostles: which doe not reprehend the sinnes of men, but rather doe extenuate and diminish them, which flatter the priests, and do not shew to the people their offences: which magnifie themselues, boast their owne workes, and maruellouslie extoll their owne worthinesse, but follow not Christ in his humilitie, in pouertie, in the crosse and other manifold afflictions. Of whom our mercifull sauiour did premonish vs before, saying: False Christs and false Prophets shall rise, and shall deceiue many. And when he had forewarned his welbeloued disciples, he said vnto them: Beware and take heed of false prophets, which come to you in sheepes clothing, but inwardly are ra-uening wolues: yee shall know them by their fruits. And truth it is, that the faithfull of Christ haue much neede diligently to beware and take heed vnto themselues. For as our Sauiour himselfe doth say: the elect also, if it were possible, shal be brought into error. Whereforemy welbeloued, be circumspect and watchfull, that ye be not circumuented with the craftie traines of the diuell. And the more circumspect ye ought to be, for that antichrist laboureth the more to trouble you. The last iudgement is neere at hand: death shall swallow vp many, but to the elect children of God, the kingdom of God draweth neere, because for them hee gaue his owne bodie. Feare not death, loue together one another, persieure in vnderstanding the good will of God without ceasing. Let the terrible and horrible day of iudgement bee alwaies before your eies, that you sinne not: and also the ioy of eternall life, whereunto you must endeuour. Furthermore, let the passion of our Sauiour be neuer out of your minds; that you may beare with him and for him gladly, whatsoeuer shall be laid vpon you. For if you shall consider well in your minds his crosse and afflictions, nothing shall be grieuous vnto you, and patientlie you shall giue place to tribulations, cursings, rebukes, stripes, and prisonment, and shall not doubt to giue your liues moreouer for his holy truth, if need require. Know yee welbeloued, that antichrist being stirred vp against you, deuiseth diuers persecutions. And many he hath not hurt, no not the least haire of their heads, as by mine owne example I can testifie, although hee hath been vehemently incensed against me. Wherefore I desire you all, with your prayers to make intercession for mee to the Lord, to giue me intelligence, sufferance, patience and constancie, that I neuer swarue from his diuine veritie. He hath brought me now to Constance. In all my iournie openly and manifestly, I haue not feared to vtter my name as becommeth the seruant of God. In no placke I kept my selfe secret, nor vsed any dissimulation. But neuer did I find in any place more pestilent and manifest enemies then at Constance. Which enemies neither should I haue had there, had it not been for certaine of our owne Bohemians, hypocrites and deceiuers, who for benefits receiued and stirred vp with couetousnesse, with boasting and bragging haue perswaded the people that I went about to seduce them out of the right way. But I am in good hope that through the mercie of our God, and by your praiers, I shal persist stronglie in the immutable veritie of God, vnto the last breath. Finally, I would not haue you ignorant, that whereas euery one here is put in his office, I onely as an outcast amnegested, &c. I commend you to the mercifull Lord Iesus Christ, our true God, & the sweet of the immaculate virgin Mary, which hath redeemed vs by his most bitter death, without all our merits, from eternall paines, from the thraldome of the diuell, and from sinne. From Constance the yeere of our Lord, 1415.

Another letter of Iohn Hus to his benefactors.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

MY gratious benefactors and defenders of the truth, I exhort you by the bowels of Iesus Christ, that now ye setting aside the vanities of this present world, will giue your seruice to the eternall king, Christ the Lord. Trust not in princes, nor in the sonnes of men, in whom there is no health. For the sons of men are dissemblers and deceitfull. To day they are, to morrow they perish, but God remaineth for euer. Who hath his seruants, not for any neede he hath of them, but for their owne profit: vnto whom he performeth that which hee promiseth, and fulfilleth that which he purposeth to giue. He casteth off no faithfull seruant from him, for he faith: Where I am, there also shall my seruant be. And that Lord that maketh euery seruant of his to be the Lord of all his possession, giuing himselfe vnto him, and with himselfe, all things: that without all rediousnesse, feare, and without all defect, he may possesse al things, reioycing with all Saints in ioy infinite. O happie is that seruant, whom, when the Lord shall come, hee shall find watching. Happie is the seruant which shal receiue that king of glorie with ioy. Wherefore, welbeloued Lords, and benefactors, serue you that king in feare: which shall bring you, as I trust, now to Boheme at this present, by his grace in health, and hereafter, to eternall life of glorie. Fare you well: For I thinke that this is the last letter that I shall write to you: whereto morrow, as I suppose, shall be purged in hope of Iesus Christ, through bitter death, from my sinnes. The things that happened to me this night, I am not able to write. Sigismund hath done al things with me deceitfully. God forgiue him and only for your sakes. You also heard the sentence which he awarded against mee. I pray you haue no suspition of faithfull Vitus.

Another letter to the lord Iohn de Clum.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

MOst gratious benefactor in Christ Iesus, dearelie beloued, yet I reioyce not a little, that by the grace of God I may write vnto your honour. By you letter, which I receiued yesterday, I vnderstand, first how the iniquitie of the great strumpet, that is, of the malignant congregation (whereof mention is made in the Apocalyps) is detected, and shal be more detected. With the which strumpet, the kings of the earth doe commit fornication, fornicating spiritually from Christ, and as is there said, sliding backe from the truth, and consenting to the lies of antichrist, through his seduction and through feare, or through hope of confederacie, for getting of worldly honour. Secondly, I perceiued by your letter, how the enemies of the truth begin now to be troubled. Thirdly, I perceiued the feruent constancy of your charity, wherewith you professe the truth boldly. Fourthly, with ioy I perceiued ỹ you mind now to giue ouer the vanitie and painfull seruice of this present world, and to serue the Lord Iesus Christ quietly at home. Whom to serue is to raigne, as Gregorie saith. Whom he that serueth faithfullie, hath Iesus Christ himselfe in the kingdome of heauen to minister vnto him, as hee himselfe saith: Blessed is that seruant, whom when the Lord shall come, he shall find waking, and so doing. Verely I say vnto you, that he rising, shall gird himselfe, and shall minister to him. This doe not the kings of the world to their seruants: whom only they doe loue so long as they are profitable and necessarie for their commodities, &c.

Another Epistle of Iohn Hus, wherein he declareth

why God suffereth not his to perish, bringing diuers examples, wherewith he doth comfort and confirme both himselfe and other.

THe Lord God be with you. Many causes there were, welbeloued in God my deare friends, which moued me to thinke that those letters were the last, which before I sent vnto you, looking that same time for instant death. But now vnderstanding the same to be deferred, I take it for great comfort vnto me, that I haue some leisure more to talke with you by letters: and therefore I write againe to you, to declare and testifie at least, my gratitude and mindeful dutie toward you. And as touching death, God doth know why he doth defer it both to me and to my welbeloued brother M. Ieron, who I trust will die holily and without blame: and do know also that he doth, and suffereth now more valiantly, then I my selfe a wretched sinner. God hath giuen vs a long time, that we might call to memorie our sinnes the better, and repent for the same more feruentlie. He hath granted vs time, that our long and great temptation should put away our grieuous sinnes, and bring the more consolation. He hath giuen vs time, wherein we should remember the horrible rebukes of our merciful king and Lord Iesus, and should ponder his cruell death, and so more patiently might learne to beare our afflictions. And moreouer that wee might keepe in remembrance, how that the ioyes of the life to come, are not giuen after the ioyes of this world immediatly, but through many tribulations the saints haue entred into the kingdom of heauen. For some of them haue bin cut and chopt all to peeces, some their eies bored through, some sod, some rosted, some slaine aliue, some buried quicke, stoned, crucified, grinded betwixt milstones, drawne and haled hither and thither vnto execution, drowned in waters, strangled and hanged, torne in peeces, vexed with rebukes before their death, pined in prisons, and afflicted in bands. And who is able to recite al the torments and sufferings of the holy saints, which they suffered vnder the old and new Testament for the veritie of God: namely those which haue at any time rebuked the malice of the priests, or haue preached against their wickednesse? And it will be a maruell if any man now also shall escape vnpunished, whosoeuer dare boldly resist the wickednesse and peruersitie, especiallie of those priests, which can abide no correction. And I am glad that they are compelled now to reade my bookes, in the which their malice is somewhat described: and I know they haue read the same more exactly and diligently, then the holy Gospell, seeking therein to find out errors. Another letter of Iohn Hus, wherein he rehearseth what iniu-ries he receiued of the councell, and of the deputies.

IF my letter be not sent yet to Boheme, keepe it and send it not, for hurt may come thereof, &c.

Item, if the king doe aske, who ought to be my iudge, since that the Councell neither did call me, nor did cite mee, neither was I euer accused before the Councell, and yet the Councell hath imprisoned mee, and hath appointed their proctor against me.

Item, I desire you right noble and gratious Lord Iohn, if audience shall be giuen me, that the king will be there present himselfe, and that I may haue a place appointed neere vnto him, that he may heare me well and vnderstand what I say: and that you also with the Lord Henrie, and with Lord Wencelaus and other mo, if you may, will be present, and heare what the Lord Iesus Christ my procurator and aduocate, and most gratious iudge, will put in my mouth to speake, that whether I liue or die, you may bee true and vpright witnesses with me, lest lying lips shal say hereafter that I swaued away from the truth which I haue preached.

Item, know you that before witnesses and notaries in the prison, I desired the commissioners that they would depute vnto me a proctor and an aduocate, who promised so to do, and afterward would not performe it. Wherefore I haue committed my selfe to the Lord Iesus Christ that hee will bee my procurator and aduocate and iudge of my cause.

Item, know you, that they haue as I suppose no other quarel against me, but only this, that I stood against the popes bull, which which pope Iohn sent downe to Boheme, to sanctifie war with the signe of the crosse and full remission of sinnes, to all them which would take the holy crosse to fight for the patrimonie of the Romish church against Ladislaus king of Naples, and they haue mine owne writing which was read against me, and I do acknowledge it to be mine. Secodly, they haue also against me, that I haue continued so long in excommunication, and yet did take vpon me to minister in the church and say Masse. Thirdly, they haue against me, because I did appeale from the pope to Christ. For they read my appeale before mee, the which with a willing mind, smiling I confessed before them all to be mine. Fourthly, because I left a certaine letter behind me, which was read in the church of Bethleem, the which letter my aduersaries haue verie euil fauouredly translated, and sinisterly expounded, in the which I did write that I went out without a safe-conduct. Whereunto you your selues can say and beare me record, that I in my going out, had no safe-conduct of the pope, neither yet did I know whether you should go out with me when I wrote that letter.

Item, if audience may be giuen to me, and that after the same audience the king would suffer me not to be returned againe into prison, but that I may haue your counsels and others my friends: and if it may please God that I may say some thing to my soueraigne lord the king, for the behalfe of christianity, and for his owne profit, &c.

Another letter of Iohn Hus, wherein he confirmeth the Bohemians, and describeth the wickednesse of that Councell.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

IOhn Hus in hope the seruant of God, to all the faithfull in Boheme, which loue the Lord, greeting through the grace of God. I commeth in my mind, wherein I must needs admonish you, that be the faithfull and beloued of the Lord, how that the councell of Constance being full of pride, auarice, and all abomination, hath condemned my bookes written in the Boheme tongue, for heretical, which bookes they neuer saw, nor euer heard them read: And if they had heard them, yet they could not vnderstand the same, being some Italians, some Frenchmen, some Britaines, some Spaniards, Germaines, with other people of other nations moe: vnlesse peraduenture Iohn bishop of Litomish vnderstood them, which was present in that councell, and certaine other Bohemians, and priests which are against me, and labour all they may how to depraue both the verity of God, and the honestie of our countrie of Boheme. Which I iudge in the hope of God, to be a godly land, right well giuen to the true knowledge of the faith, for that it doth so greatly desire the word of God, and honest maners. And if you were heere at Constance, ye should see the grieuous abomination of this councell, which they call so holy, and such as cannot erre. Of the which councel I haue heard it by the Swechers reported, that the citie of Constance is not able in thirty yeeres to be purged of the wicked abominations in that councell committed. And all be offended almost with that councell, being sore grieued to behold such execrable things perpetrate in the same.

The councell condemne bookes which they vnderstand not.

Phalse of Bohemia. The abomination of the councell of Constance described.

When I stood first to answere before mine aduersaries, seeing all things there done with no order, and hearing them also outragiously crying out, I said plainly vnto them, that I looked for more honest behauiour, and better order and discipline, in that councell. Then the chiefe cardinall answered, Saiest thou so? but in the tower thou spakest more modestly. To whom, said I: In the tower no man cried out against me, where as now all do rage against me. My faithfull and beloued in Christ, be not afraid with their sentence in condemning my bookes. They shall be scattered hither and thither abroad, like light butterflies, and their statutes shall endure as Spiderwebs. They went about to shake my constancie from the veritie of Christ: but they could not ouercome the vertue of God in me. They would not reason with the Scriptures against me, as diuers honorable lords can witnes with me, which being readie to suffer contumelie for the truth of God, tooke my part stoutly: namely lord Wencesslaus de Duba, and lord Iohn de Clum: for they were let in by king Sigismund into the councel. And when I said, that I was desirous to be instructed, if I did in any thing erre, then they heard the chiefe cardinall answere againe: Because thou wouldest be informed, there is no remedie, but that thou must first reuoke thy doctrine, according to the determination of fiftie Bachelers of Diuinitie appointed. O high instruction.

After like maner S. Katharine also should haue denied and reuoked the veritie of God and faith in Christ, because the 50. masters likewise did withstand her: which notwithstanding, that good virgin would neuer doe, standing in her faith vnto death: But she did win those her masters vnto Christ, when as I cannot win these my masters by any meanes. These things I thought good to write vnto you, that you might know how they haue ouercome me, with no grounded Scripture nor with any reason: but only did assay with terrors and deceits to perswade mee to reuoke and to abiure. But our merciful God, whose law I haue magnified, was and is with me, and I trust, so will continue, and will keepe me in his grace vnto death. Written at Constance after the feast of Iohn Baptist, in prison and in bands, daily looking for death; although for the secret iudgements of God, I dare not say whether this be my last Epistle: for now also almighties God is able to deliuer me.

Another letter of Iohn Hus, wherein he comforteth his friends, and willeth them not to be troubled for the condemning of his bookes: and also declareth the wickednesse of the Clergie.

Good bookes of good men haue been burned of old time.

MAster Iohn Hus, in hope the seruant of God, to al the faithfull which loue him and his statutes, wisheth the truth and grace of God.

Beloued, I thought it needful to warne you that you should not feare or be discouraged because the aduersaries haue decreed that my bookes shall be burnt. Remember how the Israelites burned the preachings of the prophet Ieremy, and yet they could not auoid the things that were prophecied of in them. For after they were burnt, the Lord commanded to write the same prophecie againe, and that larger; which was also done. For Ieremie sitting in prison spake, and Baruch which was readie at his hand, wrote. This is written either in the 35. or 45. chapter of the vision of Ieremie. It is also written in the bookes of the Machabees, that the wicked did burne the law of God, and killed them that had the same. Againe, vnder the new Testament, they burned the Saints, with the bookes of the law of God. The cardinals condemned and committed to fire certaine of S. Gregories bookes, and had burnt them all if they had not bin preserued of God by the meanes of Peter, Gregories minister. Hauing these things before your eyes, take heed lest through feare, you omit to reade my boookes, and deliuer them to the aduersaries to be burnt. Remember the sayings of our merciful Sauiour, by which he forwarneth vs, Matth. 24. There shall be (saith he) before the day of iudgement, great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning, vntill this day, neither shall be afterwards: So that euen the elect of God should be deceiued, if it were possible. But for their sakes, those daies shall be shortned. When you remember these things (beloued) be not afraid, for I trust in God that that schoole of Antichrist shall be afraid of you, and suffer you to be in quiet, neither shall the councell of Constance extend to Bohemia. For I thinke, that many of them, which are of the councel, shal die before they shal get from you my books. And they shal depart from the councel and be scattered abroad, throughout the parts of the world, like storkes, and then they shall know when winter commeth, what they did in sommer. Consider that they haue iudged their head the P. worthie of death, for many horrible facts that he hath done. Go to now; Answere to this you preachers, which preach that the pope is the god of the earth, that he may, as the lawyers say, make sale of the holy things: that he is the head of the whole holy church in verity well gouerning the same: that he is the heart of the church in quickning the same spiritually: that he is the wel-spring from which flow eth al vertue and goodnes: that he is the sumie of the holy church: that he is the safe refuge to which euery Christian man ought to flie for succour. Behold now that head is cut off with the sword, now the god of the earth is bound, now his sins are declared openly, now that wel-spring is dried vp, that sun darkened, that heart is plucked out and throwne away, lest that any man should seeke succor thereat. The councel hath condemned that head, and that for this offence, because he took money for indulgences, bishoprickes and other such like. But they condemned him by order of iudgment which were themselues the buyers and sellers of the same merchandise. There was present Iohn bishop of Lytomissia, who went twice about to buy the bishoprike of Prage, but others preuented him. O wicked men, why did they not first cast out the beame out of their own eyes? These men haue accursed and condemned the seller, but they themselues which were the buyers and consenters to the bargaine, are without danger. What shall I say that they do vse in this manner of buying and selling at home in their owne countries? For at Constance there is one bishop that bought, and another which sold, and the pope for allowing of both their facts, took bribes of both sides. It came so to passe in Bohemia also as you know. I would that in that councell God had said, He that amongst you is without sin, let him giue the sentence against pope Iohn: Then surely they had gone all out of the councell house, one after another. Why did they bow the knee to him alwaies, before this his fall, kisse his feete, and call him the most holy father, seeing they saw apparantly before, that he was an heretike, that he was a man killer, that he was a wicked sinner, all which things now they haue found in him? Why did the cardinals chuse him to be P. knowing before that he had killed the holy father? Why suffered they him to meddle with holy things, in bearing the office of the popedome? for to this end they are his counsellers, that they should admonish him of that which is right. Are not they themselues as guiltie of these faults as he? seeing that they accounted these things vices in him, and were partakers of some of them themselues? why durst no man lay ought to his charge, before he had fled from Constance, but as soone as the secular power, by the sufferance of God laid hold vpon him, then, and neuer afore, they conspired al together that he should not liue any longer? Surely, euen at this day is the malice, the abomination and filthinesse of Antichrist reuealed in the pope and others of this councell.

Antichrist now first beginneth to be reuealed in the pope.

Now the faithfull seruants of God may vnderstand what our Sauiour Christ meant by this saying: When you shal see the abomination of desolation, which is spoken of by Daniel, &c. who so can vnderstand it, &c. Surely these be great abominations, pride, couetousnesse, simonie, sitting in a solitarie place, that is to say, in a dignitie void of goodnesse, of humilitie, and other vertues: as we do now clearely see in those that are constituted in any office and dignitie. How acceptable a thing should it be (if time would suffer me) to disclose their wicked acts, which are now apparant, that the faithfull seruants of God might know them? I trust in God that he will send after me, those that shall be more valiant: and there are aliue at this day, that shall make more manifest the malice of Antichrist, and shall giue their liues to the death, for the truth of our Lord Iesus Christ: who shall giue both to you and me the ioyes of life euerlasting. This epistle was written vpon S. Iohn Baptists day in prison and in cold irons; I hauing this meditation with my selfe, that Iohn was beheaded in his prison and bounds, for the word of God.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

IOhn Hus in hope the seruant of God, to all the faithfull at Boheme, which loue the Lord, wisheth to stand and die in the grace of God, and at last to attaine vnto eternall life.

Ye that bare rule ouer other and be rich, and ye also that be poore, welbeloued and faithfull in God, I beseech you, and admonish you all, that ye will be obedient vnto God, make much of his word, and gladly hearing the same, wil humblie performe that which ye heare. I beseech you sticke fast to the veritie of Gods word, which I haue written and preached vnto you out of his law, and the sermons of his Saints. Also I desire you if any man either in publike sermon or in priuate talke heard of me any thing, or haue read any thing written by mee which is against the veritie of God; that he do not follow the same. Albeit I do not find my conscience guiltie that I euer haue spoken or written any such thing amongst you.

I desire you moreouer if any man at any time haue noted any leuitie either in my talke or in my conditions, that he do not follow the same: but pray to God for me, to pardon me that sin of lightnes. I pray you that ye will loue your priests and ministers, which be of honest behauiour, to prefer and honor them before others: namely such priests as trauel in the word of God. I pray you take heed to your selues and beware of malitious and deceitfull men, and especially of these wicked priests of whom our Sauiour doth speake, that they are vnder sheepes clothing, and inwardly are rauening wolues. I pray such as be rulers and superiours, to behaue themselues gently towards their poore inferiours, and to rule them iustly. I beseech the citizens that they will walke euery man in his degree, and vocation with an vpright conscience. The Artificers also I beseech, that they wil exercise their occupations diligently, and vse them with the feare of God. I beseech the seruants, that they wil serue their masters faithfully. And likewise the schoolemasters I beseech that they liuing honestly, will bring vp their scholars vertuously, and to teach them faithfullie. First to learne to feare God: then for the glorie of God and the publike vtilitie of the common wealth, and their owne health, and not for auarice or for worldly honor, to employ their minds to honest Arts. I beseech the Students of the Vniuersitie and all schooles, in all honest things to obey their masters, and to follow them, and that with all diligence, they will studie to be profitable both to the setting forth of the glorie of God, and to the soules health as wel of themselues as of other men. Together I beseech and pray you all, that you will yeeld most hartie thankes to the right honorable lords, the lord Wenceslaus de Duba, lord Iohn de Cluan, lord Henrie Lumlouio, lord Vilem Zagecio, lord Nicolas and other lords of Boheme, of Morauia and Polony: that their diligence towards me, may be graterull to all good men: because that they like valiant champions of Gods truth, haue oftentimes set themselues against the whole councell for my deliuerance, contending and standing against the same to the vttermost of their power: but especially lord Wenceslaus de Duba, and lord Iohn de Clum. What soeuer they shall report vnto you, giue credit vnto them; for they were in the councell when I there answered many. They know who they were of Bohemia, and how many false and slanderous things they brought in against me, and that councell cried out against me, and how I also answered to all things whereof I was demanded. I beseech you also that yee will pray for the king of Romans, and for your king, and for his wife your queene, that God of his mercie would abide with them and with you, both now and henceforth in euerlasting life, Amen.

Notes for all noble men to marke and to follow.

This Epistle I haue written to you out of prison and in bands, looking the next day after the writing hereof, for the sentence of the councell vpon my death; hauing a full trust that he will not leaue me, neither suffer me to denie his truth and to reuoke the errours, which false witnesses malitiously haue deuised against me. How mercifullie the Lord God hath dealt with me, and was with me in marueilous temptations, ye shall know when as hereafter by the helpe of Christ, we shall all meete together in the ioy of the world to come. As concerning M. Ieroime my dearely beloued brother and fellow, I heare no other but that he is remaining in strait bands, looking for death as I do: and that for the faith which he valiantly maintained amongst the Bohemians, our cruell enemies of Boheme haue giuen vs into the power and hands of other enemies, and into bands. I beseech you pray to God for them.

Moreouer, I beseech you, namely you of Prage, that ye will loue the temple of Bethleem, and prouide so long as God shall permit, that the word of God may bee preached in the same. For, because of that place, the diuell is angrie and against the same place he hath stirred vp priests and canons, perceiuing that in that place his kingdome should be disturbed and diminished. I trust in God that he will keepe that holy church so long as it shall please him, and in the same shall giue greater encrease of his word by other, then he hath done by mee a weake vessell. I beseech you also that ye will loue together, and withholding no man from the hearing of Gods word, ye will prouide and take care that good men be not oppressed by any force and violence. Written at Constance, the yeare of our Lord, 1415.

¶ Another right godly letter of Iohn Hus, to a certaine priest admonishing him of his office, and exhorting him to be faithfull: worthie to be read of all Ministers.

A worthy lesson for all ministers and prelats.

THe peace of our Lord Iesus Christ, &c. My deare brother be diligent in preaching the Gospell, and do the worke of a good Euangelist: neglect not your vocation; labour like a blessed souldier of Christ. First, liue godly and holily. Secondlie, teach faithfully and truly. Thirdly, be an example to other in wel doing, that you be not reprehended in your sayings: correct vice and set forth vertue. To euill liuers threaten eternall punishment; but to those that be faithfull and godly, set forth the comforters of eternall ioy. Preach continually, but be short and fruitful, prudently vnderstanding, and discreetly dispensing the holy Scriptures. Neuer affirme or maintaine those things that be vncertaine and doubtfull, lest that your aduersaries take hold vpon you, which reioyce in deprauing their brethren, whereby they may bring the Ministers of God into contempt. Exhort men to the confession of their faith, and to the communion of both kinds, both of the bodie and blood of Christ, whereby such as do repent earnestly of their sins, may the more often come to the holy communion. And I warne you that you enter into no tauernes with guests, and bee not a common company keeper. For the more a preacher keepeth him from the companie of men, the more he is regarded. Albeit, denie not yet your helpe and diligence, wheresoeuer you may profit other. Against fleshly lust preach continually all that euer you can: For that is the raging beast, which deuoureth men, for whom the flesh of Christ did suffer. Wherefore my heartily beloued, I beseech you to flie fornication: for whereas a man would most profit and do good, there this vice vseth most to lurke. In any case flie the companie of yong women, and beleeue not their deuotion: For S. Austin saith, the more deuout she is, the more precious to wantonnes, and vnder the pretence of religion, the snare and venome of fornication lurketh. And this know ye welbeloued, that the conuersation with them, subuerteth manie, whom the conuersation of this world could neuer blemish nor beguile. Admit no women into your house, for what cause soeuer it be, and haue not much talke with them otherwise, for auoiding of offence. Finally, howsoeuer you do, feare God and keep his precepts: so shall you walke wisely, and shall not perish: so shall you subdue the flesh, contemne the world, and ouercome the diuell: so shall you put on God, find life, and confirme other, and shall crowne your selfe with the crowne of glorie, the which the iust Iudge shall giue you. Amen.

✠ This letter of Iohn Hus containeth a confession of the infirmitie of mans flesh: how weake it is, and repugnant against the spirit. Wherin he also exhorteth to perseuere constantly in the truth.

This Pallecz was the chiefest enemie of Iohn Hus, and procurer of his death.

HEalth be to you from Iesus Christ, &c. My deare friend, know that Paletz came to me to perswade me that I should not feare the shame of abiuration, but to consider the good which thereof will come. To whom I said, that the shame of condemnation and burning is greater then to abiure: and why should I feare then that shame? But I pray you tell me plainly your mind; Presupposing such articles were laid to you, which you knew your selfe not to be true: what would you do in that case? would you abiure? Who answered: The case is sore, and began to weepe. Many other things he spake which I did reprehend. Michael de Causis was sometimes before in the prison with the deputies. And when I was with the deputies, thus I heard him speake vnto the keepers: We by the grace of God will burne this heretike shortly: for those cause I haue spent many Florens. But yet vnderstand that I write not this to the intent to reuenge mee of him, for that I haue committed to God, and pray to God for him with all my heart.

Michael de Causis another bitter enemie of Iohn Hus. Iohn Hus praieth for his enemies.

Yet

A prophecie of Iohn Hus.

Yet I exhort you againe, to be circumspect about our letters: For Michael hath taken such order that none shall be suffered to come into the prison: no nor yet the keepers wiues are permitted to come to me. O holy God, how largely doth Antichrist extend his power and cruelty? But I trust that his power shall be shortened, and his iniquitie shal be detected more and more amongst the faithfull people.

Almightie God shall confirme the hearts of his faithfull, whom he hath chosen before the constitution of the world, that they may receiue the eternall crowne of glory. And let Antichrist rage as much as he will, yet he shall not preuaile against Christ, which shal destroy him with the spirit of his mouth, as the Apostle saith: and then shall the creature be deliuered out of seruitude of corruption, into the libertie of the glorie of the sons of God, as saith the Apostle in the words following: We also within our selues do grone, waiting for the adoption of the sonnes of God, the redemption of our bodie.

I am greatly comforted in those words of our Sauiour: Happie be you when men shal hate you, and shal separate you, and shall rebuke you, and shall cast out your name as execrable, for the son of man. Reioyce and be glad, for behold, great is your reward in heauen, Luke 6. O worthie, yea O most worthie consolation, which not to vnderstand, but to practise in time of tribulation, is a hard lesson.

This rule Saint Iames with the other Apostles, did well vnderstand, which saith; Count it exceeding ioy my brethren, when ye shall fall into diuers tentations, knowing that the probation of your faith worketh patience: let patience haue her perfect worke. For certainly it is a great matter for a man to reioyce in trouble, and to take it for ioy to be in diuers temptations. A light matter it is to speake it and to expound it: but a great matter to fulfill it: For why? our most patient and most valiant champion himselfe, knowing that he should arise againe the third day, ouercomming his enemies by his death, and redeeming from damnation his elect after his last supper, was troubled in spirit and said, My soule is heauie vnto death. Of whom also the Gospell saith, that he began to feare, to be sad and heauie. Who being then in an agonie, was confirmed of the Angell, and his sweat was like the drops of blood falling vpon the ground. And yet he notwithstanding, being so troubled, said to his disciples; Let not your hearts be troubled, neither feare the cruelties of them that persecute you: for you shall haue mee with you alwaies, that you may ouercome the tyrannie of your persecutours. Whereupon those his souldiers, looking vpon the Prince and King of glorie, sustained great conflicts. They passed thorow fire and water, and were saued, and receiued the crowne of the Lord God, of the which Saint Iames in his canonicall epistle, saith; Blessed is the man that suffereth temptation, for when he shall be proued, he shall receiue the crowne of life, which God hath promised to them that loue him. Of this crowne I trust stedfastly the Lord will make me partaker also with you, which be the feruent zealers of the truth, and with all them, which stedfastly and constantly doe loue the Lord Iesus Christ, which suffered for vs, leauing to vs example that wee should follow his steps. It behooued him to suffer, as he saith: and vs also it behooued to suffer, that the members may suffer together with the head. For he saith: If any man will come after me, let him denie himselfe and take vp his crosse and follow me.

The prayer of Iohn Hus to Christ.

O most mercifull Christ, draw vs weake creatures after thee, for except thou shouldest draw vs, we are not able to follow thee. Giue vs a strong spirit, that it may be readie, and although the flesh be feeble, yet let thy grace go before vs, go with vs, & follow vs: for without thee we can do nothing, and much lesse enter into the cruell death for thy sake. Giue vs that prompt and readie spirit, abold heart, an vpright faith, a firme hope and perfect charitie, that we may giue our liues patientlie and ioyfully for thy names sake, Amen. Written in prison and in bonds in the Vigill of holy Saint Iohn the Baptist, who being in prison and in bonds for the rebuking of wickednes, was beheaded.

¶ Among diuers other letters of Iohn Hus, which hee wrote to the great consolation of others: I thought also here to intermixe another certaine godly letter written out of England, by a faithfull scholar of Wickliffe, as appeareth, vnto Iohn Hus and the Bohemians, which for the zealous affection therein contained, seemeth not vnworthie to be read.

A letter to Iohn Hus, and to the Bohemians, from London.

A zealous letter to Iohn Hus from London.

GReeting, and whatsoeuer can be deuised more sweet, in the bowels of Christ Iesu. My dearely beloued in the Lord, whom I loue in the truth, and not I only, but also all they that haue the knowledge of the truth, which abideth in you, and shall be with you through the grace of God for euermore: I reioyced aboue measure, when our beloued brethren came and gaue testimonie vnto vs of your truth, and how you walked in the truth. I haue heard brethren, how sharpely Antichrist persecuteth you, in vexing the faithfull seruants of Christ with diuers and strange kinds of afflictions. And surely no maruell, if amongst you (since it is so almost all the world ouer) the law of Christ be too too grieuously impugned, and that red Dragon hauing so many heads (of whom it is spoken in the Apocalyps) haue now vomited out of his mouth that great flood, by which he goeth about to swallow vp the woman: but the most gratious God will deliuer for euer his only and most faithfull spouse. Let vs therefore comfort our selues in the Lord our God, and in his vnmeasurable goodnesse, hoping strongly in him which will not suffer those that loue him, to be vnmercifullie defrauded of any their purpose, if we according to our dutie, shal loue him with all our heart: for aduersitie should by no meanes preuaile ouer vs, if there were no iniquitie raigning in vs. Let therfore no tribulation or sorrow for Christs cause, discourage vs, knowing this for a suretie, that whomsoeuer the Lord vouchsafeth to receiue to be his children, those he scourgeth: for so the mercifull father will haue them tried in this miserable life by persecutions, that after wards he may spare them. For the gold that this high artificer hath chosen, he purgeth and trieth in this fire, that he may afterwards lay it vp in his pure treasurie. For we see that the time which we shall abide heere, is short and transitorie: the life which we hope for after this, is blessed and euerlasting. Therefore whilest we haue time, let vs take paine, that we may enter into that rest. What other thing do we see in this brickle life, then sorow, heauines and sadnes, and that which is most grieuous of all to the faithfull, too much abusing and contempt of the law of the Lord? Let vs therefore endeuour our selues as much as we may, to lay hold of the things that are eternall and abiding, despising in our minds all transitorie and fraile things. Let vs consider the holy fellowship of our fathers that haue gone before vs. Let vs consider the Saints of the old and new Testament. Did they not passe through this sea of tribulation and persecution? were not some of them cut in pieces, other some stoned, and other of them killed with the sword? some others of them went about in pelts and goats skins, as the Apostle to the Hebrewes witnesseth. Surely they all walked strait waies, following the steps of Christ, which said, He that minister eth vnto me, let him follow me, wheresoeuer I go, &c. Therefore let vs also, which haue so noble examples giuen vs of the Saints that went before vs, laying away as much as in vs lieth, the heauie burden and the yoke of sin which compasseth vs about, runne forward through patience, to the battell that is set before vs, fixing our eyes vpon the author of faith, and Iesus the finisher of the same: who seeing the ioy that was set before him, suffered the paines of the crosse, despising death. Let vs call vpon him, which suffered such reproch against himselfe of sinners, that we be not wearied, fainting in our hearts, but that we may heartily pray for helpe of the Lord, and may fight against his aduersarie Antichrist: that we may loue his law, and not be deceitfull laborers, but that we may deale faithfully in al things, according to that, that God hath vouchsafed to giue vs, and that we may labour diligently in the Lords cause vnder hope of an euerlasting reward. Behold therfore brother Hus, most dearly beloued in Christ, although in face vnknowne to me, yet not in faith and loue (for distance of places cannot separate those whom the loue of Christ doth effectually knit together) bee comforted in the grace which is giuen vnto thee, labour like a good souldier of Christ Iesus, preach, be instant in word and in example, and call as many as thou canst, to the way of truth: for the truth of the Gospell is not to be kept in silence, because of the friuolous censures and thunderbolts of Antichrist. And therfore to the vttermost of thy power strengthen thou and confirme the members of Christ, which are weakened by the diuel: and if the Lord will vouchsafe it, Antichrist shall shortly come to an end. And there is one thing wherein I do greatly reioyce, that in your realme and in other places, God hath stirred vp the hearts of some men that they can gladly suffer for the word of God, imprisonment, banishment and death.

Further, beloued, I know not what to write vnto you, but I confesse, that I could wish to powre out my whole heart, if thereby I might comfort you in the law of the Lord. Also I salute from the bottome of my heart, all the faithfull louers of the law of the Lord, and specially Iacobellus your coadiutor in the Gospell, requiring that he wil pray vnto the Lord for me in the vniuersall church of Iesus Christ. And the God of peace which hath raised from the dead the shepheard of the sheep, the mightie Lord Iesus Christ, make you apt in all goodnesse, to do his will, working in you that which may be pleasant in his sight. All your friends salute you which haue heard of your constancie. I would desire also to see your letters written backe to vs, for know ye that they shall greatly comfort vs.

At London by your seruant, desiring to be fellow with you in your labors.

Another letter of Iohn Hus to his friends of Boheme.

THe Lord God be with you. I loue the counsell of the Lord aboue gold and precious stone. Wherfore I trust in the mercie of Iesus Christ, that he will giue me his spirit to stand in his truth. Pray to the Lord, for the spirit is readie and the flesh is weake. The Lord almightie bee the eternall reward vnto my Lords, which constantlie, firmelie and faithfullie do stand for eighteousnesse: to whom the Lord God shall giue in the kingdome of Boheme, to know the truth. For the following of which truth, necessarie it is that they returne againe into Boheme, setting apart all vaine-glorie, and following not a mortall and miserable king, but the king of glorie which giueth eternall life.

Oh how comfortable was the giuing of the hand of lord John de Clum vnto me, which was not ashamed to reach forth his hand to me a wretch, and such an abiect he reseke, lying in fetters of iron, and cried out vpon all men! Now peraduenture I shall not speake much hereafter with you: Therefore salute in time as you shall see them, all the faithfull of Boheme.

Pelletz. Palletz came to me into prison. His salutation in my vehement infirmitie, was this before the commissaries, that there hath not risen a more perillous heresike since Christ was borne, then was Wickliffe and I. Also he said, that all such as came to heare my talke, were infected with this heresie, to thinke that the substance of bread remained in the Sacrament of the altar.

To whom I answered and said: O master, what a grieuous salutation haue you giuen me, and how greatly do you sinne? Behold I shall die, or peraduenture to morrow shall be burnt: And what reward shall be recompenced to you in Boheme for your labour?

This thing peraduenture I should not haue written, lest I might seeme to hate him. I haue alwaies had this in my heart, Trust not in princes, &c. And againe, Cursed be the man which trusteth in man, and maketh flesh to be his arme. For Gods sake be you circumspect how you stand and how you returne. Carry no letters with you. Direct your bookes not all by one, but diuerslie by diuers friends.

The visions of John Hus by dreames. Know this for certaine, that I haue had great conflicts by dreames, in such sort as I had much a do to refraine from crying out. For I dreamed of the popes escape before he went. And after the lord John had told me thereof, immediatly in the night it was told me that the P. should returne to you againe. And afterward also I dreamed of the apprehending of master Ierome, although not in full maner as it was done. All the prisonments, whither and how I am caried, were opened to me before, although not fully after the same forme and circumstance. Many serpents oftentimes appeared vnto me, hauing heads also in their taile: but none of them could bite me, and many other things more.

A plaine title of master Ierome of Prage. There things I write, not esteeming my selfe as a Prophet, or that I extroll my selfe, but only to signifie vnto you what temptations I had in bodie and also in mind, and what great feare I had, lest I should transgresse the commandement of the Lord Iesus Christ. Now I remember with my selfe the words of master Ierome, which said, that if I should come to the councell, he thought I should neuer returne home againe. In like maner there was a good and godly man, a tailour, which taking his leaue of me at Prage, spake to me in these words: God be with you (said he) for I thinke verily, my deare and good master Iohn, that you shall not returne againe to vs with your life. The king, not of Hungarie, but of heauen, reward you with all goodnesse, for the faithfull doctrine which I at your hands haue receiued, &c.

This taylour was a Polander. ¶ And shortly after the writting hereof, he sendeth also vnto them another prophetical vision of his to be expounded touching the reformation of the church, written in his 44. epistle: the contents whereof be these.

Another letter of Iohn Hus, sent to the Lord Iohn de Clum.

I Pray you expound to me the dreame of this night: I saw how that in my church of Bethleem, they came to race & put out all the images of Christ, and did put them out. The next day after I arose and saw many painters, which painted and made more fairer Images and many more then I had done before: which images I was very glad and ioyfull to behold. And the painters with much people about the, said, Let the bishops and priests come now, and put vs out these pictures. Which being done, much people seemed to me in Bethleem to reioyce, and I with them. And I awaking therewith, felt my selfe to laugh, &c.

Prophetie. ¶ This vision lord John de Clum, and John Hus himselfe in his bolt of epistles in the 45. epistle saieth to expound, and applieth these images of Christ vnto the preaching of Christ and of his life. The which preaching and doctrine of Christ, though the pope and his cardinals should extinguish in him, yet did he feare not and declare, that the time should come, wherein the same doctrine should be restored againe by others, so plentifully, that the pope with all his power, should not be able to preuaile against it. Thus much as concerning this vision of I. Hus. Whereunto doth well accord the prophecie of Ieronie of Prage, printed in the coine called Moneta Hussi: of the which coine I haue my selfe one of the plates hauing this superscription following printed about it; Centum reuolutis annis Deo respondebitis & mihi. That is, After an hundred yeres come and gone, you shall giue a count to God and to me. Whereof (God willing) more shall be said hereafter.

Furthermore in the 48. epistle the said John Hus seeking to speake with the like spirit of prophecie, hath these words following: Sed spero, quod quæ dixi sub tecto, prædicabuntur super tecta: That is, but I trust that those things which I haue spoken within the house, hereafter shall be preached vpon the top of the house. Prophetie.

And because we are heere in hand with the prophecies of John Hus, it shal verie well in place, heere moreouer to record his words in a certaine treatise by him written, De Sacerdotum & Monachorum carnalium Abominatione; wherein the said John Hus speaking prophetically of the reformation of the church, hath these words following: Ex iis vlterius aduerte incidentaliter, quod Dei ecclesia nequit ad pristinam suam dignitatem reduci, &c. That is in English:

Prophetie. Moreouer, herkenyon note and marke by the way, that the church of God, cannot be reduced to his former dignitie, or be reformed, before all things first be made new: The truth whereof is plaine by the temple of Salomon. Like as the clergy and priests, so also the people and laitie: Or else vnlesse all such as now be addict to auarice, from the least to the most, be first conuerted and reclaimed, as well the people as clergie and priests, Albeit as my mind now giueth me, I beleeue rather the first, that is, that there shall rise a new people, formed after the new man, which is created after God. Of the which people new clerkes and priests shall come, and be taken which all shall hate couetousnesse, and glorie of this life, painting to an heauenly conuersation. Notwithstanding all these things shall come to passe, and be brought by little and little in order of times, dispensed of God for the same purpose. And this God both and hath bo for his owne goodnesse and mercie, and for the riches of his great longanimitie and patience, giuing time and space of repentance to them that haue long lien in their sins, to amend, and flie from the face of the Lords furie, while that in like maner the carnall people, and carnall priests successiuely and in time, shall fall away and be consumed as with the moth, &c.

Another letter of Iohn Hus.

MAster Martin my deare brother in Christ, I exhort you in the Lord, that you feare God, keepe his commandements, and flee the companie of women, and beware of hearing their confession, lest by the hypocrisie of women, Satan deceiue you: trust not their deuotion. You know how I haue detested the auarice and the inordinate life of the clergie, wherefore through the grace of God I suffer now persecution, which shortly shall be consummate in me, neither do I feare to haue my hart powred out for the name of Christ Iesus; I desire you heartily be not greedie in seeking after benefices. And yet if you shall be called to any cure in the countrie, let the honor of God, the saluation of soules, and the trauell thereof moue you thereunto, and not the hauing of the liuing or the commodities thereof. And if you shall be placed in any such benefice, beware you haue no young woman for your cooke or seruant, lest you edifie and increase more your house, then your soule. See that you be a builder of your spirituall house, being gentle to the poore, and humble of mind, and waste not your goods in great fare. I feare also if you do not amend your life, ceasing from your costly and superfluous apparel, lest you shal be grieuously chastised, as I also wretched man shall be punished, which haue vsed the like, being seduced by custome of euill men and worldly glorie, whereby I haue been wounded against God with the spirit of pride. And because you haue notably knowne both my preaching and outward conuersation euen from my youth, I haue no need to write many things vnto you, but to desire you for the mercie of Iesus Christ, that you do not follow me in any such leuitie and lightnes, which you haue seene in me. You knew how before my priesthood (which grieueth me now) I haue delighted to play oftentimes at chesse, and haue neglected my time, and thereby haue vnhappily prouoked both my selfe and other to anger many times by that play. Wherfore, besides other my innumerable faults, for this also I desire you to inuocate the mercie of the Lord, that he wil pardon me, and so direct my life, that hauing ouercome the wickednes of this present life, the flesh, the world and the diuell, I may find place in the heauenly countrie, at the least in the day of iudgement. Fare ye well in Christ Iesus, with all them which keepe his law. My gray coate, if you will, keepe to your selfe for my remembrance, but I thinke you are ashamed to weare that gray colour: therefore you may giue it to whom you shall think good. My white coat you shal giue the Minister N. my scholar, To George or else to Zuzikon 60. groats, or else my gray coat: for he hath faithfully serued me.

Sent that the priest is here not married, and therefore he willeth him to auoid all companie of women.

He repenteth his playing at the cheste.

Iohn Hus from his gay garments commeth to his white coate.

¶ The superscription.

I pray you that you do not open this letter, before you be sure and certaine of my death.

The consolation of master Ierome to master Hus.

MY master, in those things which you haue both written hitherto, and also preached after the law of God against the pride, auarice, and other inordinate vices of the priests, go forward, be constant and strong. And if I shall know that you are oppressed in the cause, and if need shall so require, of mine owne accord, I will follow after to helpe you, as much as I can.

John Hus condemned for no erroneous doctrine wherein he was culpable. BY the life, acts and letters of John Hus hitherto rehearsed, it is euident and plaine, that he was condemned not for any erro; of doctrine, which they could well proue in him, who neither denied their popish transubstantiation, neither spake against the authozitie of the church of Rome, if it were well gouerned, nor yet the seuen Sacraments, and also said masse himselfe, and almost in all their popish opinions was a papist with them: but only of euil will was accused of his malicious aduersaries, because he spake against the pompe, pride and auarice, and other wicked enormities of the pope, cardinals and prelats of the church, and because he could not abide the high dignities and liuings of the church, and thought the doings of the pope to be Antichrist like. For this cause he procured so many enemies and false witnesses against him. Who straining and picking matter out of his bookes and writings, hauing no one iust article of doctrine to lay vnto him, yet they made him an heretike, whether he would or no, and brought him to his condemnation. This can hatred and malice do, where the charitie of Christ hath no place. Which being so, as thy charitie (good Reader) may easily vnderstand, in perusing the whole course of his storie: I beseech thee then, what cause had Iohn Cochleus to write his twelue bookes against John Hus and Hussites? In which bookes how bitterly and intemperatly he misuseth his pen, by these few words in his second booke thou maiest take a little taste: which words I thought here briefly to place in English, to the end that all Englishmen may iudge thereby, with what spirit and truth these catholikes be caried. This words be these; Lib. 2. Hist. Dico igitur Ioan. Hus neque Sathan neque beatum bibendum esse, sed impium potius, &c. That is, I say therefore John Hus is neither to be counted holie nor blessed, but rather wicked and eternally wretched: in so much that in the day of iudgement, it shall be more easie, not only with the infidel Pagans, Turks, Tartarians and Iewes, but also with the most sinfull Sodomites, and the abominable Persians, which most filthily do lie with their daughters, sisters or mothers, yea and also with most impious Cain, killer of his owne brother, with Thyestes, killer of his owne mother, and the Lestrygones and other Anthropophagi, which deuoure mans flesh; yea more easie with those infamous murderers of infants, Pharao and Herod, then with him, &c. These be the words of Cochleus. Whose railing bookes although they deserue neither to be read, nor answered, yet if it please God, it were to be wished that the Lord would stir vp some towardly yong man, that hath so much leasure to defend the simplicitie of this John Hus, which cannot now answere for himselfe. In the meane time, something to satisfie or stay the readers mind against this immoderate hyperbole of Cochleus, in like few words I will bring out John Hus to speake and to cleare himselfe against this slander: those words in his booke De sacerdotum & monachorum abominatione desolationis, pag. 84. &c. I beseech the reader to note. Nam & ista scribens fateor, quod nihil aliud me in illis perurget, nisi dilectio Dom. nostri Iesu crucifixi, &c. That is, For in writting these things, I confesse nothing else to haue moued me hereunto, but only the loue of our Lord Iesus crucified, whose paines and stripes (according to the measure of my weaknesse and vilenesse) I couet to beare in my selfe, beseeching him so to giue me grace, that I neuer seeke to glorie in my selfe or in any thing else, but only in his crosse, & in the inestimable ignominie of his passion which he suffered for me. And therefore I write and speake these things, which I do not doubt will like all such as vnfainedly do loue the Lord Christ crucified: and contrarie will mislike not a little all such as be of Antichrist. Also againe, I confesse before the most merciful Lord Iesus Christ crucified, that these things which I do now write, and those that I haue written before, neither I could haue written, nor knew how, nor durst so haue written, vnlesse he by his inward vnction had so commanded me. Neither yet do I write these things as of authozitie, to get me fame and name: For as Saint Augustine and Ierome do say, that is only to be giuen to the Scriptures and writings of the Apostles, Euangelists and Prophets, and to the canonicall Scriptures, which do abound in the fulnesse of the Spirit of Iesus. And what soeuer is there said, is full of veritie and wholesome vtilitie, &c. And here place also would require something to say to Aeneas Siluius, to Antoninus, and to Laziardus, which falsly impute articles to him, which he neuer maintained. But because time sufficeth not, I will proceed to the storie of master Ierome of Prage.

Ierome cometh to Constance.

The safe-conduct was required in vaine of the emperor.

Coc. lenus raileth against John Hus without cause.

Ex Coch. lib. 2. hist. Hussitarum, pag. 88.

The intimating of Ierome of Prage, set up in diuers places of the towne of Constance.

* The tragicall and lamentable historie of the famous learned man and godly martyr of Christ, master Ierome of Prage, burned at Constance for like cause and quarrell, as master John Hus was, 1416.

The storie of Ierome of Prage. THese things hitherto being discoursed touching the life, acts and constant martyrdome of master John Hus, with part also of his letters adioyned to the same, whose death was on the sixth of Iulie, an. 1416. now remaineth consequently to describe the like tragedie and cruell handling of his christian companion and fellow in bands master Ierome of Prage. Who grieuously sorrowing the slanderous reproch and defamation of his countrie of Boheme, and also hearing tel of the manifest iniuries done vnto that man of worthie memorie master John Hus: freely and of his owne accord came vnto Constance the fourth day of Aprill, an. 1415. Who there perceiuing that John Hus was denied to be heard, and that watch and waite was laid for him on euery side, he departed to Iberling a citie of the empire, vntill the next day; the which citie was a mile off from Constance, and from thence he wrote his letters by me vnto Sigismund king of Hungarie and his barons, and also vnto the councell, most earnestly requiring that the king and the councell would giue him a safe conduct freely to come and go, and that he would then come in open audience to answere vnto euery man, if there were any of the councell that would lay any crime vnto him, as by the tenor of his intimation, shall more at large appeare.

When as the said king of Hungarie was required hereunto, as is aforesaid, being in the house of the lord cardinall of Cambray, he denied to giue master Ierome any safe-conduct, excusing himselfe for the cuill speech he had with the safe-conduct of John Hus before, and alleaging also certaine other causes. The deputies also of the foure nations of the councell being moued thereunto by the lords of the kingdome of Boheme, answered: we (say they) will giue him a safe-conduct to come, but not to depart. Whose answeres, when they were reported vnto master Ierome, by the next day after wrote certaine intimations according to the tenor here vnder written, which he sent vnto Constance to be set vpon the gates of the citie, and vpon the gates of the churches and monasteries, and of the houses of the cardinals, and other nobles and prelats. The tenour whereof here followeth word for word in this maner.

Vnto the most noble prince and lord, the lord Sigismund, by the grace of God king of the Romans, alwaies Augustus, and of Hungarie, &c. I Ierome of Prage master of Art of the generall Vniuersities of Paris, Colen, Heidelberg and Prage, by these my present letters do notifie vnto the king together with the whole reuerend councell, and as much as in me lieth, do all men to vnderstand and know, that bicause of the crafte slanderers, backbiters and accusers, I am readie freely and of mine owne will, to come vnto Constance, there to declare openly before the councell the puritie and sinceritie of my true faith and mine innocencie, and not secretly in corners before any priuate or particular person. Wherefore if there be anie of my slanderers, of what nation or estate soeuer they be, which will obiect against me any crime of erro; or heresie: let them come forth openly before me in the presence of the whole councell, and in their owne names obiect against me, and I will be readie, as I haue written, to answere openly and publikely before the whole councel, of mine innocencie, and to declare the puritie and sinceritie of my true faith. And if so be that I shall be found culpable in erro; or heresie, then I will not refuse openly to suffer such punishment as shall be more and worthie for an erroneous person, or an heretike.

Wherefore I most humblie beseech my lord the king and the whole sacred councell, that I may haue to this end and purpose aforesaid, safe and sure accesse. And if it happen that I offering such equitie and right as I do, before any fault be proued against me, be arrested, imprisoned, or haue anie violence done vnto me, that then it may be manifest vnto the whole world, that this generall councell doth not proceed according to equitie and iustice, if they would by any meanes put me backe from this profound and strait iustice, being come hither freely of mine owne mind and accord. The which thing I suppose to be farre from so sacred and holy councell of wise men.

Safe-conduct denied to Ierome.

Ierome returneth toward Boheme, with the testimonies of the lords of Boheme.

Ierome appointed in the way by duke John.

Michael de Causis, and Palletz enemies to Ierome.

Ierome of Prage cited by the councell when he was taken.

WHen as yet he through such intimations copied out in the Bohemian, Latine, and Germaine tongue, being set vp as aforesaid, could not get any safe-conduct, then the nobles, lords, and knights speciallie of the Bohemian nation present in Constance, gaue vnto master Ierome their letters patents, confirmed with their seales for a testimonie and witnesse of the premisses. With the which letters the said master Ierome returned againe vnto Boheme; but by the treason and conspiracie of his enemies was taken in Hirlaw by the officers of duke John, and in Zultzbach was brought backe again to the presence of the duke. In the meane time such as were the letters forward of the councell against master John Hus, and master Ierome, that is to say, Michael de Causis and master Palletz and other their accomplices, required that the said master Ierome should be cited by reason of his intimations, and certaine dates after the citation here vnder written, was set vpon the gates and poaches of the citie, and churches, which followeth here in this maner.

¶ This most sacred and holy Synode and generall councell of Constance, faithfully congregated & gathered together in the holy Ghost, representing the vniuersall militant church, vnto Ierome of Prage, which writeth himselfe to be a master of Art of so manie Vniuersities, and pretendeth those things which are only pertaining vnto sobjetie and modestie, and that he knoweth no more then he ought, &c. Know thou that there is a certaine writing come vnto our vnderstanding and knowledge, the which was set vp as it were by thine owne person vpon the gates of the churches and city of Constance, vpon the Sunday, when there was sung in the church of God; Quasi modo geniti. Wherein thou doest affirme, that thou wilt openlie answere vnto thy accusers and slanderers which shall object anie crime, error or heresie against thee, whereof thou art marueilously infamed and accused before vs, and specially touching the doctrine of Wickliffe, and other doctrines contrarie vnto the catholike faith, so that thou mightest haue granted vnto thee a safe conduct to come. But for so much as it is our part principallie and chiefly to foresee and loke vnto these craftie Foxes which go about to destroy the vineyard of the Lord of hosts, therefore we do cite and call forth by the tenor of these presents, thy person manifoldly defamed and suspected for the temerarious affirming and teaching of manifold errors; so that within the terme of fifteene daies to be accounted from the date of these presents, whereof fiue daies are appointed for the first terme, fiue for the second, and other fiue for the third, we doe ordaine and appoint by canonicall admonition and warning, that thou do appeare in the publike Session of the sacred councell, if there be any holden the same day, or else the first day immediately following, when as any session shal be, according to the tenor of thy said writing, to answere to those things, which any person or persons shall obiect or lay against thee in any cause of thy faith, and to receiue and haue, as iustice shall require. Whereupon, so much as in vs lieth, and as catholike faith shall require, we offer and assigne to thee by the tenour hereof, our safe-conduct from all violence (iudice absentes beeing saued) certifying thee, that whether thou dost appeare or not, the said terme or time appointed notwithstanding, processe shall go forward against thee by the said sacred councell, or by their commissarie or commissaries, for the time afore said not obserued and kept, thy contumecie or stubburnesse in any thing notwithstanding. Giuen in the sixth Session of the generall Councell, the seuenteenth day of April, vnder the seale of the presidents of the foure nations.

¶ Grumpert Faber Notarie of the Germaines.

Duke John in his letters to councell is called the son of Clement.

AFter that Sigismund king of Hungarie with the rest of the councell, had reclued by the forsaid duke John that master Jerome was taken, they were earnestly in hand, requiring that master Jerome should be brought before them vnto the councell. The which duke John, after he had receiued letters of the king and the councell, brought master Jerome bound vnto Constance, whom his brother duke Ludouicus led thorow the citie to the cloister of the friers Minors in Constance, where as the chiefe priests and elders of the people, Scribes and Pharisies, were gathered together, attending and waiting for his comming. Hee the said master Jerome carried a great handbolt of iron with a long chaine in his hand, and as hee passed the chaine made a great rattling and noise, and for the more confusion and despite towards him, they led him by the same chaine after Duke Ludouicus aforesaid, holding and stretching out the chaine a great way from him: with the which chaine they also kept him bound in the Cloister. When he was brought into the Cloister, they read before him the letter of Duke John, which was sent with the said master Jerome vnto the Councell, containing in effect, how that the said duke John had sent master Jerome vnto the councell, who by chance was fallen into his hands, because he heard an euill report of him, that he was fastened of the heresies of Wicklife; that the councell might take order for him, whose part it was to correct and punish such as did erre and stray from the truth, besides manie other flattering tales which were written in the said letter for the praise of the councell. After this they read the citation which was giuen out by the councell against master Jerome, whereof we haue spoken before. Then certaine of the bishops said vnto him; Jerome, why biddest thou vs and runne away, and biddest not appeare when thou wast cited? He answered, because I could not haue any safe conduct, neither from you, neither from the king, as it appeareth by these letters patents of the barons, which you haue, neither by mine open intimations could I obtaine any safe-conduct.

Jerome is brought bound vnto Constance by duke John.

The councell entreth in mould giue him liberte safely to come, nay freely to go.

Marke Jerome was reuiled by master Stefens, with comemoration of his eloquence.

Wherefore I perceiuing many of my geticuous and hearie friends to be here present in the councell, would not my selfe be the occasion of my perils and dangers; but if I had knowne or had any vnderstanding of this citation, without all doubt, albeit I had been in Boheme, I would haue returned againe. Then all the whole rabble rising vp, alleaged diuers and sundrie accusations and testimonies against him with a great noise and tumult. When the rest held their peace, then spake master Gerson the Chancellor of Paris: Jerome, then thou wast at Paris, thou thoughtest thy selfe by meanes of thy eloquence to be an Angell, and diddest trouble the whole Vniuersitie, alleaging openly in the schooles many erroneous conclusions with their correlaria, and especially in the question de vniuersalibus & de Ideis, with many other verie offensiue questions. Vnto whom master Jerome said: I answere to you master Gerson: Those matters which I did put forth there in the schooles at Paris, in the which also I am knowen to the arguments of the masters, I did put them forth philosophically and as a Philosopher, and matter of the Vniuersitie: and if I haue put forth any questions which I ought not to haue put forth, teach me that they be erroneous, and I will moll humblie be informed, and amend the same.

Gerson remueth old matters.

The master of the Vniuersitie of Collen.

This man worth neede, but beknowen matter.

Whiles he was yet speaking, another (as I suppose, the Master of the Vniuersitie of Collen vpon the riuer of Rheine) rising vp said: When thou wast also at Colen in the position which thou diddest there determine, thou diddest propound many erroneous matters. Then said master Jerome vnto him, shew me first one errour which I propounded. Where-vnto he being in a manner astonished, said, I do not remember them now at the first, but hereafter they shall be obiected against you.

The master of the Vniuersitie of Heidelberg.

And by and by the third man rising vp, said: when that you were also at Heidelberg, you propounded many erroneous matters as touching the Trinitie, and there painted out a certaine shield or scutchine, comparing the Trinitie of persons in diuinitie vnto water, snow and ice, and such like. Vnto whom master Jerome answered: Those things that I wrote or painted there, the same will I also speake, write and paint here; and teach me that they be erroneous, and I will moll humblie reuoke and recant the same.

Crucifige, crucifige eum.

Then certaine cried out, Let him be burned, let him be burned. Vnto whom he answered: If my death do delight or please you, in the name of God let it be so.

Then said the archbishop of Salisburg; not so master Jerome, for so much as it is written: I will not the death of a sinner, but rather that he conuert and liue. When these and many other tumults and cries were pasted, whereby they did then moll disorderly and outragiously witnesse against him, they deliuered the said master Jerome being bound, vnto the officers of the citie of Constance, to be carried to prison for that night: and so euerie one of them returned to their lodgings.

Jerome is comforted by the Pontift.

In the meane time, one of the friends of master John Hus, looking out at a window of the Cloister, said vnto him, master Jerome. Then said he, you are welcome my deare brother. Then said Peter vnto him: Be constant and feare not to suffer death for the truth sake, of the which when you were in times past at libertie, you did preach so much godlinesse. Vnto whom Jerome answered, truly brother I do not feare death, and for so much as we know that we haue spoken much thereof in times past; let vs now se what may be knowne or done in effect. By and by his keepers comming to the window, threatning him with strokes, did put away the said Peter from the window of the Cloister.

Ex tradit. Lucæ.

Then came there one Titus vnto master Jerome and said, master how do you? Vnto whom he answered; truely brother, I do very well. Then his keepers comming about him, laid hold of the said Titus, saying, this is also one of the number, and kept him. When it drew towards euening, the archbishop of Rigen, sent certaine of his seruants which led away master Jerome, being strongly bound with chaines, both by the hands and by the necke, and kept him so for certaine houres. When night drew on, they caried him vnto a certaine tower of the citie in Saint Pauls churchyard, there as they tying him fast vnto a great blocke, and his feet in the stockes, his hands also being made fast vpon them, they left him there as the blocke was so high, that he could by no meanes sit thereupon, but that his head must hang downeward. They caried also the said Titus vnto the archbishop of Rigen, who demanded of him, why he durst be so bold to talke with such a man being a reprobate of all men, and an heretike: and when as he could find no cause of imprisonment in him, and that he said he was master John de Clums friend, taking an oth and promise of him that he should not go about to endamage the councell, by reason of that imprisonment and captiuitie, so dismissed him and sent him away.

Master Jerome, vnknowne vnto vs whither he was caried, lay in the said tower two daies and two nights, reliued only with bread and water. Then one of his keepers comming vnto master Peter, declared vnto him how that master Jerome lay hard by in bonds and chaines, and how he was fed. Then master Peter desired that he might haue leaue giuen him to giue him meat, because he would procure the same vnto him. The keeper of the prison granting his request, caried meat vnto him. Within eleuen daies after, so hanging by the heeles, he died of small repast, that he fel sore sick euen vnto the death. Whenas he lying then in that captiuitie and prison, desired to haue a Confessor, they of the councell denied that he should haue any, vntill such time as by great importunitie he obtained to haue one: his friends bring then there present in the same prison and tower, wherein he then lay by the space of one yeare lacking but seuen daies.

Jerome hanging in the stocks was fed with bread and water.

After they had put John Hus to death, then about the feast of the nativitie of Marie the virgin, they brought forth master Jerome, whom they had kept so long in chaines, vnto the church of Saint Paul: and threatning him with death, being instant vpon him, they forced him to abiure and recant, and consent vnto vnto the death of master John Hus, that he was iustly and truly condemned and put to death by them. He, what for feare of death, and hoping thereby to escape out of their hands, according to their will and pleasure, and according to the tenour which was exhibited vnto him, did make abiuration, and that in the cathedrall Church and open Session, the draught whereof penned to him by the papists, here ensueth.

¶ The abiuration of master Hierome of Prage.

The forced abiuration of Hierome.

I Hierome of Prage, master of Art, acknowledging the catholike Church, and the apostolike faith, do accurse and renounce all heresies, and specially that, wherof I haue hitherto been infamed, and that which in times past John Hus and John Wickliffe haue holden and taught in their workes, treatises and sermons, made vnto the people and clergie: for the which cause the said Wicklisse and Hus, together with the said doctrines and errors, are condemned by this Synode of Constance as heretikes, and all the said doctrine sententially condemned, and especiallie in certaine articles expressed in the sentences and iudgements giuen against them by this sacred Councell.

Also I doe accord and agree vnto the holie Church of Rome, the Apostolicke seat in this sacred Councell, and with my mouth and heart doe profeſſe in all things, and touching all things, and specially as touching the keies, sacraments, orders and offices, and Ecclesiasticall censures, of pardons, reliques of Saints, Ecclesiasticall libertie, also ceremonies, and all other things pertaining vnto Christian religion, as the Church of Rome, the Apostolicke see, and this sacred Councell doe profeſſe: and specially that many of the said articles are notoriously heretical, and lately reprooued by the holie fathers, some of them blasphemous, other some erroneous: some offensiue vnto godly eares, and many of them temerarious and seditious. And such also were counted the articles lately condemned by the sacred Councell, and it was inhibited and forbidden to all and singuler Catholicke men hereafter to preach, teach, or presume to hold or maintaine any of the said articles, vnder paine of being accused.

And I the said Hierome, forsomuch as I haue laboured by Scholasticall arts, to perswade the opinion, De Vniuersalibus realibus, and that one substance of the common kind should signifie many things subiect vnder the same, and euery one of them, as S. Ambroſe, Hierome, Augustine doe affirme, and likewise others. For the teaching hereof by a plaine example I described as it were a certaine triangle, forme or figure, the which I called the shield of faith.

Therefore vtterly to exclude and take away the erroneous and wicked vnderstanding thereof, the which peraduenture some men may gather thereby, I doe say, affirme, and declare, that I neuer made the said figure, neither named it the shield of faith to that intent or purpose, that I would extoll or preferre the opinion of vniuersalities aboue or before the contrary opinion, in such sort, as though that were the shield of faith, and that without the affirmation thereof, the catholike faith could not be defended or maintained, when as I my selfe would not obstinatelie sticke thereunto. But this I said, because I had put example in the description of thetriangle or forme, that one diuine essence consisted in three subiects or persons in themselues diuine, that is to say, the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghoſt. The article of the which Trinitie, is the chiefe shield of faith, and foundation of the catholicke truth.

Furthermore, that it may be euident vnto all men that the causes were for the which I was reputed and thought to sticke to, and fauour sometime John Hus: I signifie vnto all men by these presents, that when as I heard him oftentimes both in his sermons, and also in the Schooles, I beleeued that he was a very good man, neither that he did in any point gainesay the traditions of our holy mother the Church, or holy doctors: insomuch as then I was latelie in this Citie, and the articles which I affirmed were shewed vnto me, which were also condemned by the sacred Councell, at the first sight of them I did not beleeue that they were his, at the least not in that forme. But when as I had further vnderstood by certaine famous doctors and masters of diuinitie, that they were his articles, required for my further information and satisfaction, to haue the bookes of his owne handwriting shewed vnto me, wherein it was said, those articles were contained. The which bookes, when they were shewed vnto mee written with his owne hand, which I did know as well as mine owne, I found all, and euery one of those articles therein written in like forme as they are condemned. Wherefore I doe worthilie iudge and thinke him and his doctrine with his adherents, to be condemned and reproued by this sacred Councell, as heretically and without reason. All which the premisses with a pure minde and conscience, I do here pronounce and speake, being now fullie and sufficientlie informed of the foresaid sentences and iudgements giuen by the sacred Councell against the doctrines of the said John Wicklisse and John Hus, and against their owne persons: vnto the which iudgement, as a deuout catholike in all things, I doe most humblie consent and agree.

Also I the foresaid Hierome, which before the reuerend fathers, the lords, cardinals, and reuerend lords, prelates and doctors, and other worshipfull persons of this sacred Councell in this same place, did heretofore freely and willingly declare and expound mine intent and purpole, amongst other things speaking of the Church, did diuide the same into three parts. And as I did perceiue afterward, it was vnderstood by some that I would affirme, that in the triumphant Church, there was faith. Whereas I doe firmelie beleeue that there is the blessed sight and beholding of God, excluding all darke vnderstanding and knowledge. And now also I do say, affirme and declare, that it was neuer my intent and purpose, to proue that there should be faith, speaking of faith, as faith is commonly defined, but knowledge farre exceeding faith. And generallie what soeuer I said, either there, or at any time before, I doe referre, and most humblie submit my selfe vnto the determination of this sacred Councell of Constance.

Moreouer, I doe sweare both by the holy Trinitie, and also by the moll holy Gospell, that I will for euermore remaine and persuere without all doubt, in the truth of the Catholike Church. And all such as by their doctrine and teaching, shall impugne this faith, I iudge them worthie together with their doctrines of eternall curse. And if I my selfe at any time (which God forbid I should) doe presume to preach or teach contrarie thereunto, I will submit my selfe vnto the seuerite of the Canons, and bee bound vnto eternall paine and punishment. Whereupon I doe deliuer by this my confession and tenor of my profeſſion willingly before this sacred generall Councell, and haue subscribed and written all these things with mine owne hand.

Hierome after his abiuration remoued into prison.

AFter all this, they caused him to be caried againe vnto the same prison, but not so straitly chained and bound as he was before: not withstanding kept euery day with soulders and armed men. And when as afterward, his enemies which were appointed against him, as Michael de Causis, and wicked Pallets, with other their companions in these affaires, vnderstood and knew by the words and talke of master Hierome and by other certaine tokens, that hee made the same abiuration and recantation, not of a sincere and pure mind, but only to the intent thereby to scape their hands, they together with certaine frieres of Prage, of the order of Carmelites, then comming in, put vp new accusations against the said master Hierome, and deliuered the same into articles, being very instant and earnest that he should answer thereunto. And forsomuch as his iudges, and certaine cardinals, as the cardinall of Caumbay, the cardinall de Vrsinis, the cardinall of Aquilegia, and of Florence, considering the malice of the enemies of master Hierome, did see the great iniurie that was done vnto him, they laboured before the whole Councell for his deliuerie.

Hierome accused anew by Caulis, Pallets, and the Carmelites. The cardinall of Caumbay with certaine other cardinals labour for the deliuery of Hierome.

It happened vpon a certaine day, as they were labouring in the Councell for the deliuerie of the said master Hierome, that the Germaines and Bohemians his enemies, with all force and might resisted against it, crying out, that the matter in no case bee dismissed. Then start vp one called Doctor Haid, which said vnto the cardinals; we marueil much of you moll reuerend fathers, that your reuerences will make intercession for such a wicked heretike, for whose sake we in Boheme with the whole clergy, haue suffered much trouble and mischiefe, and peraduenture your fatherhods shall suffer: and I greatly feare, lest that you haue received some rewards, either of the king of Boheme, or of these heretikes. When as the Cardinals were thus rebuked, they discharged themselues of master Hierome cause and matter.

Si dimittis hunc, non es amicus Cæsaris.

Then his enemies aforesaid, obtained to haue other iudges appointed, as the Patriarch of Constantinople, and a Germaine doctor, forsomuch as they did know that the patriarch was a grieuous enemie vnto master Hierome, because he being before appointed iudge by the Councell, had condemned John Hus vnto death.

The patriarch of Constantinople gaue sentence of death both against Hus, and S. Hierome of Prage.

But S. Hierome would not answer them in prison, requiring to haue open audience, because he would there finally declare vnto them his mind, neither would hee by any meanes consent vnto those priuat iudges. Whereupon the presidents of the Councell thinking that the said S. Jerome would renue his recantation, before the said audience, and confirme the same, did grant him open audience.

In the yere of our Lord 1416. the 25. day of May, which was the Saturday before the Ascension of our Lord, the said master Jerome was brought into open audience before the whole councell, to the great cathedrall Church of Constance, where as by the commissioners of the Councell, in the behalfe of his forsaid enemies, there was said against him of new a hundred and seuen articles, to the intent that hee should not scape the snare of death, which they prouided and laid for him: in so much as the iudges had before declared that by the saying of the witnesses it was alreadie concluded in the same audience. The day aforesaid, from morning, vntill none, he answered vnto more then 40. articles, most subtilly obiected against him: denying that he held or maintained any such artirles as ineere either hurtfull or false, affirming that those witnesse had deposed them against him falsly and slanderously, as his most cruell and mortall enemies. In the same Session they had not yet proceeded vnto death, because that the none time drew so fast on, that hee could not answer vnto the articles. Therfore for lack of time sufficient to answer vnto the residue of the articles, there was another time appointed, which was the third day after the foresaid Saturday, before the Ascension of our Lord, at which time againe early in the morning, hee was brought vnto the said Cathedrall Church to answer vnto all the residue of the articles.

The diuersitie of Hierome in answering his aduersaries.

In all which articles, as well those which he had answered vnto the Saturday before, as in the residue, he cleared himselfe very learnedly, refelling his aduersaries, who had no cause, but onely of malice and displeasure were set against him, and did him great wrong) in such sort, that they were themselues astonied at his oration, and refutation of their testimonies brought against him, and with thame enough were put to silence: As when one of them had beaunded of him, what hee thought by the Sacrament of the altar, he answered; Before consecration (said he) it is bread and wine: after the consecration it is the true bodie and bloud of Christ; adding with all mee wordes according to their catholike faith. Then another rising vp; Hierome, said he, there goeth a great rumor of thee, that thou shouldest hold, bread to remaine vpon the altar. To whom hee pleasantlie answered, saying: that hee beleeued bread to bee at the bakers. At which words being spoken, one of the Dominicke friers fum thy tooke on, and said; What? dost thou denie that no man doubteth of? Whose presuth sawcinesse, Hierome with these words did well represse: Hold thy peace (said he) thou monke, thou hypocrite: and thus the monke being nipped in the head, sat downe dumbe. After whom, started vp another, who with a loud voice cried out: I sweare (said he) by my conscience, that to bee true, that thou dorst denie. To whom said Hierome againe, speaking in Latine: Heus, inquit, sic iurare per conscientiam tam stultam fallendi via est: That is, thus to sweare by your conscience, is the next way to deceive. Another there was, a spitefull and a bitter enemie of his, whom he called by no other name then bogge, or asse. After he had thus refuted them one after another, that they could find no crime against him, neither in this matter nor in any other, they were all driuen to keepe silence.

False witnesses.

This done, then were the witnesses called for, who comming in presence, gaue testimonie vnto the articles before produced. Vpreason wherof, the innocent cause of Hierome was oppressed, and began in the councell to be concluded. Then Hierome rising vp, began to speake: Forsomuch (saith he) as you haue heard mine aduersaries so diligently hitherto attendement it is, that you should also now heare me to speake for my self.

Audience hard to grant to Hierome to speake for himselfe.

Whereupon with much difficulte, at last audience was giuen in the Councell for him to say his mind. Which being granted, he from morning to nane continuing, intreated of diuers and sundrie matters, with great learning and eloquence. Who first beginning with his prayer to God, besought him to giue him spirit, ability, and vtterance, which might most tend to the profit and saluation of his owne soule. And so entring into his Oration:

The oration of Hierome had before the Councell.

Socrates.

Plato.
Anaxagoras.
Zeno.
Rupilius.
Boetius.

Moyses.

Joseph.

Moyses.
Daniel.
The Prophets.
Sathanna.

John Baptist.
Christ.

The Apostles.

Iknow, saith he, reuerend lords, that there haue been many excellent men, which haue suffered much otherwise then they haue deserued, being oppressed with false witnesses, and condemned with wrong iudgements. And so beginning with Socrates, he declared how he was vniustly condemned of his countrymen, neither would he escape then he might: taking from the feare of two things, which same most bitter to men, to wit, of imprisonment, and death. Then he inferred the captiuitie of Plato, the banishment of Anaxagoras, and the torments of Zeno. Moreouer, he brought in the wrongfull condemnation of many Gentiles, as the banishment of Rupilius, reciting also the vnworthie death of Boetius and others, whom Boetius himselfe doth write of.

From thence, he came to the examples of the Hebrewes, and first began with Moyses the deliuerer of the people, and the law giuer, how hee was oftentimes handled of his people as being a seducer and contemner of the people. Ioseph also, saith he, for enuie, was sold of his brethren, and for false suspition of whoredome, was cast into bands. Besides these, hee receiued Esaias, Daniel, and almost all the Prophets, who as contemners of God, and seditious persons, were oppressed with wrongfull condemnation. From thence, he proceeded to the iudgement of Sathanna, and of diuers other besides, who being good and holy men, yet were they vniustly cast away with wrongfull sentence. At the length hee came to John Baptist, and so in long processe hee descended vnto our Sauiour, declaring how it was euident to all men, by what false witnesses both he and John Baptist were condemned. Moreouer, how Stephen was slaine by the Colledge of the priests, and how all the Apostles were condemned to the death, not as good men, but as seditious sturrers vp of the people, and contemners of the Gods, and euill doers. It is vntrue, saith he, vniustlie to bee condemned one priest of an other, and yet he proued that the same hath so happened most vniustly in that Councell of priests. These things did hee discourse at large, with marueilous eloquence, and with singular admiration of all that heard him.

The false witnesse of Jerom refelled.

And forasmuch as all the whole summe of the cause did rest onely in the witnesses, by many reasons he proued that no credit was to be giuen vnto them, especially seeing they spake all things of no truth, but onely of hatred, malice, and enuie. And so prosecuting the matter, so lively and expresselie he proued vnto them the causes of their hatred, that he had almost perswaded them. So lively and likelie their hatred was detected, that almost no truth was giuen to their testimonies, saue onely for the cause and quarrell wherein they stood touching the popes doctrine. All mens minds here were moued and bending to mercie towards him: For he told them how that hee of his owne accord came vp to the Councell, and to purge himselfe he did open vnto them all his life and doings, being full of vertue and godlinesse. This was (saith he) the old manner of ancient and learned men and most holy Elders, that in matters of faith they did differ many times in arguments, not to destroy the faith, but to find out the verite. So did Augustine and Jerome differ, not only being diuers, but also contrarie one from the other, and yet without all suspition of heresie.

Hierome vnderstood by the wicked men of Jerom.

All this while the popes holie Councell did wait still, when he would begin to excuse himselfe, and to retract those things which were obiected against him, and to craue pardon of the Councell. But he persisting still in his constant oration, did acknowledge no errour, nor gaue any signification of retractation.

Hierome commendeth the life and doctrine of John Hus.

Atlast, entring into the praise and commendation of master John Hus, he affirmed that he was a good, iust, and holie man, and much lamented that death which hee did suffer. Whom hee did know from his youth vpward, to be neither of fornication, drunkard, neither any cruell or vitious person, but a chaste and sober man, and a iust and true preacher of the holie Gospell: and whatsoeuer things master John Hus and Wickliffe had holden or written specially against the abuse and pomp of the clergie, he would affirme euen vnto the death, that they were holie and blessed men, and that in all points of the catholick fauth, he doth beleeue as the holy catholick Church doth hold or beleeue. And finallie he did conclude, that all such articles as John Wickliffe and Joh. Hus had written and put forth against the enormities, pomp, and disorder of the prelats, he would sincerlie and stedfastly, without recantation, hold and defend euen vnto the death. And last of all he added, that al the sinnes that euer he had committed, did not so much gnaw and trouble his conscience, as did that onely sinne, which hee had committed in that most pitifullest fact, when as in his recantation, he had vniustly spoken against that good and holy man and his doctrine, and specially in consenting vnto his wicked condemnation, concluding that he did vtterlie renoke and denie that wicked recantation which he made in that most cursed place, and that he did it through weaknesse of heart and feare of death: And moreouer, that whatsoeuer thing he hath spoken against that blessed man, he hath altogether lied vpon him, and that he doth repent him with his whole heart, that euer he did it.

Hierome repenteth his speaking against John Hus.

And at the hearing hereof, the hearts of the hearers were not a little sore. For they wished and desired greatly that such a singular man might be saued, if otherwise their blind superstition would haue suffered it. But he continued still in his prefixed sentence, seeming to desire rather death then life. And persisting in the praise of John Hus, he added moreouer, that he never maintained any doctrine against the state of the Church, but onely spake against the abuses of the clergie, against the pride, pompe, and excesse of the prelates. Forsomuch as the patrimonies of the Churches were first giuen for the poore, then for hospitalitie, and thirdly to the reparations of the Churches: it was a griefe to that good man (said he) to see the same misspent and cast away vpon harlots, great feastings, and keeping of horses and dogs, vpon gorgeous apparell, and such other things vnseeming Christian religion. And herein he shewed himselfe marueilous eloquent: yea, aboue more.

Hus never maintained any doctrine against the Church of Rome: but onely spake against their naughtie life.

Hierome put them to silence.

And when his oration was interrupted many times by diuers of them, carping at his sentences as he was in speaking, yet was there none of all those that interrupted him which scaped vnblanckt, but he brought them al to confusion, and put them to silence. Then any noise began, he ceased to speake, and after began againe, proceeding in his oration, and desiring them to giue him leaue a while to speake, whom they hereafter should heare no more: neither yet was his mind euer dashed at all these noises and tumults.

Hierome in prison 340. daies.

The excellent memorie in S. Hierome.

And this was marueilous in him to behold, notwithstanding he continued in strait prison 340. daies, hauing neither booke, nor almost light to read by: yet hath admirable his memorie serued him: Declaring how all those paines of his strait handling, did not so much grieue him, as he did wonder rather to see their vnkind hunmanitie towards him.

Then her had spoken these and many other things as touching the praise of John Wickliffe, and John Hus, they which sat in the Councell, whispered together, saying: by these these his words it appeareth that he is at a point with himself. Then was he againe carried into prison, and grieuously fettered by the hands, armes and feet, with great chaines and fetters of yron.

S. Hierome brought againe before the Councell.

The Saturday next before the Ascension day, earlie in the morning hee was brought with a great number of armed men vnto the Cathedrall Church before the open congregation, to haue his iudgement giuen him. There they exhorted him, that those things which he had before spoken in the open audience, as is aforesaid touching the praise and commendation of master John Wickliffe, and master John Hus, confirming and establishing their doctrine, he would yet recant the same: but he marueilously stoutly without all feare, spake against them, and amongst other things said vnto them: I take God to my witnesse, and I protest here before you all, that I do beleeue and hold the articles of the faith, as the holy Catholike Church doth hold and beleeue the same: but for this cause shall I now be condemned, for that I will not consent with you vnto the condemnation of those most holy and blessed men aforesaid, whom you haue most wickedlie condemned for certaine articles, detelling and abhorring your wicked and abominable life. Then hee confessed there before them all his beleefe, and vttered many things very profoundly and eloquently, in so much, that all men there present, could not sufficiently commend and praise his great eloquence and excellent learning, and by no meanes could they induce or perswade him to recant.

S. Hierome beleeth all the articles of the Catholike Church.

The eloquence of S. Hierome.

Then a certaine bishop named the bishop of Londy, made a certaine sermon exhortatiue against master Hierome, perswading to his condemnation.

After the bishop had ended the said sermon, master Hierome said against vnto them: You shall condemne me wickedly and vniustly. But I after my death will leaue a remorse in your conscience, and a naile in your hearts; Et cito vos omnes, vt ref pondeatis mihi coram altissimo & iustissimo iudice post centum annos: That is: And here I cite you to answere vnto me before the most high and iust Judge, within a hundred yeeres.

The prophecy of S. Hierome.

No pen can sufficiently write, or note those things which he most eloquently, profoundly, and Philosophically had spoken in the said audience, neither can any tongue sufficiently declare the same, wherefore I haue but only touched here the superficiall matter of his talke, partly, and not wholly noting the same. Finally, when as by no meanes he might bee perswaded to recant the premisses, immediatly euen in his presence, the sentence and iudgement of his condemnation was giuen against him, and read before him.

The sentence and iudgement of S. Hierome.

IN the name of God Amen. Christ our God, and our Sauiour being the true vine, whose father is the husbandman, taught his Disciples, and all other faithfull men, saying: If any man dwell not in me, let him be cast out as a bough or branch, and let him wither and dry, &c. The doctrine and precepts of which most excellent doctor and master, this most sacred Synode of Constance, executing and following in the cause of inquisition against heretiks, being moued by this said sacred Synode, through report, publike fame, and open infamation: procedeth against Hierome of Prage, master of Art, lay man. By the acts and processes of whose cause it appeareth that the said master Hierome hath holden, maintained, and taught diuers articles hereticall and erroneous, lately reprooued and condemned by the holy Fathers, some being very blasphemous, othersome offending godlie eares, and many temerarious and seditious, which haue been affirmed, maintained, preached and taught by the men of most damnable memorie John Wickliffe, and John Hus, the which are also written in diuers of their works and bookes. Which articles of doctrine and bookes of the said John Hus and Wickliffe, together with their memorie, and the person of the said John Hus, were by the said sacred Synode condemned of heresie. The which sentence of condemnation this Hierome afterward during the time of inquisition, acknowledged in the said sacred Synode, and approued the true Catholike and Apostolike faith thereunto consenting, accusing all heresie, specially that whereof hee was infamed, and confessed himselfe to bee infamed, and that which in times past John Hus and John Wickliffe maintained and taught in their works, sermons, and bookes: for the which the said Wickliffe and Hus, together with their doctrine and errors, were by the said sacred Synode as hereticall, condemned. The condemnations of all which the premisses, hee did openly professe and allow, and did sweare that he would persieure and continue in the veritie of that faith. And if that he should presume at any time to hold opinion, or preach contrarie thereunto, that hee would submit himselfe to the triall and truth of the Canons, and be bound to perpetuall punishment. And this his profession written with his owne hand, he deliuered vp vnto the holie Councell. Many daies after his said profession and abiuration, as a dog returning vnto his vomit, to the intent hee might openly vomit vp the most pestilent poison which had long lurked and layen hid in his breft, he required and desired that he might be openly heard before the Councell. The which being granted vnto him, hee affirmed, said and professed before the whole Synode, being publikely gathered together, that he had wickedly consented and agreed to the sentence and iudgement of the condemnation of the said Wickliffe and Hus, and that he had most shamefully lied in approuing and allowing the said sentence, neither was hee ashamed to confesse that hee had lied: yea, hee did also reuoke and recant his confession, approbation, and protestation, which he had made vpon their condemnation, affirming that hee neuer at any time had read any errors or heresie in the bookes and treatesses of the said Wickliffe and Hus. Albeit he had before confessed it, and it is euidently proued, that he did diligently studie, reade, and preach their bookes, wherein it is manifest that there are contained many errors and heresies. Also the said master Hierome did professe as touching the Sacrament of the altar, and the transubstantiation of the bread into the bodie of Christ, that he doth hold and beleeue as the Church doth hold and beleeue, saying also that he doth giue more credit vnto S. Augustine, and the other doctors of the Church, then vnto Wickliffe and Hus. It appeareth moreouer by the premisses, that the said Hierome is an aduerent and maintainer of the said Wickliffe and Hus, and their errors, and doth is, and hath been a fauourer of them. Wherefore the said sacred Synode determineth the said master Hierome as a rotten and withered branch not growing vpon the vine, to be cut off, and cast out. The said Synode also pronounceth, declareth and condemneth him as an heretike and drowned in all kind of heresies, excommunicate and accursed, leauing him vnto the arbitrement and iudgement of the secular iudge, to receiue such and due punishment, according to the qualitie of so great an offence: The said sacred Synode notwithstanding intreating that the said iudge would moderate his sentence of iudgement without perill of death.

S. Hierome giuen to the secular power.

The which sentence so giuen before his face, and ended, a great and long miter of paper was brought vnto him, painted about with red diuels, the which when he beheld and saw, throwing away his hood vpon the ground amongst the prelates, hee tooke the miter, and put it vpon his head: saying, Our Lord Jesu Christ, when as he should suffer death for me most wretched sinner, did weare a crowne of thorne vpon his head: and I for his sake in stead of that crowne, will willingly weare this miter and cap. Afterward hee was laid hold of by the secular power.

S. Hierome committed to the secular power.

After that he was led out of the said Church to the place of execution: when he was going out of the Church with a cheerfull countenance and a loud voice lifting his eies vp into heauen, hee began to sing, Credo in vnum Deum, as it is accustomed to be sung in the Church. Afterward as he passed along, hee did sing some Canticles of the Church: the which being ended, in the entring out of the gate of the citie, as men goe into Gothlehem, he did sing this hymne, Felix namque. And that respond being ended, after he came to the place of execution where as master John Hus before had suffered death innocently, kneeling before an image which was like vnto the picture of master John Hus, which was there prepared to burne master Hierome, hee made a certaine deuout prayer.

S. Hierome went singing into his martyrdome.

S. Hierome prayeth.

While he was thus praying, the tormentors tooke him vp, and lifting him vp from the ground, spoiled him of all his garments, and left him naked, and afterward girded him about the lornes with a linnen cloth, and bound him fast with cords and chaines of iron to the said Image, which was made fast into the earth: and so standing vpon the ground, when as they began to lay the wood about him, he sung Salue festa dies. And when the hymne was ended, he sung againe with a loude voice, Credo in vnum Deum, vnto the end. That being ended, he said vnto the people in the Germaine tongue in effect as followeth. Dearely beloued children, euen as I haue now sung, so do I beleeue and none otherwise. And this Creed is my whole faith: notwithstanding now I die for this cause, because I would not consent and agree to the Councell, and with them affirme and hold that master John Hus, was by them holily and iustly condemned: for I did know well enough that he was a true preacher of the Gospell of Jesu Christ.

S. Hierome burned in the fire.

The words of Hierome to the people.

S. Hierome giueth testimonie of John Hus.

After that he was compassed in with the wood vp to the crotone of the head, they cast all his garments vpon the wood also, and with a firebrand they set it on fire. The which being once fired, he began to sing with a loud voice: In manus tuas domine commendo spiritum meum. When that was ended, and that he began bebenuentlie to burne, he said in the vulgar Bohemian tongue: O Lord God father almighty, haue mercy vpon mee, and be mercifull vnto mine offences, for thou knowest how that sincerely I haue loued thy truth. Then his voice by the vehemencie of the fire was choked and stopped, that it was no longer heard, but hee moued continually his mouth and lips, as though hee had still prayed or spoken within himselfe.

The last words of S. Hierome.

The cruelte of his burthe.

When as in a manner his whole bodie with his beard was burned round about, and that there appeared through the great burning vpon his bodie certaine great bladders, as big as an egge, yet hee continually very strongly and stoutly showed,

mouth, and shaked his head and mouth, by the space almost of one quarter of an houre. So burning in the fire, he liued with great paine and martyrdome, whilest one might easilie haue gone from S. Clements ouer the bridge, vnto our Ladie

Church: he was of such a stout and strong nature. After that he was thus dead in the fire, by and by they brought his bedding, his trashed, his boots, his hod, and all other things that he had in the prison, and burned them all to ashes in the same fire. The which ashes, after that the fire was out, they did diligently gather together, and carry them in a Cart, and cast them into the Riuer of Rhene, which ran hard by the Citie.

The brothers of the Christes.

That man which was the true reporter hereof, and which testified vnto vs the acts and doings about the condemnation of master Hierome, and sent the same vnto vs to Prage in writing, both thus concludes: All these things (saith hee) I did behold, see, and heare to bee done, in this forme and manner. And if any man doe tell you the contrarie, doe not credit him; for all those things which happened vnto him, when hee came toward Constance, and also at his first comming vnto Constance of his owne free will, and afterward when he was brought bound vnto Constance, as is aforesaid, I my selfe did see and perfectly behold, and for a perpetuall memorie thereof to be had for euer, I haue directed the same vnto you, not lying, or falsifying any point thereof, as he which is the searcher of all mens hearts can beare mee witnesse, willing rather to sustaine the note of ignorance and rudenesse of stile, to beare witnesse vnto the truth, then I would by any meanes be compelled by tickling, or flattering the eares of the hearers with fained and cloked speech, to swarue or goe aside from the truth.

The truth of this Story.

Thus end the tragicall historie of master John Hus, and master Hierome of Prage, faithfully gathered and collected by a certaine Bohemian, being a present witnesse and beholder of the same, written and compiled first in Latine, and so sent by the said Bohemian into his country of Behem, and againe translated out of the Latine with like fidelitie, into our English tongue.

In the meane time while master Hierome was in this trouble, and before the Councell, the nobles and lords of Boheme and of Morauia (but not a little agrieued thereat) directed their letters vnto this barbarous Councell of popish murderers, in tenour and forme of words as followeth.

The letter of the 54. Nobles of Morauia written vnto the Councell of Constance in the defence of master John Hus, and Hierome of Prage.

To the right reuerend fathers and lords in Chriſt, the lords, cardinals, patriarks, primates, archbishops, bishops, ambassadours, deanes, and masters, and to the whole Councell of Constance: We the nobles, lords, knights and esquires, of the famous Marquesdome of Morauia, with the desire of all goodnes, and the obseruation of the commandements of our Lord Jesus Christ.

FOrasmuch as euery man both by the law of nature, and also by Gods law, is commanded to do that vnto another man, which he would haue done vnto himselfe, and is forbidden to doe that thing vnto another, which hee would not haue done vnto himselfe, as our Sauiour saith: All things whatsoeuer you Matth. 7. would that men should do vnto you, the same do you vnto them, for this is the law & the Prophets: yea, the law is fulfilled in this one point, Thou shalt loue thy neighbor as thy self. We therfore (God being our author) hauing respect as much as in vs lieth vnto the said law of God, and the loue of our neighbour, be- Rom. 13. fore did send our letters vnto Constance for our dearely beloued friend of good memorie, master John Husse bacheler of diuinitie, and preacher of the Gospell. Whom of late in the Councell of Constance (we know not with what spirit being led) you haue condemned as an obstinate heretike: neither hauing confessed any thing, neither being lawfully conuict as were expedient: hauing no errours or heresies declared or laid against him, but onely at the sinister, false and importune accusations, suggestions and instigations of his mortall enemies, and the traitors of our Kingdome and Marquesdome of Morauia. And being thus vnmercifully condemned, you haue slaine him with most shamefull and cruell death, to the perpetuall shame and infamie of our most Christian Kingdome of Boheme, and the famous Marquesdome of Morauia (as we haue written vnto Constance, vnto the most noble Prince and Lord, the Lord Sigismund king of Romans, and of Hungary, the heire and successor of our kingdom) the which was also read & published in your congregations, which we will here also haue enrolled; and haue burned him, as it is reported, in the reproch and contempt of vs.

Wherefore we haue thought good, euen now to direct our letters patents to your reuerences now present, in the behalfe of master John Hus, openlie professing and protesting both with heart and mouth, that he the said master John Hus, was a iust, good, and catholicke man, and a long season worthilie commended and allowed in our kingdome, for his life and conuersation. Hee also preached and taught vs and our subiects the law of the Gospell, and of the holie Prophets, and the bookes of the old and new Testament, according to the exposition of the holy doctors approoued by the Church, and left many Monuments in writing, most constantly detesting and abhorring all errors and heresies, continuallie admonishing both vs and all faithfull Christians to doe the like, diligentlie exhorting all men as much as in him lay, by his words, writings and trauell, vnto quietnesse and concord: so that vsing all the diligence that we might, we neuer heard or could vnderstand, that master John Hus had preached, taught, or by any meanes affirmed any errour or heresie in his Sermons, or that

The cause of John Hus cleared by the testimonie of the nobles of Boheme.

Such noble men offered their obedience to the pope, no further then was lawfull, honest and agreeable to reason and the law of God. Marke this and learne you noble men.

that by any manner of meanes he had offended vs, or our subiects, either by word or deed, but that hee alwaies led a quiet and a godlie life in Christ, exhorting all men diligently, both by his word and works, as much as he might, to obserue and keepe the law of the Gospell, and the institutions of the holie fathers, after the preaching of our holy mother the Church, and to the edifying of mens soules. Neither did these premisses, which you had so perperrated to the reproch both of vs and our kingdome and marquesdome, suffice and content you, but that also without all mercie and pitie, you haue apprehended, imprisoned and condemned, and euen now peraduenture, like as you did master John Hus, you haue most cruelly murdered the worshipfull man master Hierome of Prage, a man abounding in eloquence, master of the seuen liberall artes, and a famous philosopher, not being seene, heard, examined, neither conuict, but onely at the sinister and false accusation of his and our accusers and betraiers.

All that will liue godly in Christ. 2. Tim 3.

Defence of M. Hierome of Prage.

Furthermore, it is come to our knowledge and vnderstanding (which wee doe not without great griefe rehearse) as wee may also euidentlie gather by your writings, how that certaine detractors, odible both to God and men, priuie enuiers and betraiers, haue wickedly and grieuously, albeit falslie and traiterously, accused vs, our kingdome and marquesdome aforesaid, before you in your councell, that in the said kingdome of Boheme, and marquesdome of Morauia, diuers errours are sprung vp, which haue grieuously and manifoldlie infected both our hearts, and also the hearts of many faithfull men: in so much, that without a speedie stop or stay of correction, the said kingdome and marquesdome, together with the faithfull Christians therein, should incur an irrecuperable losse and ruine of their soules.

These cruell and pernitious iniuries which are laid vnto vs, and to our said kingdome and marquesdome, albeit most falslie and slanderously, how may we suffer? for so much as through the grace of God (when in a manner all other kingdomes of the world haue oftentimes wauered, making Schismes and Antipapes) our most Christian kingdome of Boheme, and most noble marquesdome of Morauia, since the time they did receiue the catholike faith of our Lord Iesus Christ, as a most perfect * quadrant, haue alwaies without reproue stuck vnto the church of Rome, and haue sincerely done their true obedience. Also with how great costs and charges and great trauell, with what worship and due reuerence they haue reuerenced the holy mother the Church and her pastors, by their princes and faithfull subiects, it is more manifest then the day light vnto the whole world; and your selues, if you will confesse the truth, can witnesse the same also.

He meaneth the long schisme taken of before, where three popes were striuing one against another.

* A quadrant being foure square pyramidalle, signifieth a man that is constant and vnmouable. Rom. 12.

Wherefore, that we, according to the mind of the Apostle, may procure honest and good things, not onelie before God, but before men also, and lest by neglecting the famous renowne of the kingdome and marquesdome, wee bee found cruell toward our neighbours; hauing a stedfast hope, a pure and sincere conscience and intent, and a certaine true faith in Christ Iesu our Lord, by the tenour of these we signifie and declare vnto your fatherhoods, and to all faithfull Christians, openly professing both with heart and mouth, that whatsoeuer man, of what estate, preheminence, dignitie, condition, degree, or religion so euer he be, which hath said, or affirmed, either doth say or affirme, that in the said kingdome of Boheme, and marquesdome of Morauia, heresies haue sprung vp which haue infected vs and other faithfull Christians, as is aforesaid (the onelie person of our most noble Prince and Lord, Sigismund king of Romans and of Hungarie, &c. our Lord and heire successor, being set apart, whom we trust and beleeue, not to be guiltie in the premisses) all and euery such man (as is aforesaid) doth lie falslie vpon his head, as a wicked and naughtie traitour and betraier of the said kingdome and marquesdome, and most traiterous vnto vs, and most pernitious heretike, the sonne of all malice and wickednesse, yea, and of the diuell himselfe, who is a liar and the father of all lies.

John 8. Deut. 28. Psalm. 30.

Notwithstanding, we for this present committing the foresaid iniuries vnto God, vnto whom vengeance pertaineth, who will also abundantly reward the workers of iniquitie, will prosecute them more amplie before him, whom God shall appoint in the Apostolike see, to gouerne his holy Church, as the onely and vndoubted pastor. Vnto whom God willing, we exhibiting our due reuerence and obedience as faithfull children, in those things which are lawfull, honest, and agreeable to reason and the law of God, will make our request and petition, that speedie remedie may bee prouided for vs, our said kingdome and marquesdome, vpon the premisses, according to the law of our Lord Iesus Christ, and the institutions of the holy fathers. The premisses notwithstanding we setting apart all feare and mens ordinances prouided to the contrarie, will maintaine and defend the law of our Lord Iesus Christ, and the deuout, humble and constant preachers thereof, euen to the shedding of our bloud.

Dated at Sternberg, in the yeere of our Lord, 1415. vpon S. Wenceslaus day, martyr of our Lord Iesus Christ.

Round about the said letters there were 54. seales hanging, and their names subscribed, whose seales they were. The names of which noble men, I thought it good here to annex withall, partly for the more credit of that hath been said, partly also for examples sake, to the intent that our noble men and gentlemen in this our Realme of England, now liuing in this cleare light of the Gospell, may by their example vnderstand, that if they ioyne themselues with the Gospell of Jesus, zealously, and as they should doe, yet are they neither the first, nor the most that to haue done before them: whot, yet the truth may here remaine in the stone to their shame, or else to their instruction, seeing so many noble and worthie gentlemen within the small kingdome of Bohemia, to be so forward in those so darke daies, and among so many enemies soo. peres agoe, to take part with Christ: And yet our gentlemen here in such long continuance of time, being so diligently taught, are neither in number nor in zeale to them to bee compared, but will still take part, contrary both to Christ, and to the example of these nobles, whose names they may see and reade here following.

These noble men did accompanie Hus, and with certain horsemen conduct him to Constance.

This noble man

After these things thus declared and discoursed concerning the historie of John Hus, and Hierome of Prage, the order of place and countrie next would require, consequentlie to inferre and comprehend the great troubles and perturbations, which happened after and vpon the death of these men in the countrie of Bohemе: but the order of time calleth me backe, first to other matters heere of our owne countrie, which passed in the meane time with vs in England. Which things being taken by the way and finished, we will (Christ willing) afterward returne to the tractation hereof, to prosecute the troubles and conflicts of the Bohemians, with other things belõe pertaining to the latter end of the Councell of Constance, and chosing of pope Martin, as the order of peres and time shall require.

We heard before pag. 541. how after the death of Thomas Arundell archb. of Cant. succeeded Henrie Chichester, anno 1414. and sate 25. peres. In whose time was much trouble and great affliction of good men here in England: of whom many were compelled to abiure, some were burned, diuers were driuen to exile. Whereof partly now to intreate, as wee find them in registers and histories recorded, we will first begin with John Claydon Coxar of London, and Richard Turming: whom Robert Fabian doth falsely affirme to be burned in the pere therein sir Roger Acon and D. Browne suffered; who in deede suffered not before the second pere of Henrie Chichesley being archbishop of Canturburp, which was an. 1417. The historie of which John Claydon, in the Registers is thus declared.

The storie of Iohn Claydon Coriar, and of Richard Turming Baker.

The historie of Iohn Claydon Skinner of London, and of Richard Turming Baker, Parishioners of Iohn Claydon examined.

THe 17. of August 1415. did personally appeare Iohn Claydon Coriar of London (arrested by the maior of the said citie for the suspition of heresie) before Henry archbishop of Canturburie, in Saint Pauls Church: which Iohn (being obiected to him by the archbishop, that in the citie of London and other places of the prouince of Canturbury, he was suspected by diuers godly and learned men for heresie, and to be contrary to the catholicke faith, and determination of the Church) did openly confesse and denied not, but that he had been for the space of xx. yeres, suspected both about the citie of London, and also in the Prouince of Canturburie, and specialie of the common sort, for Lollardie and heresie, and to be contrarie to the catholicke faith and determination of the Church of Rome, and defamed of the same all the time aforesaid.

Iohn Claydon first conuicted by Robert Wardbooke bishop of London.

In somuch, that in the time of master Robert Wardbooke bishop of London deceased, he was for the space of two yeres committed to the prison of Conuey, for the foresaid detamation and suspition, and for the same cause also he was in prison in the Fléete for three yeres. Out of which prison he (in the raigne of king Hen. the fourth) was brought before lord Iohn Scarle then Chancellor to the king, and there did abiure all heresie and errour. And the said Iohn Claydon being asked of the said archbishop whether he did abiure the heresie of which he was suspect, before any other: did confesse, that in a Conuocation at London in Paules Church before Thomas Arundell late archbishop deceased, he did abiure all such doctrine which they called heresie and error contrarie to the catholicke faith and determination of the Church, and that he had not onely left such articles and opinions, wherein hee was defamed, but also did abstaine from all companie that were suspected of such opinions, so that he should neither giue aid, helpe, counsell, nor fauor vnto them.

Iohn Claydon brought vnto the bishop.

And moreouer, the said Iohn was asked by the said archbishop, whether hee euer had in his house since his abiuration, in his keeping, any bookes written in English. Whereunto hee confessed, that hee would not denie, but that he had in his house, and in his keeping many English bookes: for hee was arrested by the maior of the citie of London, for such bokes as hee had, which bookes (as hee thought) were in the maiors keeping. Vpon the which, the maior did openlie confesse, that hee had such bookes in his keeping, which in his iudgement were the worst, and the most peruerse that euer he did reade or see, and one boke that was well bound in red leather, of parchment, written in a good English hand: and among the other bookes found with the said Iohn Claydon, the maior gaue vp the said booke before the archbishop. Whereupon the said Iohn Claydon, being asked of the archbishop if he knew that booke, did openlie confesse that he knew it very well, because he caused it to bee written of his owne costs and charges, for hee spent much monie thereupon since his abiuration. Then was hee asked who wrote it. He did answer, one called Iohn Grime.

English bookes.

The iudgement of the maior of London.

Claydon beholden much vnto vpon English bookes.

And further, being required what the said Iohn Grime was, hee answered, hee could not tell. Againe, being demanded whether hee did euer reade the same booke, he did confesse that he could not reade, but he had heard the fourth part thereof read of one Iohn Fuller. And being asked whether hee thought the contents of that booke to be catholike, profitable, good, and true: Hee answered, that many things which he had heard in the same booke, were both profitable, good and healthfull to his soule: and as hee said, hee had great affection to the said booke, for a Sermon preached at Hoxlaborne, that was written in the said boke. And being further asked, whether, since the time of his said abiuration, hee did commune with one Richard Baker, of the citie aforesaid; hee did answere, yea: for the said Richard Baker did come often vnto his house to haue communication with him. And being asked, whether he knew the said Richard to be suspected, and defamed of heresie, hee did answere again, that he knewe well that the said Richard was suspected and defamed of many men and women in the citie of London, as one whom they thought to be an heretike.

Iohn Claydon could not reade.

Richard Turming Baker.

This Turming beléeued, was then in prison.

William Lindwood doctor of both lawes.

Which confession being made, he did cause the said bokes to bee deliuered to master Robert Gilbert, doctour of diuinitie, to William Lindewood doctor of both lawes, and other Clerkes, to bee examined, and in the meane time Dauid Seard, Alexander Philip, and Baithasar Dera, were taken for witnesses against him, and were committed to bee examined to master Iohn Scourt, generall examiner of Canturburie. This done, the archbishop continued his Session till Monday next in the same place. Which Monday being come, which was the xv. of the said month, the said master Scourt openlie and publikelie exhibited the witnesses, being openlie read before the archbishop, and other bishops: which being read, then after that were read diuers tractations, found in the house of the said Iohn Claydon: out of the which, being examined, diuers points were gathered and noted for heresies and errors, and specially out of the booke aforesaid: which booke the said Iohn Claydon confessed by his owne costs to bee written and bound, which booke was intituled, The Lanterne of light. In the which and in the other examined, were these Articles vnder written contained.

An English booke intituled, The Lanterne of light.

1. First, vpon the text of the Gospell, how the enemie did sow the tares, there is said thus: that wicked antichrist the pope hath sowed among the lawes of Christ his popish and corrupt decrees, which are of no authoritie, strength, nor valure.

2. That the archbishops and bishops, speaking indifferently, are the seates of the beast antichrist, when hee sitteth in them and raigneth aboue other people in the darke cases of errours and heresies.

3. That the bishops licence for a man to preach the word of God, is the true character of the beast. i. antichrist: and therefore simple and faithfull priests may preach when they will against the prohibition of that antichrist, and without licence.

The head and taile of anti-christ.

4. That the court of Rome is the chiefe head of antichrist, and the bishops bee the bodie: and the new sects, that is, the monks, canons, and friers, brought in not by Christ, but damnable by the pope, be the venemous and pestiferous taile of antichrist.

This is true, speaking of the inuisible Church.

5. That no reprobate is a member of the Church, but onelie such as bee elected and predestinate to saluation: seeing the Church is no other thing but the congregation of faithfull soules, which doe and will keepe their faith constantly, as well indeed as in word.

6. That Christ did neuer plant priuate religions in the Church, but whilest hee liued in this world hee did roote them out. By which it appeareth that priuate religions bee vnprofitable branches in the Church, and to be rooted out.

7. That the materiall Churches should not be decked with gold, siluer, and pretious stone superfluouslie, but the followers of the humilitie of Iesus Christ, ought to worship their Lord God humblie in meane and simple houses, and not in great buildings, as the churches be now a daies.

Three rules of persecution noted.

8. That there be two chiefe causes of the persecution of the Christians: one is, the priests vnlawfull keeping of temporall and superfluous goods: the other is, the vnlatiable begging of the friers, with their bie buildings.

Foure conditions in giuing almes.

9. That almes is not giuen vertuouslie nor lawfully except it bee giuen with these foure conditions: first, vnlesse it bee giuen to the honour of God: secondlie, vnlesse it be giuen of goods iustlie gotten: thirdlie, vnlesse it begiuen to such a person as the giuer thereof knoweth to be in charitie: and fourthlie, vnlesse it bee giuen to such as haue need, and doe not dissemble.

10. That the often singing in the church is not founded in the scripture, and therefore it is not lawfull for priests to occupie themselues with singing in the Church, but with the studie of the law of Christ, and preaching his word.

That breade remaineth in the Sacrament.

11. That Iudas did receiue the bodie of Christ in bread, and his bloud in wine. In the which it doth plainelie appeare that after consecration of bread and wine made, the same bread and wine that was before, doth truly remaine on the altar.

12. That all ecclesiasticall suffrages doe profit all vertuous and godly persons indifferentlie.

The bookes of Iohn Claydon burned.

13. That the popes and the bishops indulgences be vnprofitable, neither can they profit them, to whom they bee giuen by any meanes.

14. That the laitie is not bound to obey the prelats that forcuer they command, vnlesse the prelates doe watch to giue God a iust account of the soules of them.

15. That images are not to bee sought to by pilgrimages, neither is it lawfull for Christians to bow their knees to them, neither to kisse them, nor to giue them any maner of reuerence.

For the which articles, the archbishop with other bishops, and diuers learned men comming together, first condemned the bokes as heretical, and burned them to ashes: and then because they thought the said Iohn Claydon to be for some one and fallen into heresie, the archbishop did proceed to his definitiue sentence against the said Iohn personally appearing before him in iudgement (his confessions being read and deposed against him) after this manner.

The sentence and condemnation of Iohn Claydon.

IN the name of God, Amen. We Henrie by the grace of God archbishop of Canturburie, primate of all England, and legate of the Apostolike sea, in a certaine cause of heretical pranitie and of relapse into the same, whereupon Iohn Claydon lay man of the prouince of Canturbury, was detected, accused, and denounced, and in the said our prouince of Canturburie publikely defamed (as by publike fame and common report notoriously to vs hath been knowne) first, sitting in iudgement seat and obseruing all things law fullie required in this behalfe, do proceed to the pronouncing of the sentence definitiue in forme as followeth. The name of Christ being inuocated and only set before our eies, forasmuch as by the acts and things enacted, produced, exhibited and confessed before vs, also by diuers signes and euidences we haue found the said Iohn Claydon to haue bin, and to be publikly and notoriously relapsed againe into his former heresie, heretofore by him abiured: according to the merits and deserts of the said cause, being of vs diligently searched, waighed & pondered before, to the intent that that the said Iohn Claidon shall not infect other with his scab, by the consent and assent of our reuerend brethren Richard bishop of London, Iohn bishop of Couentrie and Liechfield, and Steuen bishop of Saint Dauids, and of other doctors as well of Diuinitie as of both lawes, and also of other discreet and learned men assisting vs in this behalfe, doe iudge, pronounce, and declare the said Iohn Claidon, to be relapsed againe into his heresie, which hee before did abiure, finally and definitiuely appointing him to be left vnto the secular iudgement, and so doe leaue him by these presents.

John Claidon committed to the secular power. The law de comburendo, insufficient.

Thus Iohn Claidon receiuing his iudgement and condemnation of the archbishop was committed to the secular power, and by them vniustly and vnlawfully was committed to the fire, for that the temporall magistrate had no such law sufficient for them, to burne any such man for religion condemned of the prelats, as is aboue sufficiently proued and declared, pag. 539. But to be short, Quo iure quaque iniuria, Iohn Claidon notwithstanding by the temporall magistrates, not long after was had to Smithfield, where meekely hee was made a burnt offering vnto the Lord, An. 1415.

The death and martyrdome of Iohn Claidon.

The burning of Iohn Claidon, and Richard Turming.

Robert Fabian, and other Chronologers which follow him, adde also that Richard Turming Baker, of whom mention is made before in the examination of Iohn Claidon, was likewise the same time burned with him in Smithfield. Albeit in the Register I find no sentence of condemnation giuen against the said Turming, neither yet in the storie of saint Albons is there any such mention of his burning made, but onely of the burning of Iohn Claidon aforesaid: wherefore the iudgement hereof I leaue free to the Reader. Notwithstanding, concerning the said Turming this is certaine, that hee was accused vnto the bishops, and no doubt was in their handes, and bandes. What afterward was done with him, I referre it vnto the authors.

Iohn Claidon, Richard Turming, martyrs.

Anno 1416

The next yeer after the burning of these two aforesaid and also of Iohn Hus being burnt at Constance, which was An. 1416. the prelats of England seeing the daily encrease of the Gospell, and fearing the ruine of their papall kingdome, were busilie occupied with all their counsell and diligence, to maintaine the same. Wherefore to make their Rate and kingdome sure, by statutes, lawes, constitutions, and terrour of punishment, as Thomas Arundell, and other prelats had done before, so the forenamed Henry Chicheley archbishop of Canturburie, in his conuocation holden at London, maketh another constitution (as though there had not enough beene made before) against the poore Lollards: the copie and tenour whereof he sendeth abrode, to the bishop of London, and to other his Suffraganes, by them to be put in strait execution, containing in words as followeth.

Ex Regist. Chichesly. 117.

HEnry by the grace of God archbishop of Canturburie, primate of all England, and legate of the sheete seate: to our reuerend brother in the Lord Richard, by the grace of God bishop of London, health and brotherly loue, with continuall increase. Lately in our last conuocation in saint Pauls church in London, being kept by you and other our brethren and clergie of our prouince, we doe remember to haue made this order vnder written by your consents: When as among many other our cares this ought to bee chefe, that by some meanes wee take those heretickes, which like fores lurke and hide themselues in the Lords vineyard: and that the dust of

You should be better occupied to shake off the dust from your negligence may be vtterly shaken from our feete and from the feete of our fellow brethern: in this the said conuocation of the prelats and clergie, wee haue ordained, that our fellow brethren, our Suffragans and archdeacons of our prouince of Canturburie, by themselues, their officials or Commissaries in their iurisdictions, and euery of them charges in their courtes, twice euery yeare at the least, doe diligently inquire of such persons as are suspect of heresie: and that in euery such their archdeaconries in euery parish, wherein is reported any heretickes to inhabite, they cause three or more of the honestest men and best reported of, to take their oth vpon the holy Euangeliste, that if they shall know or vnderstand any frequenting either in priuie conuenticles, or else differing in life or manners from the common conuersation of other catholike men, or else that hold any, either heresies or errours, or else that haue any suspected bookes in the English tongue, or that doe receiue any such persons suspect of heresies and errours into their houses, or that be fauourers of them that are inhabitants in any such place, or conuersant with them, or else haue any reconsite vnto them: they make certificates of those persons in writing, with all the circumstances wherewith they are suspect, vnto the said our Suffragans or archdeacons, or to their commissaries, so soone, and with as much speede as possible they can: And that the said archdeacon and euery of their Commissaries aforesaid, doe declare the names of all such persons denounced together with all the circumstances of them, the dioces, and places, and secretly vnder their seales doe send once vnto vs the same: And that the same dioceSans effectually direct forth lawfull processe against them, as the qualitie of the cause requireth, and that with all diligence they discerne, define and execute the same.

Twice euery yeer to inquire for Lollards.

Against priuie conuenticles. To differ from the common sort in life and manners, or against the speculatiue. Against Engli. sh bookes.

And if perhaps they leaue not such persons conuict vnto the secular court, yet notwithstanding let them commit them vnto the perpetuall or temporall prisons, as the qualitie of the cause shall require, vntill the next conuocation of the prelats and clergie of our prouince of Canturburie, there personally to remaine: and that in the same prisons they cause them to be kept according as the law requireth: And that of all and singuler the things aforesaid, that is, what inquisition they haue made, and what they haue found, and how in the processe they haue behaued themselues, and what persons so conuict they haue caused to be put in safe keeping, with what diligence or negligence of the Commissaries aforesaid, with all and all maner of other circumstances premised, and thereunto in any wise appertaining, and specially of the abiurations, if in the meane time they shall chance to abiure any heresies: that then in the next conuocation of the prelates and clergie vnder the seale aforesaid, they cause the same distinctly and openly to be certified to vs and our successors: And that they deliuer effectually to the officiall of our court, the same processe to remaine with them, or else in the register of our court of Canturburie; so that euery one, to whom such things appertaine for the further execution of the same processe, may haue recourse vnto the same officiall, with all effect.

We therefore command, that as touching the constitution brought vnto your citie and diocesan, you cause the same in conuenient place and time to bee published, and that in all points you both obserue the same your selues and cause it also of others to bee diligently obserued: Commanding furthermore, all and singuler our fellow brethren and Suffragans, that they in likewise cause the same to bee published throughout all their cities and dioces, and both diligently obserue the same themselues, and also cause all others to do the same: and what thing soeuer you shall doe in the premises, that you certifie vs betwixt this and the feast of saint Peter ad vincula next comming, that you duely certifie vs of these things, by your letters patents, containing the same effect, sealed with your seales. Dated at our house in London, the first day of July, Anno 1416.

The trouble of Iohn Barton, and Robert Chapell in cause of religion.

Bishop Repington a fore mention'd in the storie of Wickliffe.

In During the time of this conuocation in the yeere aboue said, two priests were presented and brought before the bishops, noted and defamed for heretickes: one named Iohn Barton, vnto whom it was obiected by Philip bishop of Lincolne, that he had bene excommunicated about fiue or seuen yeeres before, vpon articles concerning religion, and yet neither would appeare being cited, nor would seeke to bee reconciled againe vnto the church. Which things being so proued against him, he was committed to the custodie of the foresaid Philip bishop of Lincolne, and so to be holden in prison, till hee should heare further what should be done.

The other was Robert Chapell, otherwise named Holbech, chaplaine sometime to the lord Cobham: vnto whom likewise it was obiected, that hee being vnder the sentence of excommunication about three or foure yeares, yet notwithstanding to the contempt of the keyes, did continue saying masse, and preaching, and sought not to be reconciled; Chapell denying that he did know any such excommunication giuen out against him. Then was the copie of his excommunication first made by the bishop of Rosse, afterward denounced by the bishop of London at Paules crosse, brought and read before him: and so that done, that Session broke vp for that time, which was about the latter end of May, An. 1416.

The xij. day of the moneth of July next following, the said Chapell appeared againe before the archbishop and the prelats. To whom when it was obiected as before, how hee had preached without the bishops licence, in diuers places, as at Cobham, at Cowling, and at Shoone; at length hee confessing and submitting himselfe, desired pardon. Which although it was not at the first granted vnto him, yet at the last the bishop of Roff. putting in his hands the decree of the canon law, 2. q. 7. cap. Quories, &c. and causing him to reade the same, made him to abiure all his former articles and opinions as heretical and schismaticall, neuer to hold the same againe, according to the contents of the foresaid decree. Whereupon the said Robert being absolued by the authoritie of the archbishop, (saue only that hee should not intermeddle with saying masse before he had beene dispensed from the pope himselfe for irregularitie) was inioyned by the archbishop himselfe for his penance, standing at Pauls to publish these articles following vnto the people, in stead of his confession giuen him to bee read.

R. Chappel abiureth.

Articles obtruded to R. Chappel to confesse.

In primis, I confesse that bishops, priests, and other ecclesiasticall persons, hauing no other profession to the contrarie, may lawfully haue, receiue, and retaine lands and possessions temporall, to dispense and dispose the same and the rents thereof, to the behoofe of themselues, or of their church where they dwell, according as seemeth good to them.

2 Item, I confesse that it were very brimishall, yea rather brutish, that temporall men vpon any occasion, whatsoeuer it be, should take away temporall lands and possessions from the church either vniuersall or particular, to whom they are giuen, the consideration of the abuse of morall prelats, priests, or other ministers in the church conuerting (which are mixt together good with bad) abusing the same, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Marke well this catholike doctrine of the popes church, concerning remission of sins. Marke also this doctrine agreeth with Gods commandement, and with his word.

3 Item, I confesse that peregrinations to ꝓ reliques of saints and to holy places, are not prohibited, nor to be contemned of any catholike, but are auailable to remission of sins, and approued of holy fathers, and worthie to be commended.

4 Item, I confesse that to worship the images of Christ or of the other saints, being set vp in the church, or in any other place, is not forbidden: neither is any cause inductiue of Idolatrie, being so vsed as the holy fathers doe will them to bee worshipped: But rather such images doe profit much to the health of christians, because they doe put vs in remembrance of the merits of those saints whom they represent, and the sight of them doth moue and stir vp the people to prayers and deuotion.

Ergo, by this confession of the auncient fathers, images are not to be worshipped.

5 Item, I confesse that auricular confession vsed in the church is necessary for a sinner to the saluation of his soule, and necessarie to bee done of such a priest, as is ordained by the church, to heare the confession of the sinner, and to enioyne him penaunce for the same: without which confession (if it may be had,) there is no remission of sinnes, to him that is in sinne mortall.

How can christ giue the keies of heauen vnto his church, but by this confession auricular.

6 Item, I confesse and firmely doe hold, that although the priest be in mortall sinne, yet may he make the body of Christ, and minister other Sacraments and Sacramentals: which neuertheless are profitable to all the faithfull, whosoeuer receiueth them in faith and in deuotion of the church.

7 Item, I confesse that bishops in their owne diocees, may forbid, decree, or ordaine vpon reasonable causes, that priests should not preach, without their speciall licence, the word of God, and that those that do against the same, should suffer the ecclesiasticall censures.

Priuate religions not profitable, therefore to be put away.

8 Item, I confesse that priuate religions as well of monks, canons and other, as also of the begging friers, being allowed by the church of Rome, are profitable to the vniuersall church, and in no meanes contrarie to Gods law, but rather founded and authorized thereon.

9 Item, I promise and sweare vpon these holy Euangelies, which I hold here in my hands, that I will neuermore hold, affirme, nor by any meanes teach any thing contrarie vnto the premisses either openly or priuately.

After the setting out of the constitution aforesaid in the daies of the abouenamed Henry Chichesley archbishop of Canturburie, great inquisition hereupon followed in England, and many good men whose hearts began to bee wonne to the Gospell, were brought to much deration and caused outwardly to abiure.

Great lamentation in England. Christ had the hearts of many then he has them now.

Thus, while Christ had the inward hearts of men: yet the catholicke Antichrist would needs possesse their outward bodies, and make them sing after his song. In the number of whom, being compelled to abiure, besides the other aforsaid, was also Iohn Taylor of the parish of S. Michaels at Quern.

R. Brakle sum of such as abiured vnder Henrie Chichesley.

William Ianes maister of art and physition, who had long remained in prison, and at length after abiuration, was licenced with his keeper to practise his physicke.

I. Swart. Ect Fryer. John Swarte.

Also I. Swart, so named for his low stature, which was sent by the duke of Bedford to the foresaid Chichesley and other bishops to be examined before them in the conuocation: where hee at length reuolting from his doctrine recanted & did penance.

I. Iourdelay.

In like maner Iohn Iourdelay of Lincolnshire, well commended in the registers for his learning, accused by the priests of Lincolne for a certaine booke, which he contrarie to the former decree of the bishops did conceale and did not exhibite vnto them, was therefore enforced to abiure. After whom was brought likewise before the bishops, one Katharin Dertford a Spinster, who being accused and examined vpon these 3. articles concerning the sacrament of the popes altar, adoration of Images, and of pilgrimage, answered that she was not able, being vnlearned, to answere to such high matters, neither had she any further skill, but onely her Creed and x. commandements: and so was shee committed to the vicar generall of the B. of Lint. (for that the was of the same diocess) to be kept and further to be examined of ꝓ same. Ex regist. H. Chichesley.

I. Iourdelay abiureth.

At the same sitting was also brought before the said archbishop and his fellow bishops, by the Lieutenant of the Tower, the parson of Yeggely in Lincolnshire, named Sr. Rob. who being long kept in the Tower, at length by the kings writ was brought & examined the same time vpon the like articles, to wit touching the sacrament of the altar, peregrination, & donation of Images, and whether it was lawfull for spirituall men to enioy temporall lordships, &c. To the which articles he answered (saith the Register) doubtie and mockingly, saue only in the sacrament he seemed something more conformable, albeit not yet fully to their contentation. Therefore being committed to the custodie and examination of Richard bishop of Lincolne, in the end he was also induced to submit himselfe.

Robert parson of Yeggeley examined.

The same likewise did W. Henry of Leterden, being suspected and arrested for companie keeping with them, whom the bishops called Lollards, and for hauing suspected bokes.

W. Henry of Leterden examined.

Besides these, diuers other there were also which in the same conuocation were conuented, and reuoked their opinions, as I. Galle a priest of London, for hauing a boke in English, intituled: A boke of the new law. Item, Richard Wonke, vicar of Chetham in Lincolneshire, who submitted himselfe likewise. In this race and number followed moreouer, Bartholomew Cornonger, Nic. Hoper seruant to the lord Cobham, Tho. Granter with other mo, mentioned in the foresaid Register.

A booke of the new lawe. R. Galle. Rob. Wonke. Bart. Cornonger. N. Hoper. Tho. Granter, troubled for their doctrine.

Among the rest which were at this time troubled for their faith, was one Radulph Pong in priest, who for the same doctrine was arrested and sent vp by the lord Chancellor of England, to the foresaid archbishop, and by him committed to David Pitre, bishop of Landaff to the bishop of London. There after he had remained foure monethes in prison, hee was by the said David presented to the conuocation, against whom diuers articles were obiected.

One head, that is, the vnitie of the church.

But for the better explaning of the matter, first here is to be noted, that touching the time of this conuocation prouincial, pope Martin had sent bolone to the clergie of England, for a subsidie to be gathered of the church, to maintaine the popes warre against the Lollards (so the papists did terme them) of Bohemia. Also another subsidie was demanded to persecute one Peter Clerke master of Art of Oxford, who flying out of England, was at the councell of Basill, disputing on the Bohemians side. And thirdly, another subsidie was also required to persecute Wi. Russell, Warden of the grayfriers in London, who the same time was fled from England to Rome, to maintaine his opinion before the pope, and there escaped out of prison, &c. of whom more largely hereafter (Christ willing) we shall entreate. In the meane time marke here the practises of the pope to bake in the English money by all maner of pretences possible.

Thus Rafe Pongin, the foresaide examinate, appearing before the bishops in the conuocation, it was articulated against him, first that he should affirme and hold, not to be lawfull for any christian to fight and make warre against the heretickes of Bohemia.

Article ecclesiasticall against Rafe Pongie.

Item, it was to him obiected, that he did hold and say, not to be lawfull for any man to haue propriety of goods, but ꝙ same to be common: which he expresly denied that euer he so said or affirmed. Whereby we haue to obserue, how the craftie malice of these aduersaries vseth falsly to collect and surmise of men, what they neuer spake, whereby to oppresse them wrongfully, whom by plaine truth they cannot expugne.

Moreouer, they obiected against him, that he should keepe companie with maister Clerke aforesaid, and also that he dispersed in the citie of London, certaine bookes of Iohn Wickliffe and of Peter Clerke, namely, the booke Trialogus, and the gospels of Iohn Wickliffe, &c. He was charged moreouer to haue spoken against the popes indulgences, for that the pope had no more power to giue indulgences then hee had.

Trialogus. The Gospels translated by I. Wickliffe.

Upon these and other such articles obiected, the said Pongin being asked if he would reuoke, answered that it seemed to him not iust or meete so to doe, which did not know himselfe guiltie of any hereste. Thus he being respited for the time, was committed to prison till the next sitting; into then being called diuers and sundrie times afterward before the bishops, after long inquisition and straite examination made, also depositions brought in against him so much as they could search out, hee notwithstanding still denied as before, to recant. Furthermore, in the said Parliament, Act. 17. it was enacted that the church and all estates should enioy all their liberties, which were not repealed, or repealeable by the common law: meaning belike, the excluding of the iurisdiction of the popes forreine power, which hath alwaies by the common law been excluded out of this realme.

An. 5. Hen. 5. Act. 17.

In the same parliament also a grieuous complaint was made (by the bishops no doubt) against insurrections. In the end they suggested that they were the Lollards, heretickes, and traitors, with a request that commissions might at all times be granted to inquire of them. Whereunto answer was made, that the statutes therefore made should bee executed, &c. Thus the clergie Tanquam leones rugientes, ceased not to roare after christian blood: and whosoeuer was else in fault, still the clergie cried: crucifie Christ, and deliuer vs Barrabas: For then all horrible facts and mischeefes, if any were done, were imputed to the poore Lollards.

All the blame laid to the Lollards.

And now from our English matters, to returne againe to the storie of the Bohemians, from whence wee haue a little digressed: when as the newes of the barbarous cruelties exercised at Constance against Iohn Hus, and Hierom of Prage, were noised in Bohemie, the nobles and gentlemen of Boiauia and Bohemie, such as fauoured the cause of Iohn Hus, gathering themselues together in the scale of Saint Christ: first sent their letter vnto the councell, expostulating with them, for the iniurie done to those godly men, as is before expressed, page 554. For the which letter they were all cited vp to the councell. Vnto this letter Sigismund the emperour maketh answere againe in the name of the whole councell: first, excusing himselfe of Iohn Hus his death, which he said was against his safe conduct, and against his will: Insomuch that her rose in anger from the councell, and departed out of Constance, as is before remembred. Secondly, her requireth them to bee quiet, and to conforme themselues peaceably vnto the order of the catholike church of Rome, &c.

The followers of Iohn Hus in Bohem.

Also the councell hearing or fearing some stirre to rise among the Bohemians, did make lawes and articles whereby to bridle them, to the number of fortie.

Articles decreed in the councell of Constance against the Bohemians.

That the confederacie of the seculars made betweene themselues, or any of the spiritualty, to the preiudice of the foresaid councell, and of the apostolike see and Church of Rome, in the fauour of Iohn Husse, Hierome of Prage, and other in the said councell condemned, shall bee dissolued.

That the rites and ceremonies of christian religion, touching Gods seruice, images, and worshipping of reliques, shall bee obserued, and transgressours of the same bee punished.

Concilium maguntinum.

That all secular persons being monished and charged by the Ordinaries, shal be bound to giue their aid and furtherance vnto them, touching the premisses.

The Bohemians, notwithstanding these cruell articles, contemning the vaine deuices of these prelats and fathers of the councell, ceased not to proceede in their league and purpose begunne, ioyning themselues more strongly together.

Deposing of pope Iohn 23. Ex hist. Albani.

In this meane time it happened, that during this councell of Constance, after the deposing of pope Iohn, and spoiling of his goods, which came to 75. thousand pounds of gold and siluer, as is reported in the storie of Saint Albans, pope Martine vpon the day of Saint Martine, was elected. Concerning whose election, great preparation was made before of the councell, to that beside the cardinals, fiue other bishops of euery nation should enter into the conclaue, who there together should be kept with thinne diet, till they had founded a pope. At last, when they were together, they agreed vpon this man, and not tarrying for opening the doze, like mad men, for hast, brake open an hole in the wall, crying out, habemus papam, Martinum, wee haue a Martine pope. The emperour hearing thereof, with the like hast, came apace, and falling downe kissed the new popes feet. Then went they all to the church together, and sang, Te Deum.

The next day following, this Martine was made priest (which before was but a cardinall deacon) and the next day after was consecrate bishop, and sang his first masse, whereat was present 140. mitred bishops. After this the next morow, the new holy pope ordained a generall procession, where a certaine clerke was appointed to stand with flaxe, and fire, who setting the flaxe on fire, thus said: Ecce pater sancte, sic transit gloria mundi. i. Behold holy father, thus vaineth the transitorie glory of this world. Which done, the same day the holy father was brought vp vnto an high scaffold: saith the story) I will not say to an high mountaine, where was offered to him all the glorie of the world, &c. there to bee crowned for a triple king. This done, the same day after dinner, the new crowned pope was with great triumph brought through the middest of the citie of Constance, where all the bishops and abbats followed with their miters. The popes horse was all trapt with red skarlet downe to the ground. The Cardinals horses were all in white silke, the emperour on the right side, and prince elector on the left, playing both the popes footemen, went on foote, leading the popes horse by the bridle.

Why then doth the pope keepe still the old Iewes ceremonies? all things be made new? Anno 1417

As this Pageant thus with the great giant procéded, and came to the market place, there the Iewes (according to the maner) offered to him their law and ceremonies. Which the pope receiuing, cast behind him, saying: Recedant vetera, noua sunt omnia. i. Let old things passe, all things bee made new, &c. Ex hist. S. Alb. ex paralip. Visperg. This was Anno 1417.

Thus the pope being now confirmed in his kingdome, first beginneth to write his letters to the Bohemians, wherein partly he moueth them to catholike obedience, partly he dissembleth with them, saying, that if it were not for the emperours request, he would enter procelle against them. Thirdly and finally hee threateneth to attempt the vttermost against them, and with all force to inuade them, as well with the apostolicall, as also with the secular arme, if they did still persist, as they began.

Albeit these new threats of the new bishop, did nothing moue the constant hearts of the Bohemians, whom the inward zeale of Christs word had before inflamed.

And although it had beene to be wished, such bloodshed and warres not to haue followed: yet to say the truth, how could these Rabines greatly blame them herein, whom their bloodie tyrannie had before prouoked to brutishly, if now with their glosing letters they could not so easilie appeale them againe?

Wherefore these foresaid Bohemians, partly for the loue of Iohn Hus and Hierome their countrimen, partly for the hatred of their malignant papistrie, assembling together, first agreed to celebrate a solemne memoriall of the death of Iohn Hus and Hierome, decreeing the same to bee holden and celebrate yearely. And afterward, by meanes of their friends, they obtained certaine churches of the king, wherin they might freely preach and minister the Sacraments vnto the congregation. This done, they suppressed diuers monasteries, phalisaicall temples, and idolatrous phanes, beginning first with the great monasterie of the blacke friers, eight miles from Prage, and driuing away the wicked and vicious priests and monkes out of them, or compelling them vnto a better order. And thus their number more and more increasing vnder the conduct of a certaine noble man named Nicolas, they went againe vnto the king, requiring to haue more and ampler churches granted vnto them. The king seemed at the first willingly and gently to giue eare vnto the said Nicolas intreating for the people, and commanded them to come againe the next day.

I yearely memoriall of Iohn Hus and Hierome.

reformers of religion among the Bohemians.

When the people were departed, the king turning himselfe to the noble man Nicolas, which taried still behind, said: Then hall begun a tuch to put me out of my kingdome, but I will make a rope of it, wherewith I will hang thee. Whereupon he immediately departed out of the kings presence, and the king himselfe went into the castle of Tissegrade: within a while after, into a new castle, which hee himselfe had builded fiue stones casts from thence, sending embassadors to his brother to require aid.

K. Wenceslaus threatneth Nicolas.

These protestants being assembled in the towne of Prage, holding their conuentions: the king sent forth his chamberlaine with three hundred horsmen, to runne vpon them: but the hauing respect vnto his life, fled. When newes thereof was brought vnto the king, all they were about him being amazed, bitterly detested the fact: but the kings cupbearer standing by, said: I knew before that these things would thus come to passe. Whom the king in a rage taking hold of, threw him downe before his feet, and with his dagger wounded haue slaine him: but being letted by such as were about him, with much ado, he pardoned him his life. Immediately the king being taken with a palsie, fell sicke, and within eightene daies after, when he had marked the names of such whom he had appointed to bee put to death, incessantly calling for aide of his brother, and other his friends, hee departed this life before the princes which hee had sent vnto, were come with aide, when he had reigned 55. yeares, and was about the age of 57. yeeres.

The death of king Wenceslaus.

The marueilous words of God vnderstanded not to be noted, in detesting his people.

The storie of Ziska.

IMmediately after the death of Wenceslaus, there was a certaine noble man named Ziska, borne at Trotinoua, which from his youth vpward, was brought vp in the kings court, and had lost one of his eyes in a battell, where as he had valiantly borne himselfe. This man being sore grieued for the death of Iohn Hus, and Hierome of Prage, minding to reuenge the iniuries which the councell had done, greatly to the dishonour of the kingdome of Boheme, vpon their complices and adherents: he gathered together a number of men of warre, and subuerted the monasteries and idolatrous temples, pulling downe, and breaking in pieces the images and idols, driuing away the priests and monks, which he said were kept vp in their cloisters, like swine in their sties to bee fatted. After this his armie being increased, hauing gathered together about fortie thousand men, he attempted to take the castle of Tissegrade, which was but slenderly warded. From thence the said Ziska vnder the conduct of Tozanda, went speedily vnto Pelsina, where as he knew he had many friends of his faction, and tooke the towne into his power, fortifying the same very strongly, and those which taried behind, tooke the castle of Tissegrade.

Then the queene Sophia being very careful, sent letters and messengers vnto the emperour Sigismund, and other nobles adioyning vnto her, requiring aide and helpe: but the emperour made preparation against the Turke, which had then lately wonne certaine castles of him. Whereupon the queene seeing all aide to faile off, together with Zenko Waterberge, gathered an host with the kings treasure, and fortified the castle of Prage, and the lesser citie which ioyneth vnto the castle, making gates and towers of wood vpon the bridge ouer the riuer Sultane, to stoppe that the protestants should haue no passage that way. Then it happened that at the Ile of S. Benedict, one Peter Steremberge fought an equall or indifferent battell with them.

The queene sendeth for Sigismund the emperour.

In the meane time the number of the protestants being increased in Prage, they fought for the bridge. In which battell many were slaine on both parts, but at the length the iustices man the bridge, and the nether part of lesser Prage, the queenes part fleeing into the vpper part there where as they turning againe fiercely renued the battell, and fought continually day and night by the space of fiue daies. Many were slaine on both parts, and goodly buildings were raced, and the councell house, which was in a low place, was vtterly defaced and burned.

During the time of this troublous estate, the embassadors of the emperour Sigismund were come: which taking vpon them the rule and gouernance of the realme, made a truce a league with the citie of Prage vnder this condition, that the castle of Wisgrade being rendred, it should bee lawfull for them to send embassadours to the emperour Sigismund to intreat as touching their estate, and that Zisca should render Pelyna and Pilsna with the other townes which hee had taken. These conditions thus agreed vpon and receiued, all the seruing professants departed out of the citie, and the Seniorate of the citie began to gouerne againe according to their accustomed manner, and all things were quieted. Howbeit, the papists which were gone out of the towne, durst not returne againe: but still looked for the emperour, by whose presence they thought they should haue beene safe. But this their hope was frustrate by meanes of certaine letters which were sent from the emperour, wherein it was written that hee would shortly come and rule the kingdome, euen after the same order and manner as his father Charles had done before him. Whereby the protestants vnderstood that their sect and religion should be vtterly banished, which was not begun during the reigne of the said Charles.

About Christmas, the emperour Sigismund came to Vnma a citie of Morauia, and there hee pardoned the citizens of Prage, vnder condition that they would let downe the chaines and barres of the citie, and receiue his rulers and Magistrates. Whereunto the whole citie obeyed, and the magistrates thereof lifting vp their hands vnto heauen, repented at the comming of the new king. But the emperour turned another way, and went vnto Tratislauia, the head citie of Silesia, where as a little before, the communaltie of the citie had slaine in an insurrection, the magistrates, which his brother Wenceslaus had set in authoritie: the principals thereof he beheaded. The newes whereof when they were reported at Prage, the citizens being feared by the examples of the Tratislauians, distrusting their pardon, rebelled out of hand, and hauing obtained Sancho on their part, which had the gouernment of the Castle of Prage, they sent letters into all the realme, that no man should suffer the emperour to enter, which was an enemie vnto Boheme, and fought nothing else, but to destroy the kingdome: which also bound the ancient citie of the Pintenians, vnder oder by pledges, and put the Marquesse of Brandenburge from the Bohemian crowne: and had not onely suffered Iohn Hus and Hierome of Prage to be burned at the councell of Constance, but also procured the same, and with all his indeauour did impugne the doctrine and faith which they taught and followed. Whilest these things were thus done, Zisca hauing gotten ouer Pelsna by composition, was twice assaulted by his enemies, but through policie hee was alwaies victor. The places where they fought, were rough and vnknowne, his enemies were on horsebacke, and all his soudiers on foote, neither could there bee any battell fought, but on foote. Wherevpon, when his enemies were alighted from their horses, Zisca commanded the women which customablie followed the host, to cast their kercheeffes vpon the ground, wherein the horsemen being intangled by their spurres, were slaine before they could vnloose their feet.

After this, he went vnto Vsca, a towne situate vpon the riuer Lusnitius, out of which towne Procopius and Ulricius, two brethren papists, had cast out many protestants. This towne Zisca tooke by force of armes the first night of Lent, raced it, and set it on fire. He also tooke the castle of Ulricius, which was a mile off, whither as Ulricius was fled, and put Ulricius and all his familie to the sword, sauing one onely.

Then, forsomuch as hee had no walled or fensed towne to inhabite, hee chose out a certaine place vpon the same riuer, which was fensed by nature, about eight miles from the citie of Vsca. This place hee compassed in with walles, and commanded euery man to build them houses, where they had pitched their tents, and named this citie Thabor, and the inhabitants his companions Thaborites, because their citie by all like, was builded vpon the top of some hill or mount. This citie, albeit that it was fensed with high rockes and cleaues, yet was it compassed with a wall and bauniure, and the riuer of Lusnitius fensed a great part of the towne: the rest is compassed in with a great trooke, the which running straight into the riuer Lusnitius, is stopped by a great rocke, and driuen backe towards the right hand, all the length of the citie, and at the further end it ioyneth with the great riuer. The way vnto it by land is scarce thirtie foote brode, for it is almost an Iland. In this place there was a deepe ditch cast, and a triple wall made, of such thicknesse, that it could not be broken with any engine. The wall was full of towers and forts set in their conuenient and meet places. Zisca was the first that builded the castle, and thole that came after him, fortified it, euery man according to his owne deuice. At that time the Thaborites had no horsemen amongst them, vntill such time as Nicolas, maister of the mint (whom the emperour had sent into Boheuia with a D. horsemen to set things in order, and to withstand the Thaborites lodging all night in a village named Nogine) was surprised by Zisca comming vpon him suddenly in the night, taking alway all his horse and armour, and setting fire vpon the village. Then Zisca taught his Soudiers to meant on horseback, to leape, to runne, to turne, to cast in a ring, so that after this hee neuer led armie without his wings of horsemen.

In this meane time Sigismundus the emperour gathering together the nobles of Slesia, entred into Boheme, and went vnto Gecium, and from thence with a great armie vnto Cuthna, alluring Cenche with many great and large promises, to render vp the castle of Prage vnto him, and there placed himselfe to annoy the towne. Thus Cenche infamed with double treason, returned home. The Citizens of Prage sent for Zisca, who speeding himselfe thither with the Thaborites, received the citie vnder his gouernance. In the Bohemians host there was but onely two Barons, Vdico Cruschina of Kirnberge, and Puico of Waldestene, with a few other nobles. All the residue were of the common people. They went about first to subdue the castle, which was by nature very strongly fensed, and could not be wonne by any other meanes then with famine: wherevpon all the passages were stopped, that no victuals should be caried in. But the Emperour opened the passages by dint of sword, and when he had giuen vnto them which were besieged, all things necessarie, hauing sent for aid out of the empire, he determined shortly after to besiege the citie. There were in the emperours campe the dukes of Saxon, the marquesse of Brandenburge, and his sonne in law Albert of Austrich. The citie was assaulted by the space of fiue weekes. The emperour Sigismund was crowned in the Petropolitane house in the castle, Conradus the archbishop solemnizing the ceremonies of the coronation. The city was straitly besieged. In y meane time the captaines Rosenes and Chagerie, which had taken the tents of the Thaborites, being ouercome in battell by Nicolas Hus, whom Zisca had sent with part of his power for that purpole, were driuen out of their tents, and Czecium the queenes citie was also taken.

There is also aboue the towne of Prage a high hill, which is called Videchon. On this hill had Zisca strongly planted a garrison, that his enemies should not possesse it, with whom the marquesse of Misnia skirmishing, lost a great part of his soudiers. For when as the Misnians had gotten the toppe of the hill, being driuen backe into a corner, which was broken and steepe, and fiercely set vpon, when as they could no longer withstand the violent force of their enemies, some of them were slaine, and some falling headlong from the hill, were destroyed. Wherevpon the emperour Sigismund raising his siege, departed into Cuthna, and Zisca with his companie departed into Thabor, and subdued many places: amongst which hee subuerted a towne pertaining to the captaine of Wisgrade. During this time the castle of Wisgrade was strongly besieged, where as, when other victuals wanted, they were compelled to eate horse flesh. All of all, except the emperour did aide them by a certaine day, they promised to yeeld it vp, but vnder this condition, that if the Emperour did come, they within the castle should be no more molested.

The emperour was present before the day, but being ignorant of the truce taken, entring into a straite vnderneath the castle, was suddenly set vpon by the soudiers of Prage, where he had a great ouerthrow, and so leauing his purpose vnperformed, returned backe againe. There were slaine in that conflict nine noble men of the Bohemians, and of the Hungarians, and other a great number. The castle was deliuered vp vnto them. Whilest these things were in doing, Zisca tooke Wallaua a captaine, which was surnamed Cignetus, by force, in a verie strong towne of his, and brought him vnto his religion. Who a few yeares after, leading the protestants host in Austria, was wounded before Rhetium, and died. There were in the territorie of Pelyna many Monasteries, of the which Zisca subuerted and burned fiue. And forsomuch as the Monasterie of saint Clare was the strongest, there he pitched himselfe.

Thither also came the emperour with his armie: but when Zisca brought forth his power against him, hee most cowardly fled, and not long after, he departed out of left Boheme. Then Zisca lead with his armie vnto Pelsna; but forasmuch as he saw the citie so fensed, that hee was in doubt of winning the same, hee went from thence to Commitania a famous citie, the which hee tooke by force, burning all the priests therein.

Afterward, when as he lay before the towne of Raby, and strongly besieged the same, he was stricken with a shaft in the eye, hauing but that one before left vnhurt. From thence, he was caried to Prage to physitions, where as hee being cured of his wound, and his life saued, yet hee left his sight, and for all that, hee would not forsake his armie, but still tooke the charge of them.

After this, the garrisons of Prage went vnto Clarona, where as there was a great garrison of the emperors, and take it by force, many being slaine of either part. They also tooke the towne of Woda in Germanie, and slue the garrison, and afterward tooke Cuthna and many other cities by composition. Further, when as they led their armie into a towne called Pons, which is inhabited by the Misnians, the Barons meeting them by the way, because they durst not ioyne battell, they returned backe. After all this, the emperor appointed the princes electors a day, that at Barthelmewtide, they should with their army inuade the West part of Boheme, and hee with an host of Hungarians would enter on the East part. There came vnto him also the archbishoppe of Ments, the countie Palatine of Rheine, the dukes of Saxon, the marquesse of Brandenburge, and many other bishops out of Alemaine: all the rest sent their aides. They encamped before the towne of Sozitz, a strong and well fenced place, which they could by no meanes subdue. The country was spoiled and wasted round about, and the siege continued vntill the feast of Saint Galle. Then it was broken vp, because the emperour is not come at his day appointed: but hee hauing gathered together a great army of the Hungarians, and well Moranians, about Chrillmas entred into Boheme, and tooke certaine townes by force, and Cuthna was yeelded vnto him. But when Zisca (although he was blind) came towards him, and set vpon him, he being afraid, and many of his nobles slaine, fled. But first hee burned Cuthna, which the Thaborits, by meanes of the siluer mines, called the pouch of Antichrist. Zisca pursuing the emperor a daies iourny, got great and rich spoile, and taking the towne of Woda by force, set it on fire: the which afterward almost by the space of fourteen yeres, remained vninhabited. The emperor passed by a bridge ouer the riuer of Iglaria. And Pisa a Florentine, which had brought fiftene thousand horsemen out of Hungary to these warres, passed ouer the pre, the which by the multitude and number of his horsemen being broke, deuoured and destroied a great number. Zisca hauing obtained this victory, would not suffer any image or idoll to be in the churches, neither thought it to be boone withall, that priests should minister with copes or ornaments: for the which cause hee was much the more enuied among the Estates of Boheme. And the consuls of Prage being agreaued at the insolencie of Iohn Przemnitz tensis, called him and nine other of his adherents, whom they supposed to be the principals of this faction, into the councell house, as though they would conferre with them as touching the commonwealth: and when they were come in, they slew them, and afterward departed home euery man to his owne house, thinking the citie had been quiet, as though nothing had been done. But their seruants being not circumspect enough, washing downe the court yard, washed out also the blood of those that were slaine, through the sinks & chanels: the which being once seene, the people vnderstood what was done. Wherevpon there was a great tumult: the councell house was straightway ouerthowne, and eleuen of the principall citizens, which were thought to be the authors thereof, were slaine, and diuers houses spoiled.

About the same time, the castell of Purgell, wherein the emperor had left a small garrison (whither as also many papists with their wiues & children were fled) was through negligence burned, and those which escaped out of the fire, went vnto Pelsna. After this, diuers of the Bohemian captaines, and the senat of Prage, sent ambassadors to Witold Duke of Lituania, and made him their king. This did Zisca and his adherents gainsay. This Witold sent Sigismund Coributus, with two thousand horsemen into Boheme, who was honorably receiued of the inhabitants of Prage. At his comming, they determined to lay siege vnto a castell situate vpon a hill, which was called Charles stone.

Here Sigismundus had left for a garrison foure centurions of soudiers. The tents were pitched in three places. The siege continued six monethe, and the assault great euery day and night. Fine great slings threw continually great stones ouer the walles, and about two thousand vessels, tubs, or baskets, filled with dead carcases and other excrements, were cast in amongst those which were besieged: which thing did so infect them with stench, that their teeth did either fall out, or were all lose. Notwithstanding they bare it out with stout courage, and continued their fight vntill the winter, hauing priuily receiued medicine out of Prage, to fasten their teeth again.

In the meane time Fredericke the elder, prince of Brandenburge, entring into Boheme with a great power, caused them of Prage to raise the siege. And Witoldus at the request of Wladislaus king of Pole, which had talked with the emperor in the borders of Hungary, called Coributus his vncle, with his whole army out of Boheme. Wherevpon the emperor supposed that the protestants being destitute of forren aid, would the sooner doe his commandement: but hee was farre deceiued therein; for they leading their armies out of Boheme, subdued the borderers thereupon adioyning. It is also reported, that Zisca went into Austrich, and when as the husbandmen of the countrey had carried away a great number of their cattell by water into an Ile of the riuer called Manubius, and by chance had left certaine calues and swine in their villages behind them: Zisca drawe them vnto the riuers side, and kept them there so long, beating them, and causing them to roare out and cry, vntill that the cattell feeding in the Iland, hearing the lowing and grunting of the cattell on the other side the water, for the desire of their like, did swim ouer the riuer: by the meanes whereof, he got and draue away a great booty.

About the same time, the emperor Sigismundus gaue vnto his sonne in law Albert duke of Austrich, the country of Morauia, because it should not want a ruler. At the same time also Ericus king of Denmarke, and Peter Infant, brother to the king of Portugall and father of Iames, cardinall of Saint Eustachius, came vnto the emperor, being both very expert men in the affaires of warre, which did augment the emperors host with their aid and power. Wherevpon, they straightway pitched their campe before Lutemperge, a towne of Morauia, and continued the siege by the space of three moneths. There was at that time a certaine knight at Prage surnamed Aqua, which was very rich and of great authority. This man, forsomuch as he had no child of his owne, adopted vnto him his sisters sonne, named Procopius: whom when he was of meane nature & age, he carried with him into France, Spaine, and Italy, and vnto Jerusalem, and at his returne caused him to be made priest. His man when the Gospell began to flourish in Boheme, take part with Zisca; and forsomuch as he was strong and valiant, and also painfull, he was greatly esteemed.

This Procopius for his valiant acts, was afterward called Procopius Magnus, and had committed vnto him the whole charge of the prouince of Morauia, and the defence of the Lutemperges, who receiuing a great power by force (maugre all the whole power which lay in the siege) carried victuals into the towne which was besieged, and so did frustrate the emperors siege. The emperor before this had deliuered vnto the marquesse of Misnia, the bridge and towne of Aussa, vpon the riuer of Albis, that they should fortifie them with their garrisons. Wherevpon Zisca besieged Aussa, and Frederike the marquesse of Misnia, with his brother the Lantzgraue of Turing, gathering together a great army out of Saxonia, Turing, Misnia, and both the Lusaces, determined to rescue and aid those which were besieged.

There was a great battell fought before the city, and the victory depended long vncertaine, but at last it fell on the protestants part. There were slaine in that battell, the Burgraues of Misnia or Chrysopolenses, the barons of Gleichen, and many other nobles, beside nine thousand common soudiers, and the towne of Aussa was taken and vtterly raced.

At the last, dissension rising betweene Zisca and them of Prage, they of Prage prepared an army against him, wherewith he perceiuing himselfe ouermatched, fled vnto the riuer of Albis, and was almost taken, but that hee had passage through the towne of Poggiebras; but they of Prage pursuing the taile of the battell, slew many of his Thaborites. At the length they came vnto certaine hils, where as Zisca going into the valley, knowing the straits of the place, that his enemies could not spread their army, he commanded his standard to stand still, and exhorting and encouraging his soudiers hee gaue them battell.

This battell was very fierce and cruell: but Zisca hauing the vpper hand, slew three thousand of them of Prage, and put the rest to flight, and straightwaies take the citie of Cuthna by force (which they of Prage had repaired) and set it on fire: then with all speede he went with his army to besiege Prage, and incamped within a bow shot of the towne. There were many both in the citie, and also in his host which grudged sore at that siege: some accusing Zisca, other some them of Prage. There were great tumults in the campe, the soudiers saying that it was not reasonable, that the city should be suppressed, which was both the head of the kingdome, and did not dissent from them in opinion, saying; that the Bohemians power would soone be tame, if their enemies should know that they were diuided within themselues: also that they had sufficient wars against the emperor, and that it was but a foolish deuice to moue wars amongst themselues. This talke came vnto the eare of Zisca, who calling together his army, standing vpon a place to bee heard, spake in these words.

BRethren, be ye not agreeued against me, neither accuse him which hath sought your health and safegard. The victories which ye haue obtained vnder my conduct, are yet fresh in memory, neither haue I brought you at any time vnto any place, from whence you haue not come victors. You are become famous and rich, and I for your sake haue lost my sight, and dwell in darknesse. Nothing haue I gotten by all these fortunate battels, but onely a vaine name. For you haue I fought, and for you haue I vanquished; neither doe I repent me of my trauels, neither is my blindnesse greeuous vnto me, but onely that I cannot prouide for you, according to my accustomed manner: neither doe I persecute them of Prage for mine owne cause, for it is your bloud that they thirst and seeke for, and not for mine. It were but small pleasure for them to destroy me, being now an old man and blinde; it is your valiantnesse and stout stomaches which they feare. Either must you or they perish: who whilest they seeme to lie in wait for me, doe seeke after your liues. You must rather feare ciuill warres then forren, and ciuill sedition ought first to be auoided. Wee will subdue Prage, and banish the seditious citizens before the emperor emperor shal haue any newes of this sedition. And then hauing but a few of his faction left, we may with the lesse feare looke for it: better then if these doubtfull citizens of Prage were still in our campe. But because ye shall accuse me no more, I giue you free libertie to doe what you will. If it please you to suffer them of Prage to liue in quietnesse, I will not be against it, so that there be no treason wrought. If you determin to haue war, I am also ready. Looke which part you will decline vnto, Zisca will be your aid and helper.

When hee had spoken these words, the soulditers mindes were changed, and thally determined to make warres, so that they rest by and by to take vp their armor and weapons, to run vnto the walles to prouoke their enemies to fight for the gates of the citie. Zisca in the meane time prepared all things ready for the assault. There is a little from Pelsina, a certaine village named Rochezana. In this place there was a child borne of poore and base parentage, whose name was Iohn: he came vnto Prage, and was named Ioannes de Rochezana, by the name of the towne where he was borne. This man grewe to be of great name and authority in the towne of Prage. Wherevpon when as Zisca beliged Prage, he by the consent of the citizens, went out into the campe, and reconciled Zisca againe vnto the citie.

When as the emperor perceiued that all things came to passe according vnto Zisca his will and mind, and that vpon him alone the whole state of Boheme did depend, he fought pitie meanes to reconcile and get Zisca into his fauor, promising him the gouernance of the whole king dome, the guiding of all his hostes and armies, and great perely reuenewes if he would proclaime him king, and cause the citizes to be swoorne vnto him. Vpon which conditions, when as Zisca for the performance of the couenants went vnto the emperor, being in his iourney at the castell of Psitcouia, he was stricken with sickenesse and died.

It is reported, that when he was demanded being sicke, in what place he would be buried; he commanded the skinne to be pulled off from his dead carcase, and the flesh to be cast vnto the fowles and beasts, and that a drum should be made of his skin, which they should vse in their battels; affirming, that as soone as their enemies should heare the sound of that drum, they would no abide but take their flight. The Taborites bespoiling all other images, yet set vp the picture of Zisca ouer the gates of the citie.

The Epitaph of John Zisca, the valiant captaine of the Bohemians.

IOhn Zisca, not inferior to an emperor: or captaine in warlike policie, a seuere punisher of the pride and auarice of the clergy, and a defender of my country, hee lie here. That which Appius Claudius by giuing god counsell, and M. Furius Camillus by valiantnesse did for the Romans; the same, I being blinde, haue done for my Bohemians. I never slacked opportunity of battell, neither did fortune at any time faile me. I being blind, did foresee all oppotunity of well ordering: & doing my businesse. Seuen times in ioyning battell, I went vtmost out of the field. I seemed to haue worthily defended the cause of the miserable and hungry, against the delicate, fat, and glutionous priests, and for that cause to haue received helpe at the hands of God. If their cruie had not let it, without doubt I had deserued to be numbred amongst the most famous men. Notwithstanding my bones lie here in this hallowed place, euen in despite of the pope.

IOANNIS ZIZKÆ Calopsis Pij aduersus Ecclesiæ hostes, oratio brevis.

¶ Iohn Zisca a Bohemian, enemy to all wicked and coueteous priests, but with a godly zeale.

And thus haue you the acts and doings of this worthy Zisca, and other Bohemians, which for the more credit we haue drawne out of Aeneas Syluius, onely his railing termes excepted, which we haue here suppressed.

All this while the emperor with the whole power of the Germans, were not so busie on the one side, but Martin the pope was as much occupied on the other side: who about the same time directed downe a terrible bull, full of all poison, to all bishops and archbishops against all such as take any part or side with Wickliffe, Iohn Hus, Jerome, or with their doctrine and opinions. The copie of which bull, which I found in an old written monument, I will the reader thoroughly to perus, wherein he shall see the pope to powre out at once all his poison.

The bull of pope Martin directed forth against the followers of John Wickliffe of England, of Iohn Hus of Boheme, and Jerome of Prage.

MArtin, bishoop, the seruant of Gods seruants, to our reuerend brethren the archbishops of Salzeburgen. Guezuen. Bambergen. Pisinen. Patauien. Tratilanien. Ratisponen. Traceuien. Pognanen. and Nitrien. and also to our beloued children the Inquisitors appointed of the prelats about recited, or where else focuer, vnto whom these present letters shall come, greeting, and Apostolicall benediction. Amongst all other pastorall cares wherewith wee are oppressed, this chiefly and specially doth inforce vs, that heresises with their false doctrine and errors, being vtterly expulsed from amongst the company of christian men, and rooted out (so farre forth as God will make vs able to doe) the right and catholike faith may remaine sound and vndefiled: and that all christian people, immouable and immolate, may stand and abide in the sinceritie of the same faith, the whole vaile of obscuritie being removed. But lately in diuers places of the world, but specially in Boehemia, and the dukedome of Morauia, and in the straits adioyning thereunto, certaine archheretikes haue risen and sprung vp, not against one onely, but against diuers and sundry documents of the catholike faith, being lauolopers, schismatikes, and seditious persons, fraught with diuelish pride and voto: thy madnesse, deceiued by the subtilty of satan, and from one euill vanity brought to a worse. Who although they vose vp and sprang in diuers parts of the world, yet agreed they all in one, hauing their tailes as it were knit together: to wit, John Wickliffe of England, John Hus of Bohemia, and Jerome of Prage of damnable memory, who drew with them no small number to miserable ruine and infidelity. For when as those and such like pestiferous persons did in the beginning of their poisoned doctrine, obstinately sow and spread abroad peruerse and false opinions, that prelats who had the regiment and execution of the iudicial power, like dumbe dogs, not able to bark, neither yet reuenging speedily with the Apostle, all such disobedience, nor regarding corporally to cast out of the lords house (as they were intoined by the canons) those subtill and pestilent archheretikes, into their wolvish fury and cruelty, with all expedition, but suffering their false and pernitious doctrine negligently, by their ouerlong delaies, to grow and way strong: a great multitude of people in stead of true doctrine receiued those things, which they did long falsly, pernitiously and damnably sow among them, and giuing credit vnto them, fell from the right faith, and are intangled (the more pitie) in the soule errors of Paganisme.

Insomuch, that those archheretikes, and such as spring of them, haue infected the catholike flocke of Christ in diuers climats of the world, and parts bordering vpon the same, and haue caused them to putrifie in the filthy dunghill of their lies. Wherefore the generall synod of Constance, was compelled with Saint Augustine to exclaime against so great and ruinous a plague of faithfull men, and of the soundand true faith it self, saying: What shall the soueraigne medicine of the church doe, with motherly loue seeking the health of her sheepe, chasing as it were, amongst a company of men frantike, and hauing the disease of the Lethargy? what? shall she desist and leaue off her good purpose? No not so. But rather let her, if there be no remedy, be sharpe to both these sorts, which are the grieuous enemies of her wombe. For the physition is sharpe vnto the man that raught and raging in his frensie, and yet hee is a louer to his owne rude and vnmannerly sonne, in binding the one, in beating the other, by shewing therein his great loue vnto them both. But if they be negligent, and suffer them to perish (saith Augustine) this manslaetude is rather to be supposed false cruelty.

And therefore the foresaid synod, to the glory of almighty God, and preseruation of his catholike faith, and augmenting of christian religion, and for the saluation of mens soules, hath corporally reiected and cast forth of the houshold of God, the foresaid John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Jerome, also amongst other things, did beleeue, preach, teach, and maintaine of the sacrament of the altar, and other sacraments of the church and articles of the faith, contrary to that the holy church of Rome beleeueth, holdeth, preacheth and teacheth, and haue presumed obstinatly to preach, teach, hold, and beleeue many other more, to the damnation of themselues and of others: and the said synod hath separated the same, as obstinate and malapert heretikes from the communion of the faithfull people, and haue declared them to be spiritually throwne forth. And many other things both wholsome and profitable hath the same councell as touching the premisses, stablished and decreed, whereby they, with by the meanes of those archheretikes, and by their false doctrine, haue spiritually departed from the Lords flocke, may by the canonicall rules be reduced to the straight path of truth and verity.

And moreouer (as we to our great griefe doe heare) not onelie in the kingdome of Boheemia, and dukedome of Morauia and other places aboue recited, but also in certaine parts and prouinces neere adioyning and bordering vpon the same; there bee many other of the sectaries and followers of the foresaid archheretikes and heretical opinions, calling behinde them backes as well the feare of God, as the shame of the world, neither receiuing fruit of conuersion and repentance by Pope Martins bloudy bull to all bishops and archbishops.

All these errors and heresises be, for that they speake against the rule of peace and their owne dignities.

Ecclesiastes 10. Fooles mouth is like the mouth of a lion. Apoc. 13.

Deuenisti lex sanguine sordpta. The popes religion hath left all sence of humanity.

An he Pegasus with the pope, that like not his superstitious cus and ordinations traditions.

A great difference betweene a louing mother, and the fearefull whore of Babylon.

Et vidi bestiam & reges terræ & exercitus eorum congregatos cum sedente in equo, & exercitu eius. Apoc. 19. Et data est illi potestas in omnem tribum, & populum & linguam & gentem. 13. And power is giuen him ouer all tribes, and people, and tongues, and nations, &c. Apoc. 13.

Ecclesiastes 10. Fooles shall chance to die, (although not so denounced by the church) yet in this is great a crime, let him and them want christian burial, and let no offerings or oblations be made for them, nor receiued. His goods and substance also from the time of his death, according to the canonical sanctions being confiscat, let no such enioy them to whom they appertaine, till that by the ecclesiasticall Iudges, hauing power and authority in this behalfe, sentence vpon that his or their crime of heresie, be declared, and promulgate: and let such owners as be found suspect or noted with any such suspition of heresie, before a competent and ecclesiasticall Iudge, according to the consideration and exigence of that suspition, and according to the quality of the person, by the arbitrement of such a Iudge, shew and declare his proper and owne innocency with deuotion, as beseemeth in that behalfe. And if in his purgation, being canonically incroched, he doe faile, or be not able canonically to make his purgation, or that he refuse to take his oth by damnable obstinacy to make such purgation; then let him bee condemned as an heretike. But such as through negligence or through slothfulnesse, shall omit to shew their said innocency, and to make such purgation, let him be excommunicat, and so long put out from the company of christian men, till that they shall make condigne satisfaction: so that if by the space of one whole yeere, they shall remaine in such excommunication, then let them as heretikes be condemned.

And further, if any shall be found culpable in any point of the foresaid pestiferous doctrine of the archheretikes aforesaid, or in any article thereof, whether it be by the report of the seditious, or else well disposed; let them yet be punished according to the canons. If only through inkamp and suspicion of the foresaid articles, or any of them, any man shall be found suspect, and in his purgation canonicall for this thing being interdicted, shall faile: let him be accounted as a man conuict, and as a conuict person by the canons let him be punished.

And furthermore, we inuocating and putting in execution the canon of our predecessor of happy memory, pope Boniface the eighth, which beginneth thus: Vt inquisitionis negotium, &c. For hereby wise require, and also command all temporall potentates, Lords and Iudges afore recited, by whatsoeuer dignities, offices, & names they are knowne: that as they desire to be had, esteemed, and counted for the faithfull members and children of the church, and doe reioyce in the name of Christ: so in likewise for defence of the same faith, they willo bey, intend, giue their aid and fauorable helpe to you that are archbishops, bishoppes, and ecclesiasticall men, inquisitors of all heretical prauitie, and other Iudges and ecclesiasticall persons by you hereunto, as aforesaid, appointed (holding the faith and communion of our holy mother the church, for the searching out, taking, and safe custody of all the aforesaid heretikes, their beleeuers, their fauorers, their receiuers, and their defenders, whensoeuer they shall be thereunto of them required.

Et falsi crines pudicos, & magnos & diuites, & pannicos, & fœminarum perechaudices rem in manu sua dextra. 1. And he shall make hasty tarte and great, rich and poore, free and bond to take the character in their right hand, &c. Apoc. 13.

And that they bring and cause to be brought (all delay set apart) the foresaid pestiferous persons so seeking to destroy others with them, into such safe keeping and prisons, as by you the archbishoppes, bishoppes, clergy and inquisitors aforesaid, are to be appointed, or else vnto such other place or places, as either you or they shall command within any of their dominions, gouernments and rectories, where they by catholike men, that is, by you the archbishoppes, bishoppes, the clergy and inquisitors, or any other that shall bee by you appointed, or are already appointed by any of you, may bee holden and kept in safe keeping, putting them in fetters, shackles, bolts, and manacles of yron vnder most strait custody for escaping away, till such time as all that businesse which belongeth vnto them, be by the iudgement of the church finished and determined, and that of such heresie, by a competent ecclesiasticall Judge (which firmely holdeth the faith and communion of the aforesaid holy Church of Rome) they be condemned. Satan tarijet bischaines.

The residue let the foresaid temporall lords, rectors, Iudges, or other their officers & pursuants, take amongst them, with condigne deaths, without any delay to punish. But fearing left to the prejudice and slander of the foresaid catholike faith and religion, though the pretert of ignorance, any man herein should be circumuented, or that any subtill and craftie men should vnder the vaile of friuolous excuse, cloke and dissemble in this matter; and that as touching the conuincing or apprehending of the foresaid heretikes, their receiuers and defenders, fauorers, beleeuers, and adherents, and also of such as are suspect of heresie, and with such like peruerse doctrine or any wise spotted, wee might giue more perfect instruction: Therefore as well to the kingdome of Boheemia, and parts neere adioyning to the same, as all other where this superstitious doctrine first began to spread, we haue thought it good to send the articles hereunder written concerning the sect of those archheretikes, for the better direction of the foresaid catholike faith.

Touching which articles, by vertue of holy obedience, we charge and command you and all other archbishoppes and bishops, all manner of commissaries and inquisitors, that euery of

of them within the diocesse and limits of their iurisdiction, and also in the foresaid kingdome, and disobeying, and places neere adioyning, although the same places be beyond the same their iurisdiction: in the fauor of the catholike faith, doe giue most diligent and vigilant care about the extirpation and correction of those errors, archheresies, and most pestiferous sect aforesaid: and also that they compel all defamed persons and suspect of so pestiferous a contagion, whether it be vnder the penalty of the crime confessed, or of excommunication, suspension or interdict, or any other conuenable paine canonicall or legall, wherein and wherefoeuer it shall seeme good to them, and as the quality of the fact requireth, by an oth corporally taken either vpon the holy Euangelists, or vpon the reliques of saints, or vpon the image of the crucifix, according to the obseruances of certaine places, and according to the interrogatories, to make conuenient answer to euery article within written. For we intend against all and singuler archbishops, bishops, ecclesiasticall persons, or inquisitors, which shall shew themselues negligent and remisse in the extirpation of the teaven of this heresticall prauitie, and purging their territories, diocesse, and places to them appointed, of such euil and wicked men: to proceed and to cause to be proceeded, vnto the deprivation and deposition of their pontificall dignities, and shall substitute such other in their places, which can and may be able to confound the said heresticall prauity, and proceede to further paines against such by the lawes limited, and to other yet more grevious (if need be require) we our selues will proceed and cause to be proceeded, according as the party his fact, and altogether of his crime committed, shall deserue. The tenor of those articles whereof we haue made mention in this our own writing are in words as follow.

The old custome of the popish crue.

¶ The Articles of John Hus to be inquired vpon.

1 THere is one only vniuersall church, which is the vniuersitie of the predestinate, as shall after be declared.

2 The vniuersall church is only one: as there is one vniuersitie of those that are predestinate.

3 Paul was neuer a member of the diuell, although hee did certaine acts like vnto the acts of the church malignant.

4 The reprobate are not parts of the church, for that no part of the same finally faileth from her, because that the charity of predestination which bindeth the same church together, neuer faileth.

Speaking of the true visible church, the article is true.

5 The two natures (that is the Diuinity, and the humanity, be one Christ.

6 The reprobate, although hee be sometime in grace, according to present iustice, yet is he neuer a part of the holy church: and the predestinate is euer a member of the church, although sometime he fall from grace adventitia, but not from grace of predestination: euer taking the church for the coniunction of the predestinate, whether they be in grace or not, according to present iustice. And after this sort the church is an article of our beleefe.

This article is worthily to be wished out of the mouth of Iohn of Hus.

7 Peter is not, nor neuer was the head of the holy catholike church.

8 Priests liuing vitiously, do defile the authority of priesthood, and so, as vnfaithfull children, do vnfaithfully beleeue of the seuen sacraments, of the keies of the church, of offices, of censures, of ceremonies of the worshipping of reliques, indulgences, orders, and other holy things of the church.

The pope all his supporters reproched.

9 The pap all dignity came and grew from the emperor: and his gouernment and institution, sprang from the emperors gouernment.

10 No man can reasonably affirme either of himselfe or other, that he is the head of any particular church, or that the bishop of Rome is the head of the church of Rome.

11 A man ought not to beleeue, that he which is bishoppe of Rome is the head of euery particular church, vnlesse God haue predestinate him.

12 None is the vicar of Christ, or else of Peter, vnlesse he follow him in manners and conditions, seeing that there is no other following more pertinent, nor other wise apt to receiue of God this power procuratory. For into the office of a viceregerent of Christ is required, the conformity of manners, and the authority of the institutor.

13 The pope is not the manifest and true successor of Peter the prince of the Apostles, if he liue in manners contrary to Peter: and if he hunt after auarice, then is he the vicar of Iudas Iscariot. And likewise the cardinals bee not the true and manifest successors of the colledge of the other Apostles of Christ, vnlesse they liue according to the maner of the Apostles, hauing the commandements and counsels of our Lord Iesus Christ.

14 The doctors alledging, that if a man, which will not be amended by the ecclesiasticall censures, is to be deliuered to the secular powers, doe follow in this point the bishops, Scribes and Pharises, that deliuered Christ to the secular power (saying, it is not lawfull for vs to kill any man) because he would not obey them in all things: and that such be greater homicides then Pilat.

15 The ecclesiasticall obedience is such an obedience as the priests of the church haue found out, besides the expresse authority of the scripture. The inuentiue diuision of humane works, is, that they be either vertuous or vitious: and if a man be vitions, and doth any thing, then doth he it vitiously: and if he be vertuous, and doth any thing, then doth he it vertuously. For like as vice, which is called a great offence or mortall sin, doth staine all the doings of a vitious man: so vertue doth quicken all the doings of a vertuous man.

Priests not to beleeue the councell of Constance.

16 A priest of God liuing after his lasn, and hauing the knowledge of the Scripture, and a desire to edifie the people, ought to preach, notwithstanding any excommunication pretended of the pope. And further, if the pope, or any other magistrate doth forbid a priest so disposed to preach, he ought not to be obedient vnto him. For euery one that taketh vpon him the order of priesthood, receiueth in charge the office of a preacher: and of that burden ought he well to discharge himselfe, any excommunication against him pretended in any wise notwithstanding.

17 By the censures ecclesiasticall, as of excommunication, suspending, and interdict, the clergy to their owne aduancement cause the lay people to aid them: they multiply their auarice, they defend their malice, and prepare the way to antichrist. And it is an evident signe that such censures procede from antichrist, which in their processe they call Fulminationes, that is, their thunderbolts wherewith the clergy principally procedeth against those that declare the wickednesse of antichrist, who so greatly for his owne commodity hath abused them.

18 If the pope be euill, especially if he be a reprobate, then is he with Iudas a very diuell, a theefe, and the son of perdition, and is not the head of the holy church militant, nor any member of the same.

19 The grace of predestination, is the band wherewith the bride of the church and euery member of the same, is indissolubly ioyned to their head Christ.

20 The pope or prelat that is euill and a reprobate, is a pastor in name, and not in deed, yea he is a theefe and a robber in very deed.

John Hus expounded this article with this distinct. Non ratione meritifed ratione officij.

21 The pope ought not to be called the most holy one for his office sake, for then ought a king to be called by his office, the most holy one: and hangmen, with other such officers also were to be called holy, yea the diuell himselfe ought to be called holy, forasmuch as he is Gods officer.

22 If the pope liue contrary vnto Christ, although he climbe vp by the right and lawfull election, according to the common custome of men: yet notwithstanding should hee otherwise climbe then by Christ, yea though we admit that he should enter by the election principally made by God. For Iudas Iscarioth was lawfully elect of God Christ Iesus to his bishoppricke, and yet came not hee the same way he ought to doe vnto the sheepfold.

John Hus declareth his mind touching this article sufficiently before.

23 The condemnation of 45. articles of John Wickliffe by the doctors made, is vnreasonable, wicked and naught, and the cause by them alledged is fained, that is, that none of them are catholike, but euery one of them heretical, erroneous, or slanderous.

Election maketh not the successor of Peter, but imitation.

24 Not for that the electors, or the most part of them haue consented together with liuely voice, according to the custome of men vpon the person of any, therefore that person is lawfully elect, or therefore is the true and manifest successor and vicar of Peter the Apostle, or of any other the Apostles in the ecclesiasticall office. Wherefore, whether the electors haue either well or euill made their election, it behoueth vs to beleeue the same, by the works of him that is elected. For in that that euery one that worketh more meritoriously to the profit of the church, he hath so much the more greater authority from God.

One head of the vniuersall church besides Christ, hath no foundation in holy scripture.

25 There is not so much as one sparke of appearance, that there ought to be one head ruling and gouerning the church in spirituall causes, which should alwaies be conuersant in the church militant: for Christ without any such manifold heades, by his true disciples spared through the whole world, could better a great deale rule his church.

26 The Apostles and faithfull priests of God, haue right worthily in all things necessary to saluation, gouerned the church before the popes office take place, and so might they do againe, by like possibility vntill Christ came to iudgement, if the office should faile.

Heresie to withdraw in both kinds.

Let euery one that is suspected in the foresaid articles, or else otherwise found with the assertion of them, be examined in maner and forme as followeth.

The forme and manner of the popes inquisition.

IN primis, whether hee knew Iohn Wickliffe of England, Iohn Hus of Bohemia, and Jerome of Prage, or any of them, and how he came by the knowledge of them: whether that during the liues of them, or any of them, they had either been conuersant with them, or formd any friendship at their hands.

Heresie to plead for Iohn Wickliffe or Iohn Hus, &c.

2 Item, whether hee knowing them, or any of them to be excommunicat did willingly participate with them: esteeming and affirming the same their participation to be no sinne.

3 Item, whether that after their deaths, hee euer prayed for them them or any of them, openly or priuily, doing any worke of mercy for them, affirming them to be either saints, or else to be saued.

4 Item, whether he thought them, or any of them to be saints, or whether that euer he spake such words, and whether euer he did exhibit any worship vnto them as vnto saints.

5 Item, whether he beleeue, hold and affirme, that euery generall councell, as also the councell of Constance, doth represent the vniuersall church.

Heresie not to beleeue the councell of Constance.

6 Item, whether he doth beleeue, that that which the holy councell of Constance, representing the vniuersall church, hath and doth allow in the fauor of the faith, and saluation of soules, is to be approued & allowed of all the faithfull christians: and that whatsoeuer the same councell hath condemned, and doth condemne to be contrary both to the faith and to all good men, is to be beleeued, holden, and affirmed for condemned, or not.

7 Item, whether he beleeueth that the condemnations of John Hus, John Wickliffe, and Jerome of Prage, made as well vpon their persons, as their bookes and doctrine, by the holy generall councell of Constance, be rightly and iustly made, and of euery good catholike man, are so to be holden and affirmed, or not.

8 Item, whether he beleeue, hold, and affirme, that John Wickliffe of England, John Hus of Bohemia, & Jerome of Prage, were heretikes or not, and for heretikes to be nominated and preached, yea or not; and whether their bookes and doctrines were and be pernerse or not: for the which, together with their pertinacie, they were condemned by the holy sacred councell of Constance for heretikes.

Heresie to denie the popes indulgences.

9 Item, whether he haue in his custody any treatises, small workes, epistles, or other writings in what language or tongue soeuer, set forth and translated by any of those heretikes, John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Jerome, or any other of their false disciples and followers, that he may deliuer them to the ordinaries of that place, or his commissary, or to the inquisitors vpon his oth. And if he say that he hath no such writing about him, but that they are in some other place, that then you sweare him to bring the same before his Ordinary, or other aforenamed, within a certaine time to him prefixed.

Heresie not to worship images.

10 Item whether hee knoweth any that hath the treatises, workes, epistles, or any other writings of the aforesaid John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Jerome, in whatsoeuer tongue they are made or translated, and that he detein manifest the same, for the purgation of their faith and execution of iustice.

11 Item, especially let the learned be examined, whether he beleeueth that the sentence of the holy councell of Constance vpon the 45. articles of John Wickliffe, and the 30. articles of John Hus be not catholike: which faith that some of them are notorious and heretical, some erroneous, other some blasphemous, some slanderous, some rash and seditious, some offensiue to godly eares.

12 Item, whether he beleeueth and affirmeth, that in no case it is lawfull for a man to sweare.

13 Item, whether he beleeueth, that at the commandement of a iudge or any other, it is lawfull to take an oth to tell the truth in any conuenient cause, although it be but purging of infamy, or not.

14 Item, whether he beleeueth that periury wittingly committed, vpon what cause soeuer, whether it be for the safegard of his owne life, or of any other mans life, (yea although it be in the cause and defence of the faith) be a sinne or not.

15 Item, whether a man contemning purposely the rites of the church, and the ceremonies of exorcisme, of catechisme, and the consecration of the water of Baptisme be deadly sinne or not.

16 Item, whether he beleeue, that after the consecration of the priest in the sacrament of the altar vnder the figure of bread and wine, be no materiall bread and wine, but in all points the same very Christ which was crucified vpon the crosse, and sitteth vpon the right hand of the father.

17 Item, whether he beleeue, that after the consecration made by the priest vnder the onely forme of bread, and besides the forme of wine, be very flesh of Christ and his bloud, his soule and his deitie, and so whole Christ as he is: and in like wise, vnder the forme of wine, without the forme of bread, be the very flesh of Christ and his very bloud, his soule, and deitie, and so whole Christ, and the same body absolutely vnder euery one of those kinds singularly.

Heresie to preach without authority.

18 Item, whether he doth beleeue, that the custome of housling of the lay people vnder the forme of bread onely, obserued of the vniuersall church; and allowed by the onely councell of Constance, be to be vsed, and not without the authority of the church, at mens pleasures to be altered, and that they that obstinately affirme the contrary to this, are to be punished as heretikes, or not.

19 Item, whether he beleeue that those which contemne the receiuing of the sacraments of confirmation, or extreme vnction, or else the solemnization of matrimony, commit deadly sinne or not.

20 Item, whether he beleeue that a christian man, ouer and besides the contrition of heart, being licensed of a conuenient priest, is bound to confesse himselfe onely to a priest, and not to any lay man, be he neuer so deuout of god, vpon the necessitie of saluation.

Heresie not to confesse to a lay man.

21 Item, whether he beleeue, that in the cases before put, a priest may absolue a sinner confessing himselfe, and being contrite, from all sinnes, and enioyne him penance for the same.

22 Item, whether he beleeueth, that an euill priest, with due maner and forme, with the intention of doing, doth verily consecrate, doth verily absolue, doth verily baptise, and doth verily dispose all other sacraments euen as the church doth.

23 Item, whether he beleeue that S. Peter was the vicar of Christ, hauing power to bind and to loose vpon the earth.

24 Item, whether he beleeue that the pope being canonically elect, which for the time shall be, by that name expressly be the successor of Peter or not, hauing supreame authority in the church of God.

25 Item, whether he beleeue that the authority or iurisdiction of the pope, an archbishop or a bishop, in binding and loosing, be more then the authority of a simple priest or not, although hee haue charge of soules.

Heresie to denie the popes indulgences.

26 Item, whether he beleeue, that the pope may vpon a iust and good cause, giue indulgences and remission of sinnes to all christian men, being verily contrite and confessed, especially to those that goe on pilgrimage to holy places and good deeds.

27 Item, whether he beleeue, that by such grant the pilgrims that visit those churches, and giue them any thing, may obtaine remission of sinnes or not.

28 Item, whether he beleeue that all bishops may grant vnto their subiects, according as the holy canons doe limit, such indulgences or not.

Heresie not to worship images.

29 Item, whether he beleeue and affirme, that it is lawfull for faithfull christians to worship images and the reliques of saints, or not.

30 Item, whether he beleeue that those religions which the church hath allowed, were lawfully and reasonably brought in of the holy fathers or not.

31 Item, whether he beleeueth that the pope, or any other prelat for the time being, or their bicars, may excommunicat their subiect ecclesiasticall or secular for disobedience or contumacy, so that such a one is to be holden and taken for excommunicat, or not.

32 Item, whether he beleeue, that for the disobedience and contumacy of persons excommunicat, increasing; the prelats or their bicars in spirituall things haue power to aggrauate and to reaggrauate, to put vpon men the interdit, & to call for the secular arme: and that the same secular arme or power ought to be obedient to the censures, by their interdicts called for.

These popes will be sure to lose nothing.

33 Item, whether he beleeue that the pope and other prelats, or else their bicars, haue power in spirituall things to excommunicat priests, and lay men that are stubborne and disobedient, from their office, benefice, or entrance into the church, and from the administration of the sacraments of the church, also to silence them.

34 Item, whether he beleeue that it is lawfull for ecclesiasticall persons without committing sinne, to haue any possessions and temporall goods: and whether he beleeue that it is not lawfull for lay men to take away the same from them by their authority: but rather that such takers away and inrochers vpon ecclesiasticall goods, are to be punished as committers of sacriledge, yea although such ecclesiasticall persons liue naughtily that haue such goods.

Wealthy liuelihoods maintained.

35 Item, whether any such taking away or incroching vpon any priest rashly or vi clenly made, although the priest be an euill liuer, be sacriledge or not.

36 Item, whether he beleeue that it is lawfull for lay men of whether sex soeuer, that is, men and women, to preach the word of God, or not.

The pope neither preacheth himselfe, nor yet will suffer other good priests to preach.

37 Item, whether he beleeue that it is lawfull to all priests freely to preach the word of God whersoeuer, whensoeuer, and to whosoeuer it shall please them, although they be not sent at all.

38 Item, whether he beleeue that all mortall sinnes, and especially such as be manifest and publike, are to be corrected and to be correpat, or not.

Furthermore, we will, command, and decree, that if any by secret information, by you or any other to be receiued, shall be found either infamed or suspected of any kind of the pestiferous sect, heresie, and doctrine of the most pestilent men John Wickliffe, John Hus, and Jerome of Prage, the archheretikes aforesaid, or of fauoring, receiuing, or defending the foresaid damned men whilest they liued on the earth, their false followers and disciples, or any that beleeueth their errors, or any that after their death pray for them or any of them, or that nominateth them to be amongst the number of catholike men, or that defendeth them to be placed amongst the number of the saints, either by their preaching, worshipping, or other waies, wherein they deserue to be suspected: that then they by you or some of you, may be cited personally to appeare before you or some of you, without either proctor or doctor to answer for them, an oth being openly taken by them as is aforesaid, to speak the plaine and mere verity of the articles aboue written, and euery of them, or other opportune, as case & circumstance shall require, according to your discretion, as you or any of you shall see expedient expedient to proceed against them, or any of them, according to these presents, or other wise canonically, as you shall thinke god.

Also that you doe publish solemnly, and cause to be published, these present letters, omitting the articles and interrogatories herein contained, in the cities and other places of your diocesse, where conueniently you may, vnder our authority, and there to denounce, and cause to be denounced all and singuler such heretikes, with their abettors and fauorers of their heresies and errors, of what sex or kind soeuer, that doe hold and defend the said errors, or doe participate any manner of way with heretikes, priuily or apertly, of what state, dignity, or condition soeuer he or they be, patriarke, archbishoppe, king, queene, duke, or of what other dignity either ecclesiasticall or secular hee bee: also with their aduocates and procurators whatsoeuer, which are beleeuers, followers, fauorers, defenders, or receiuers of such heretikes, or suspected to be beleeuers, followers, fautors, defenders, or receiuers of them, to be excommunicat euery sunday and festiuall day, in the presence of the people.

Furthermore, that you diligently cause to be inquired by the said our authority, vpon all and singuler such persons both men and women, that maintaine, approue, defend, and teach, such errors, or that be fauorers, receiuers and defenders of them, whether exempt or not exempt, of what dignity, state, preheminence degree, order, or condition soeuer. And such as you shall finde in the said your inquisition, either by their owne confession, or by any other meane to be conuicted, or otherwise inforced with the spot of such heresie or error, you through the sentence of excommunication, suspension, interdict, and priuation of their dignities, personages, offices, or other benefices of the church, and fees, which they hold of any church, monastery, and other ecclesiasticall places, also of honors and temporall dignities and degrees of sciences or other faculties, as also by other paines and censures of the church, or by waies and meanes whatsoeuer else shall seeme to you expedient, by taking and imprisoning of their bodies, and other corporall punishments wherewith heretikes are punished, or are wont and are commanded by canonicall sanctions to bee vsed: and if they bee clerkes, by degradation, doe correct and punish, and cause them to bee corrected and punished with all diligence.

Furthermore, that you do rise by stoutly and courageously against such heretikes, and the gods as well of them, as of the lay men, according to the canonicall sanction made against heretikes and their followers, vnder the which we will and command them and their partakers to be subiect. And also such persons as shall be infamed of the heresies or errors aforesaid, or any of the premisses, shall be bound to purge themselues at your arbitrement: but the other, which either be witnesses, or by their owne confessions, or other allegations or probations, shall be conuicted of the foresaid heresies or articles, or of any the premisses, they shall be compelled to reuoke and abiure publikely and solemnly the said articles and errors, and to suffer condigne penance and punishment, yea euen to perpetuall imprisonment (if need be) for the same.

See here the dragon casting out wil. ii. floods to swallow vp the saints.

And to the intent that they shall not nourish any kind of heresies hereafter, either in word, deed, or gesture, or shall induce other either in word or deed, priuily or apertly, directly or indirectly to beleeue the same, they shall be forced to put in sufficient surety. Who, if it so chance that they will not publikely and solemnly renounce and abiure their articles and errors, and take at your handes condigne penance, though it be to perpetuall or temporall punishment, according to your direction, neither will be contented to put in sufficient surety that they will not hereafter hold nor nourish these errors and heresies, neither will induce other by word or deed, priuily or apertly, directly or indirectly, or by any other maner of colour to beleeue the same: that then you shall proceed against them, according to the quality of their errors and demerits: yea and if you see it so expedient, as against heretikes, and as inforced with heresie by our authority, according to the canonicall sanctions summarily, & simply and plainly, sine strepitu & figura iudicij, and of office, all appellation or appellations whatsoeuer ceasing, and that you punish the same, according to the sanctions and traditions canonicall, yea if need be, in leauing and committing them to the secular power: and against such as be superiors or learned doctors, laying the censures of ecclesiasticall excommunication, all appellation set aside, also inuocating, if need shall require, aid of the secular arme: The constitution of well of our predecessor pope Boniface 8. of blessed memorie, wherein is decreed that no man without his cittie or diocesse (except in certaine cases) or in places being one daies iourney distant from thence where he inhabiteth, shall bee called into iudgement, and that no man doe presume to depute Iudges from the see apostolike, without the cittie and diocesse where they are deputed to proceed against any: or do presume to commit their authority to any other person or persons, or to send and remoue any man beyond one daies iourny from out his diocesse where he dwelleth, or at most two daies iourny, if it be in a generall councell: as also all other constitutions of any bishop of Rome, touching as well Iudges delegat, as persons not to be called to iudgement beyond a certaine number: or else any other edict, indulce, priuiledge, or exemption generall or speciall granted from the apostolike see, for any person or persons not to be interdicted, suspended, or excommunicated, or cited vp to iudgement without the compasse of certaine limits: or else whatsoeuer thing otherwise may hinder, stop, or impeach your iurisdiction, power, and free proceeding herein by any meanes to the contrary notwithstanding. Dat. Constant. the first yeere of our popedome.

¶ This bloudy and abominable commission of pope Martin, which I haue copied out of a certaine old monument remaining in the hands of Master Hackslopt, student in the Temple, seemeth to be directed and giuen out to the publike destruction of all faithfull christian men, about the latter end and breaking vp of the councell of Constance, anno 1418. By the which, the prudent reader hath this to note and consider, what labor, what policie, what counsell, and what lawes haue been set, what waies haue been taken, what seuerity hath been shewed, how many power, wit, and authority of the whole world haue conspired together from time to time, continually by all manner meanes to subuert and supplant the word and law of the Lord: and yet notwithstanding man hath not preuailed, but all his force and deuised policies haue been ouerthrowne, dispatched, and with the counsell of Achitophel and Ammon, haue been brought to nought, and contrary to the furie of the world, the Gospell of Christ hath still increased. Neither yet for all this, will the pope cease to spurne and rebell still against the kingdome of Christ, and of his gospell, against which, neither he, nor yet the gates of hell shall euer preuaile. The Lord of hosts be mercifull to his pope persecuted flocke, Amen.

Note how antichrist regreth and striueth against Christ.

Against this pestilent bull and inquisition of pope Martin the great antichrist, I thought good here to adioyne and annex another contrary writing of the Bohemians, bearing the name and subscription of Procopius, Conradus, and other captains of the Bohemians, which seemeth not long after the death of Zisca, to be written against the pestiferous sea of Rome, the tenor whereof here followeth.

A fruitfull and christian exhortation of the Bohemians to kings and princes, to stir them vp to the zeale of the Gospell.

As exhortation of the Bohemians.

THe almighty God the father, by his inebeloued Sonne Iesus Christ, map in his holy spirit open the vnderstanding both of you and of all christians, and lighten your hearts with the light of his doctrine of righteousnesse, and map make you to continue therein, surely established to the end. This we desire of you for your saluation, all ye honorable, wise, and honest Noblemen, and all the comminalty, yea rich and poore, heare and consider with diligent heed the words of this present letter, which is sent vnto you from the country of the Bohemians. It is manifest and well knowne to you and many other cities, kings, princes, and lords, that now a certaine number of peeres, there hath been great discord betwixt vs and you: and there haue been done which haue moued you by letters, and preached you to make warre against vs, and to destroy vs. And as well on your part as ours, many men as well noble as vnnoble, haue foolishly lost their liues. Yet neuer hitherto haue ye in any part vnderstood our faith by our owne confession, neither whether we be able to proue the same out of the Scriptures, yea or no: and yet in the meane time kings, princes, lords and cities haue sustained great damage. And hereof we greatly maruell that you doe so much trust and beleeue the pope and his priests, which giue you drinke full of poison, and such comfort as no man can vnderstand, in that they say that they will giue you forgiuenesse of all your sinnes, and great grace and pardon, to this end, that you should warre vpon vs and destroy vs: wherewas their graces and pardons are none other then great lies, and a great seducing of the body and soule of all them that beleeue them, and put their trust in them. This we would proue vnto them, and ouercome them by the holy Scripture; and we would suffer, that whosoeuer is desirous to heare the same, should heare it. For the pope and all his priests herein deale with you as the diuell would haue done with our Lord Iesus Christ. Of whom Luke writeth in his fourth chapter, that he brought him vpon an high hill, and shewed vnto him in the twinckling of an eye, all the kingdomes that are in the compasse of the earth, and said vnto him: I will giue thee, &c. So the diuell deceiueth the pope, and all the priests with the riches of the world, and worldly power: And they thinke they can giue grace and pardon when they will: and they themselues shall neuer finde fauour before Almighty God, except they repent and make amends, because of their great deceiuing of Christendome. And how can they giue that to others, which they themselues haue not? So did the diuell, who was rich in promising, and pore in giuing. And like as the diuell is not ashamed to tell a lie, so all they are not ashamed to speake that which shall neuer bee found true, nor be proued by the holy scriptures, because for no cause they stirre vppe kings, princes, lords and cities to make warre against vs, not to the end that the christian faith should thereby thereby be defended, but because they feare that their secret vices and heresies shall be disclosed and made manifest. For if they had a true cause, and a godly loue to the christian faith, they would then take the bookes of the holy Scripture, and would come vnto vs, and ouercome vs with the weapons of Gods word, and that is our chiefe desire. For so did the apostles of our Lord Iesus Christ, who came to the Paganes and Iewes, and brought them from their infidelity to the true faith of our Lord Iesus Christ; and this they did in the spirit of meeknesse, as the apostle Paul writeth in the 6. chap. to the Galat.

Galat. 6.

Brethren if any man be agreeued, &c. So ought they also to doe, if they perceiued that they were iust and wee vniust. And if wee would not abide instruction: then they might take to them kings, princes, lords, and imperiall cities, and resist vs according to the commandements of the holy Scripture. But this is the subtile defence of all the bishops and priests, that they say that master Hus and Hierome which were burnt at Constance, were ouercome of the holy father the pope, and of the whole councell: For ye must vnderstand that they were not ouercome by the holy Ghost, but vniustly, with wrongfull violence, which God may yet hereafter grieuously punish in all them that gaue their counsell and aide thereto. And they say it ought not to be suffered, that we should be heard in consulting our faith. How may that be proued by the holy Scripture, since Christ heard the diuell, as it is written in the fourth chapter of Matthew? And they are not better then Christ, nor wee worse then the diuell. If they bee iust and haue the truth with them (as they say they haue) and wee bee vnrighteous, why doe they feare, since the truth ought not to be afeard of falshood, as Esdras writeth in his second booke, the third chapter: Zorobabel declared that truth is of all things the most mightie, and ouercommeth all things. For Christ is the truth; John 14. I am the way, the truth, &c. And the diuell is the father of lies; John 8. He is a lier from the beginning, and neuer abode in the truth, and there is no truth in him. Therefore if the pope and his priests haue the truth, let them ouercome vs with the word of God. But if they haue lies, then they cannot long abide in all their presumption. Wherefore, wee exhort and beseech all the imperiall cities, all kings, princes, noble men, rich and poore, for Gods sake, and for his righteousnesse, that one of them write hereof to another, and that there map bee some meanes made, how wee map commune with you safely and friendly, at some such place as shall bee fit both for you and vs, and bring with you your bishoppes and teachers, and let them and our teachers fight together with the word of God, and let vs heare them, and let not one ouercome the other by violence or false subtiltie, but onely by the word of God. And if your bishops and teachers haue better proofes of their faith out of the holy Scripture, then we, and our faith be found better, we will receiue penance and satisfaction, according to the Gospell. But if your bishops and teachers bee ouercome of ours by the holy Scripture, then doe yee repent and hearken to vs, and hold with vs. And if your bishops and teachers will cease from their spirituall pride, and repent and make satisfaction: then will we helpe you according to our power, and will compell them, either to ioyne with vs, or else we will expell them out of Christendome. And if your bishops and teachers will say, that it is not lawfull for laie men to heare such reasoning, or to be present at it: that may you vnderstand to tend to no other end, but that they feare they should be ouercome and put to shame in the sight of you: For if they knew that they should ouercome therein, out of doubt they should desire that euery man should heare it, and thereby their glory should become the greater, and their fame and praises should bee encreased vpon the earth. And if your bishops and teachers counsell you to come to no hearing with vs, then doe it whether they will or no, and suffer not your selues at any time to be so foolishly seduced with their foolish parodns, but tarie at home in your houses with your wiues and children. And let the pope of Rome come to vs with all his cardinals and bishops, and with all his priests, with his owne person and power to warre with vs, and let themselues deserue the absolution of sinnes, grace, and pardon, which they preach to you (for they haue great need of forgiuenesse of sinnes, grace, and pardon) and by the grace of God wee will giue them pardon enough as they shall neede. But their subtill excuse is this: they say that it belongeth not to priests to fight with bodily weapons: and true it is that belongeth not to them: but it belongeth as little to them to sit by, to counsell, and to fortifie others thereto: For Paul saith in the first to the Rom. and in the fifth to the Galath. That all that do such things are worthy of euerlasting death

Christ heard the diuell: but the pope will not heare men confesse their faith.

Wans power and counsell fea wrokes against Christ.

1. Esdras 3. John 14. John 8.

And if ye will not determine to do any other thing then to fight against vs, then will wee take the Lord to our helpe and his truth, and we will defend it to the death, and we will not be afraid for the excommunication or curse of the pope, or his cardinals, or of the bishops, because wee know that the pope is not God, as he maketh himselfe, that he can curse and excommunicate when hee will, or bleese when hee will: who hath now these many yeares cursed and excommunicated vs, and yet notwithstanding, God and his gratious blessing hath beene our helpe. But peraduenture ye will say, that though wee see that bishops and priests bee euill and wicked, yet wee cannot lacke them: for who should baptise our children, who should heare confessions, and minister the holy Sacraments? and then also wee should bee within the excommunication of the pope and of his bishops. Welbeloued, ye need to take no care for these matters. The excommunicating of the pope harreth you nothing. Feare yee the excommunicating of God, and the Lord will prouide for those things well enough. If yee would banish euill bishops and priests, yee should haue good priests which should baptise your children, heare confessions, and minister the holy mysteries, because when the diuell is banished, then place is made for the holy Ghost: So when ill bishops and priests shall bee banished, then place shall bee made for good priests and bishops. Also, your bishops and priests say, that wee are miscreants and hereticles, and that we beleeue not on Purgatorie, vpon the virgine Marie, nor vpon the saints: wherein they say ill, for wee will proue by the holy Scripture, that we know better by Gods grace how we ought to beleeue vpon Purgatorie, and vpon Marie the mother of our Lord, and vpon his welbeloued saints, then they can tell vs. Also they say, that we will not be obedient vnto the pope. Truelie when hee shall become holie and iust, then wee know well that wee ought to bee obedient to him in all things, and not before. They say also that wee destroy Gods holie seruice, in that wee destroy monasteries, banishing thence the wicked monks and nunns. Truelie wee did it, thinking once that they were holie, that they did the reuerend seruice of God, but after that wee well perceiued and considered their life and workes, then wee perceiued that they were false lowlie hypocrites, and wicked builders on high, sellers of pardons and masses for the dead, and such as deuoured in themselues the sinnes of the people. And whereas they said that they rise at midnight when other men sleepe, and pray for the sinnes of the people: for as much as their selling of their prayers and masses for the dead for gifts, is no better then hypocrisie and hereste; therefore if wee doe speake against them and destroy their monasteries, we doe not therein destroy the seruice of God, but rather the seruice of the diuell, and the schooles of hereticles. And if wee knew them as wee know them, yee would as diligently destroy them as we doe. For Christ our Lord did not ordaine any such order, and therefore it must needs come to passe that shortly it shall be destroyed, as our Lord saith in the Gospell of saint Mat. 15. chap. Euerie plant which my father hath not planted, shall be rooted vp. We desire you also that yee would diligently consider the articles here written, wherein your bishops and priests are guiltie.

The popes false persecution against Christ.

Mat. 15.

The first article is, that when your bishops will ordaine priests, they doe it not except he that is to bee made priest haue sufficient liuing, either inheritance left him of his parents or of benefices or else as notwithstanding, Christ would that priests should bee poore, for as much as it is enough for the scholler to bee as his master is, and for the seruant to bee as his lord is: and the bishops will that they should be rich vpon earth, which is vniust before the Lord.

The abuse of popish religion in making priests vnreasonable, &c.

The 2. article is, that bishops take money of such as are to be ordained; but saint Peter did therefore sharpely rebuke Simon Magus, when he would haue giuen him money, as it is written in the eighth of the Acts.

Act. 8.

The third article is, that they that come to be priests enter into their priesthood, not for Gods seruice sake, because they meane to preach and increase it among the christian people, so as the people may bee edified and made better: but rather for an idle life: and that they may eate well and drinke well, and that they may be honoured and reuerenced vpon earth. For euery one seeketh vpon his priest as a theefe and a robber, as John writeth in his tenth chapter.

The abuse of popish religion in taking of orders.

The 4. article is of excommunication, which the pope and all his priests take to themselues, and therewith fetter and bind all christian people as they will, and they thinke that whosoeuer they excommunicate or curse, he is accursed and excommunicate before God: And woe will proue by the holy Scripture, that they themselues are excommunicate and accursed before God, because they keepe not the commandement of the loue of God, whereof the apostle writeth in the 1. to the Corinthians, the 6. chap. If any man loueth not our Lord Iesus Christ, he is excommunicate in the day of the comming of the Lord. For they cannot excommunicate you, who are already bound and excommunicate before God and his saints: and therefore why feare ye their excommunication?

Popish excommunication abused. 2. Cor. 16.

The 5. article is, that they take gifts for to pray for the dead, and to say masse for their soules. This is a wicked deuise and hereste before the Lord, as all they that contribute to them to this end, doe wickedly, for that hereby priests become merchants of prayers and of masses: and here with is all the church of Rome poysoned and defiled. For if they would pray for the dead, and say masse for their soules, yet no man ought to hire them thereto, for as much as they ought to take no gifts, neither little nor great. And euery one that taketh rewards to this end, to redeeme soules out of Purgatorie, doe therewithall call their owne soules downe into hell. And they that giue any thing to that end, doe altogether lose that which they giue. And with such diuelliih subtiltie, the pope with all his priests haue deceiued, spoiled, and disherited kings, princes, lords, and knightes, and good housholders and many other, of their lawfull inheritances, because their ancestors and progenitours gaue it to colledges, monasteries and churches, that they might make memorials of them, and to sing or say prairs or misses for their soules, that they might bee redeemed out of Purgatorie. And with such goods, bishops, canons, and monasteries haue made themselues so rich, that now they fall at variance, with cities and princes: and whereas they should procure peace betwixt cities and rulers, there they are the first that begin warre: and as long as they haue such goods, they will neuer cease to be at strife with lords and cities, neither will they begin to teach you the true foundation of the truth. For they doe as a dog, which as long as he holdeth a bone in his mouth and gnaweth it, so long hee holdeth his peace and can not barke: Euen so, as long as they haue this bone of pleasant riches, it will neuer be well in the world. Wherefore all kings, princes, and unperiall cities should doe a great worke of godlinesse and mercie, if by them they were compelled to doe this, as the dogge is when the bone is taken from him.

And therefore ye noble men, kings, princes, lords, imperiall cities, and all the communalte, both rich and poore, if yee haue beene asleepe, yet now awake and open your eyes and behold the subtilte of the diuell, how hee hath blinded the church of Rome, and take againe that is yours, and not theirs. And if you will make a good memoriall for your soules, then doe as the wise man saith, Eccle.19. Lay by almes, &c.

The 6. article is, that they are full of pride and of high mind, which is manifestly knowne, by their long, costly, and superfluous garments, wherein they walke very unlike to Christ our Lord, who had a garment without a seame, and to the welbeloued Iohn Baptist, who had a garment of Camels haire: and they will be honoured and worshipped, and they preach and say that priesthood ought to be honoured: and so it ought indeed to be: but there are none that doe so much slander and abase it, as they themselues, with their euil workes, gay apparell, and with their euil words, wherein they passe all other men. Paul saith the first to Tim. the 3. chap. Let the Elders that gouerne well, be honoured with double honour, chiefly they that labor in the word and doctrine of the Lord. Consider, that he saith, They that gouerne well.

The 7. article is, that they are couetous from the highest to the lowest, and for couetousnesse they preach many foolish deeds and manifest lies, and sell the holy Sacraments, which is a great heresie: for God commanded that they should giue freely. Paul writeth in the first to Timothie: couetousnesse is the roote of all mischefe, wherunto many haue beene giuen, and therefore they are separated from the faith and haue denied the truth.

The 8. article is, that they commonly are called notorious whoremongers. This is manifestly seene in their concubines and children, which walke openly in all mens sight, and make many mens liues whores, or corrupt their daughters being virgins, and make them priests harlots and ribaldes.

The 9. article is, that they are full of deuelish enuie, and especially in all monasteries they haue great enuie and hatred amongst themselues, because when any thing is giuen or disposed to one monasterie or colledge, then there are others that hate it, and enuie at it, and would more gladly haue it themselues: Like as among dogs, when any thing is giuen to the one and not to the other, which the other seeing, enuieth his fellow, and the other likewise will rather deuour all himselfe, then giue any part to his fellow. Wherefore it were well that they were brought from that great sinne of enuie in giuing nothing vnto them: And it were better that their possessions were taken from them, and that they should do that which the Lord spake to his disciples saying: Go ye and preach the Gospell to all men.

The 10. article is, that they are idle, and chiefly the bishops, canons, and other prelats, which will not labour diligently in the holy Scripture, wherewith they might cure the miseries of Christendome, whereto they haue bound themselues, and they eate the bread thereof in idlenesse, because when other men watch and labour to maintaine themselues and their little ones, then are they with their lemmons, or else they walke in some citie, carying hawkes on their fists, or else they sit at the good wine with their concubines, and there they sing and play the Lucians, and eate of the best, and therefore all that willingly bring and giue to them shall bee made partners of that curse which is giuen them of God, because they eate their bread vniustly, whereof Paul writeth in the 2. to the Thessal. the 3. chapter: Hee that laboureth not, let him not eate.

The 11. article is, that they are notorious liars, because to the end that they may please men, they tell many tales and lies, which in the holy Scripture haue no foundation nor proofe. Of such writeth Iohn in the Apocal. 21.

The 12. article is, that they doe not rightly giue or minister to the people the body of our Lord Iesus Christ, and they giue it not as God hath instituted it and commanded. This is a great and a diuelish sinne and too great malapertnesse.

Herein wee would ouercome them, with the testimonies of the Euangelists: & say wee would ouercome the pope, and all his priests, with the authorities of Paule, Luke, and Paul, Romaines 13. and wee would suffer, that kings, princes, lords, and all that are willing to beare, should beare it.

The 13. article is, that they sit in spirituall iudgement, and then many times they iudge according to fauour, and not according to the rightconsuelle of God, that they take bribes, giuing sentence for him, which in Gods sight hath the wrongfull cause. Woe bee to such sentences, as it is written in Iaap 5. Woe be to you that, &c. The popes church charged with partiality.

The 14. article is, that they sit hearing confessions, and then there come to them sluttes, raueners, and theeues, they take bribes of them of their ill gotten goods, to spare them: and they willingly suffer them in cities and townes. And likewise of adulterers and other notorious whoremongers, and whores, and they neuer let or stop them in their great sinnes, to the end that the Scripture may bee fulfilled in them, which saith: Gifts and the loue of money doe draw to hell, and doe blind the eyes of iudges.

The 15. article is, that they receiue tithes of men, and will of right haue them, and preach and say that men are bound to giue them tithes, and therein they say falsly: For they cannot proue by the new Testament, that our Lord Iesus Christ commanded it, and his disciples warned no man to doe so, neither did themselues receiue them. But although in the old Testament, it were commanded to giue tithes, yet it cannot there by be proued, that christian men are bound thereto: For this precept of the old Testament had an end in the first preste of our Lord Iesus Christ, like as the precept of circumcision. Wherefore wee beloued, consider and see, how poore bishops seduce you and that your eyes with things that haue no proofe. Christ saith in the 11. of Luke: Giue almes of those things that remaine, but he said not, giue the tenth of the goods which ye possesse, but giue almes. But when they heare the word, they may say as the lawyer said to Christ: Maister when then saiest so, thou gluest offence. Luke 11. He meaneth of claiming tithes by mere necessitie of the old law, and not by the politike lawe of princes.

The 16. article is, that they in many places lend money or goods to haue treasure or vsurie, and they haue in cities and townes, poorely pappmentes and perpetuall reuenues, as great princes and lords. Wherein they do against the Gospell, which saith, Doe not ye possesse gold nor siluer. And whereas they lend for gaine and vsurie, against that speaketh the Lord. Deuteronom. 24. Lend not to vsurie to thy brother, &c. Bee honest, discreet, and welbeloued lords, all the aforesaid articles we will proue against the pope, and all his priests, with many testimonies of the holy Scripture, which for brenities sake, wee haue not here mentioned. But note yee chiefly these 4. articles, for which we striue, and desire to defend them to the death. The popes church charged with vsurie.

The first article is, that all publike, and customable mortall sinnes, ought to be forbidden and prohibited to all priests and laie men, according to the commandement of the holie Scripture. Princeps Hungar.

The second article is, that riches ought to bee taken from the pope and all his priests, from the highest to the lowest, and they ought to be made poore, as the disciples of our Lord Iesus Christ were: who had nothing of their owne, neither possessions in this world, neither worldly power. He meaneth the immoderate riches and temporall possessions.

The third article is, that the word of God ought to be free for euery man appointed and ordained thereto, to preach and reade in all places, whither they shall come, without resistance of any man, or without any inhibition of either spirituall or earthly power, openly or manifestly. Men appointed to preach may preach though the pope forbids them.

The fourth article is, that the body of our Lord Iesus Christ ought truely be deliuered to euery christian as our Lord hath ordained it, as the holy Euangelists haue written. We haue also vnderstood that there shall be a councell in Basill: Therefore let no man bee exalted, but let them diligently keepe their liues, their daughters, and their virgins from bishops, priests, and monks. And doe not thinke that there is made any holy assemblie of bishops and priests for the common commoditie and profit of Christendome, but onely to this end, that they may hide their secret vices and heresies, with the cloake of hypocrisie, and let and hinder the righteousnesse of God, which is much contrarie to them: and for this cause consider ye diligently, that they will not make an holy assemblie, but the congregation of Satan. And take ye heede that it be not done as some did at Constance, who tooke money of bishoppes and prelats, and suffered them to sleepe with their liues. Bee welbeloued and honest lords, if yee find any thing in these foresaid articles or words written somewhat sharpely, we did it not to offend or contemne you, but to the end that yee should diligently consider and denise, how christendome is to all kept and led by the priests of this present age. Our Lord Iesu Christ keepe you both in bodie and soule: Amen. In the yeere of our Lord, one thousand foure hundreth and thirtie. Eum vide infra in radice mensis scripta. Eben the pope bathreth his councell, let men looke to their wiues and daughters where the councell is kept.

Preropus, Smahors, Conradus, Samssmolich, Captaines of Bohemia.

Now

Now to prosecute the warres of the Bohemians against Aster Ziska was dead, thereof we did intreat before, there was great feare, sorrow, and lamentation in the armie, the souldiors accusing to: tune which gaue ouer such an vnmeetable captaine to be ouercome with death. Immediatlie there was a diuision in the host, the one part chosing Procopius Magnus to be their captaine, the other part saying, that there was none could be found worthie to succeede Ziska: thereupon they chusing out certaine to serue the warres, named themselues Orphane. The armie of Ziska diuided.

Thus the Thaborites being diuided into two armies, the one part retained their old & accustomed name, and the other by meanes of the death of their captaine, named themselues Orphans. And albeit, that of tentimes there was distension betwixt them, yet whensoeuer any forraine power came towards them, they ioyned their powers together in one camp, and defended themselues. They seldome went vnto any fenced townes, except it were to buie necessaries, but liued with their wiues and children in their campe and tents. They had amongst them many carres, the which they vsed as a Bulwarke: For whensoeuer they went vnto battell, they made two wings of them, which closed in the formen. The wings of the horsemen were on the outside, and when as they saw their time for to ioyne battell, the wagon men which leade the wings, going forth vnto the Emperours standard, and compassing in such part of their enemies as they would, do close themselues in together, whereby the enemies being inclosed, so that they could not be relieued, they were partlie by the footmen, and partlie by the men that were in the carres, with their darts slaine. The horsemen fought without the fortification: and if it happened that they were oppressed or put to flight, by and by the carres opening themselues, receiued them as if they were into a fenced citie: and by this meanes they got many victories, forsomuch as their enemies were ignorant of their policies. The other and police that the armie of Ziska held in warre after his death.

These two armies went forth, the one into Slesia, and the other into Moravia, and returned againe with great prap, before their enemies knewe of their comming. After this they beleged the towne of Swetlep in Austrich, where as the Thaborites and the Orphans, two nights continuallie assaulted the walles without ceasing; but Albert duke of Austrich comming with his host to ayde the citizens, they fought by the space almost of foure houres, the valiantest warriours being slaine on both parts. At the length the battaile was broken off, and the Chaborites lost their carres, and Albert was put out of his campe and tents. Within a while after, Procopius Magnus, came againe and inclosed the citie of Rhetium in Austria with a notable siege. They of Prage sent in his armie, and Wollaus Cygneus, of whom we spake before, was slaine there with a dart, and the citie of Rhetium was taken by force, sacked and burnt. The Burgraue of Salberburge lord of the towne, was also taken & caried into Prage, where also he died in prison.

These things thus done, the Emperour sent for the nobles of Boheme: which went vnto him vnto a towne of Hungarie, called Posonium in the borders of Austria, vpon the bankes of the riuer of Dannubius: but they would not enter into the towne, but remained without the towne in their tents; whither as the Emperour going out vnto them, communed much with them as touching his right and title, and the recouering of his fathers kingdome, promising if there were any cause, which did alienate the Bohemians mindes from him, that he would take awap all the occasion thereof. They made answere, that he had made warre vpon them without cause, and that he had suffered their countrey men contrarie to his promise, to be burnt at Constance not being heard, and the kingdome to be contumeliouslp interdited, and the Nobles of Boheme to be condemned by the church of Rome as heretikes: and that he should thinke the force and power of the Bohemians not to be so small, but that they would prouide for their owne honor. Whereunto the Emperour answered deuotly gentile, and offered them a generall councell, wherein they might declare their innocencie, if they would submit themselues to the iudgement of the vniuersall church: but the Bohemians which were nowe become valiant victors in armes, would not nowe bee ouercome with words; and so nothing being finally concluded, the Emperour returned home. Sigismund the emperor which beraued Hus & Hierom before, now is faine to inuest for his kingdome. The death of Iohn Hus & Hierom reuenged.

Then pope Martin perceiuing the Gospell to increase daily more & more, sent the Cardinall of Winchester an Englishman, borne of a noble house, into Germany to moue them vnto warre against the Bohemians. Whereunto the Emperour also did assist him. The Cardinall of Winchester sent into Germany to raise warre against the Bohemians. Their armies lie against the Bohemians.

There were their armies prouided. In the first army were the dukes of Saxonie, and the lower cities.

The second armie which was gathered of the Francomians, was vnder the conduct of the Marques of Brandenburge.

The third army was led by Otho the archbishop of Treuers, whom the Rhenenses, the Bauarians, and the Imperiall cities of Swenia followed. These armies entring into Bohemie, in three seuerall parts, after they were passed the wood, they ioyned together and pitched before Aplna. This God reuengeth his people meruaylously conuerted.

towne a certaine learned and eloquent protestant, named Peschicho, the night before, had wonne from the papists: wherfore the armie was determined first to recouer that citie, before they would go any further. But when as newes came vnto the host, how the Protestants had gathered an armie, and came with all speed towards them: they fled before they saw their enemies, and went vnto Tacouin, leauing behind them their warlike engines with a great prap. The Cardinall was not yet come into the campe, but meeting them in their flight at Tacouin, he marueiled at the cowardlie flight of so many Noble and valiant men, desiring them that they would turne againe vnto their enemies, which, he said, were farre weaker then they. Which thing when he had long trauailed about in vaine, his was faine to be a companion with them in their flight. They were scarsly entred the wood, when as the Bohemians comming vpon them, set vpon their rereward. Then was their flight much more disordered and fearfull then before, neither did they leaue flying before the Bohemians left following. Then all impediment of let being taken away, they vanquished Tacouin: and hauing obtained great store of warlike engines, they destroyed Aplna. And when they would haue returned home by Franconia, they had great summes of money sent vnto them that they should not waste or destroy the Countries of Bamberge and Norembergе: wherefore the host of the Bohemians was greatly enriched. The popes army fleeth. Like captaine like souldiour.

Sigismundus the emperor hauing vnderstanding of these things, went straight vnto Noremberge, and gathered there new aid and help. Also Pope Martine sent Iulian the cardinall of saint Angeli into Germany with his ambassade, to make warre against the Bohemians, and that bee should be in the Councell of Basill, which doth now shortly draw on, by president in the Popes name. He entring into Germany, went straight to Noremberge to the emperour, where as many of the Nobles of Germany were assembled. Anno 1421 The pope raiseth warre the second time against the Bohemians.

There was a new expedition decred against the Bohemians, against the eight Kalends of Iulie, and Fredericke Sparquelle of Brandenburge appointed Generall of that warre, which should follow the Cardinall. He entred into Bohemie by the way that leadeth vnto Thapa, and Albertus prince of Austrich was appointed to bring his armie through Moravia. A new war raised by the pope against the Bohemians.

In this expedition was Albert and Christopher of Bauaria, and Fredericke Dukes of Saxony. Iohn and Albert princes of Brandeburge, with their father which was Generall of those warres. Also the bishops of Hyperbolis, Bamberge and Eystet. Also the company of the Sweuians, which they called the companie of Saint George, and the magistrates of the imperiall cities, the bishops of Peritz, Treuers, and Colen sent their aides, and with them the chiefetaines of their prouinces. It is said that the number of their horsemen were about fortie thousand. But their footmen were not full so many, for the Germans for the most part doe vse to fight their battels on horsebacke. The number of the popes army against the Bohemians.

Also Rhenatus prince of Loyain promised to come to these warres, but being letted by his ciuill warres, forsomuch as he went about to vanquish the earle of Vandome, whereby hee could not keepe his promise, neither the countie Palatine of Rheine, which did aide and succour the earle of Vandome, could not goe against the Bohemians. The cardinall staying for them, deferred his iourne vntill the Kalends of August. In the meane time, Albert leading his armie out of Austria, vnderstanding that the cardinall was not present at the day appointed, and being himselfe vnable to encounter with the Bohemian power, he returned backe againe. After this the cardinall entred into Boheme with an huge armie, and destroyed many of the protestants townes, killing men, women and children, sparing neither old nor young: notwithstanding, this his tyrannie was exercised in the vttermost borders of Boheme, for his captaines feared to enter farre into the land. The Bohemians assone as they had heard tell that their enemie was come, made readie, and gathered their host with all speed, and last flege to a towne called Stiltiuerge, and brought it vnder subiection. Cardinal Iulius with a mallet beateth Bohemie. The cruell slaughter done by the cardinall.

In the meane season there fell such a marueilous sudden feare amongst all the papists throughout the whole camp, that they began most shamefullie to run away before any enemie appeared in sight. The cardinal Iulianus marueiling at this most sudden feare, and that thould moue so great an armie to flie, went about vnto the captains, exhorting them to put on armor, to order their battels, and courageously to abide their enemies, saying: they did not fight for the glorie of their kingdome, or for the possession of lands, but for their liues, and honour, and * religion of Christ, and for the saluation of soules. Holy ignominious affinges it (saith he) for the Germans to flie in battell, whole courage and valiantnesse all the world both erstoll? It were much better for to die, then to giue place to any enemies, before they were seene: for they can by no meanes flie in safetie within the walls, which giue place vnto their enemie in the field; for it is the weapon that defendeth a man and not the walls, & except they would euen presently defend their liberty with the sword, they thould shortly be in greater bondage, more miserable then any death. But this exhortation was God sendeth a feare into the popes armie. * Rather for the religion of Antichrist. This cardinall belike loued to preach rather in the campe then in the Church.

all in vaine, for feare had put away all boldnesse: for the ensignes were snatched vp, and as though there had beene no captaine in the hast, euery man tanne headlong away. No man regarded any commandement, neither once tooke his leaue of his captaine, but casting away their armour with spéde flight they ran away, as though their enemie had béen at their backes. The cardinall also, although it were against his will, was forced to doe the like.

The cardinall of Millaine ranne away for feare.

Thus the protestants by the feare of their enemies made the more bold & courageous, pursued them through the woods, and had a great pray and spoile of them. Notwithstanding, Albertus, when he heard tell that the cardinall was entred into Boheme, with all speed came againe out of Austrich with his armie, and besieged the strong towne of Porgeabia: but when he vnderstood how the cardinall was fled, he left off his purpose, and returned through Moravia, which was not yet subiect vnto him, and destroyed aboue fiftie townes, with fire and sword, tooke many of their cities by force, and spoiled them, committing great murther and slaughter, and so afflicted them that they tooke vpon them his yoke, and promised to be subiect and obedient to him vnder this condition, that as touching religion he would be bound to do that which the councell of Basill should determine.

Great slaughter in Boheme by duke Albert.

There was there an ambassade sent out of Boheme vnto Basill, where as Sigismund held the councell, who during the time of the warres, had kept himselfe at Norembrege. Then as he should take his iourney vnto Rome to be crowned emperour, he wrote letters vnto the nobles of Boheme, wherein was contained, how that he was a Bohemian borne, and how he was not more affectioned to any nation, then to his owne, and that he went to Rome for none other cause but to be crowned, the which his honour should also be a renowne to the Bohemians, whom to aduance it hath beene alwaies his speciall care.

The councell of Basill.

A feeres of the Emperour to the Bohemians.

Also, how that through his endeuor the councel was begun at Basill, exhorting all such as were desirous to bee heard as touching religion, that they should come thither, and that they would not maintaine any quarrell contrarie to the holy mother church, that the councell would louingly and gently heare their reasons; that they should onely endeuor themselues to agree with the Synode as touching religion, and reserue and keepe a quiet and peaceable kingdome for him, against his returne: Neither should the Bohemians thinke to refuse his regiment, whose brother, father, and vncle, had reigned ouer them, and that he would reigne ouer them after no other meane or sort, then other christian kings vsed to doe.

The Bohemians sent by the councell, to safe conduct them vnto the Councell. A doubt concerning the Bohemians whether to go to the councell of Basil or no. This Woman-dus was after a great backe friend to the faithfull Bohemians.

The councell of Basill also wrote their letter to the Bohemians, that they should send their ambassadors which should shew a reason of their faith, promising safe-conduct to goe and come, and free libertie to speake what they would. The Bohemians in this point were of two opinions; for the protestants and almost all the common people said, it was not good to goe, alledging the examples of John Hus and Hierome of Prage, which going into Constance vnder the safe-conduct of the emperour, were there openly burned. But the nobilitie following the mind of Rayuardus, prince of the new house, said, that they ought to goe vnto the councell, and that they are not to bee suffred which had inuented those new and strange opinions of faith, and new kind of religion, except they would render account of their doings and sayings before the vniuersall church, and defend those things, which they had openly taught before learned men. This opinion tooke place, and an ambassade of three hundred horse was sent vnto Basil. The chiefe whereof were William Colca a valiant knight, and Procopius surnamed Magnus, a man of woorthe fame for his manifold victories. Iohn Rochezana preacher of Prage, Nicolas Galecus minister of the Thaborites, and one Peter an Englishman, of excellent prompt and pregnant wit. The people came in great number out of the towne, and many out of the Synode and councell, attending before the gates to see the comming of this valiant and famous people: othersome gathered together in great number into the streetes where as they should passe through. The matrons, maides and children, filled the windowes and houses to behold and se, and to maruell at their strange kind of apparell, and stout courageous countenances, saying that it was not vntrue which was reported of them: notwithstanding all men beheld Procopius, saying, this is he which hath ouercome the papists in so many battels, which hath subuerted so many townes, and slaine so many men, whom both his enemies, and also his owne souldiers, doe feare and reuerence: also, that hee was a bold, valiant and inuincible captaine, which could not bee ouercome with any terrour, labour or trauell.

The oration of cardinall Iulian.

This Bohemian ambassadours were gently receiued. The next day after, cardinall Iulianus sending for them vnto the councell house, made a gentle, long, and eloquent Oration vnto them, exhorting them to vnitie and peace, saying, that the church was the spouse of our Sauiour Christ, and the mother of all faithfull, that it hath the keyes of binding and loosing, and also that it is white and faire, without spot or wrinkle, and cannot erre in those points which are necessarie to saluation, and that he which doth contemne the same church, is to be counted as a prophane Ethnicke, and Publican, neither can this church be represented better by any meanes then in this councell. He exhorteth them also to receiue the decrees of the councell, and to giue no lesse credit vnto the councell then vnto the Gospell, by whose authoritie the Scriptures themselues are receiued and allowed. Also that the Bohemians which call themselues the children of the church, ought to heare the voice of their mother, which is neuer vnmindfull of her children: how that now of late they haue liued apart from their mother; albeit (said he) that is no new or strange thing, for there haue been many in times past which haue forsaken their mother, and yet seeking after saluation haue returned to her againe: That in the time of Noes flood, as many as liuers without the arke perished: that the Lords passeouer was to be eaten in one house: that there is no saluation to bee sought for out of the church, and that this is the garden and famous fountaine of water: whereof whosoeuer shall drinke, shall not thirst euerlastingly: That the Bohemians haue done as they ought, in that they haue sought the fountaines of this water at the councell, and haue determined now at length to giue care vnto their mother. Now all hatred ought to cease, all armour and weapon is to be laid apart, and all occasion of war vtterly to bee reiected: For the fathers would louingly and gently heare whatsoeuer there they would say in their owne cause or quarrell, requiring onely that they would willingly receiue and embrace the good counsels and determinations of the sacred Synode: whereunto not onely the Bohemians, but also all other faithfull christians, ought to consent and agree, if they will be partakers of eternall life.

This Oration of the cardinall, was heard and very well allowed of the fathers. Wherunto the Bohemians answered in few words, that they neither had condemned the church nor the councel: as the sentence giuen at Constance against those which were vnheard, doth diminish nothing of the christian religion: that the authoritie of the fathers hath alwaies remained amongst them inuiolate; and whatsoeuer things the Bohemians had taught, to bee confirmed by the Scriptures and Gospell, and that they are nowcome to manifest their innocencie before the whole church, and to require open audience, where as the laity may also be present. Their request was granted them: and being further demanded in what points they did disagree from the church of Rome, they propounded foure articles.

The Bohemians answer to the cardinals oration.

The articles wherein the Bohemians differed from the church of Rome.

First, they affirmed, that al such as would be saued, ought of necessitie to receiue the communion of the last Supper vnder both kinds of bread and wine.

The second article, they affirmed all ciuill rule and dominion to be forbidden vnto the clergie by the law of God.

The third article, that the preaching of the word of God is free for all men, and in all places.

The fourth article, as touching open crimes and offences which are in no wise to be suffered for the auoiding of greater euill.

These were the only propositions which they propounded before the councell in the name of the whole realme. Then an other ambassador affirmed that hee had heard of the Bohemians diuers and sundrie things offensiue to christian eares, amongst the which this was one point, that they should preach that the inuention of the order of begging friers was diabolicall.

Then Procopius riling vp, said, neither is it vntrue, for it neither Moses, neither before him the Patriarchs, neither after him the prophets, neither in the new law Christ and his apostles, did institute the order of begging friers, who doth doubt but that it was an inuention of the diuell, and a worke of darknesse?

This answere of Procopius was derided of them all: And cardinall Iulianus went about to proue that not onely the decrees of the Patriarches and prophets, and those things which Christ and his apostles had instituted to be only of God, but also all such decrees as the church should ordaine, being guided through the holy Ghost, be the workes of God. Albeit, as he said, the order of begging friers, might seeme to bee taken out of some part of the Gospell. The Bohemians chose out foure diuines which should declare their articles to bee taken out of the Scriptures. Likewise on the contrarie part there were foure appointed by the councell. This disputation continued fiftie daies, where many things were alledged on either part, whereof as place shall serue, more hereafter (by the grace of Christ) shall be said, when we come to the time of that councell.

Certaine appointed by the Bohemians and the councel to dispute.

In the meane season, while the Bohemians were thus in long conflicts with Sigismund the emperour and the pope, fighting for their religion, vnto whom, notwithstanding all the enuie of the popes power was bent against them, God of his goodnesse had giuen such noble victories, as is aboue expressed, and euer did prosper them so long as they could agree among themselues: as these things (I say) were doing in Boheme king Henrie the fifth, fighting like a valiant in France, albeit found like matters of religion, fell sicke at Vayes, and died, after hee had reigned nine yeares, fiue moneths, three

The sixth Part or Section, pertaining to the last three hundred yeares.

A Preface to the Reader.

According to the fiue sundrie diuersities and alterations of the church, so haue I diuided hitherto the order of this present church storie into fiue principall parts, euery part containing 300. yeeres. So that now comming to the last 300. yeeres, that is, to the last times of the church, counting from the time of Wickliffe: Forasmuch as in the compasse of the said last 300. yeeres, are contained great troubles and perturbations of the church, with the marueilous reformation of the same through the wondrous operation of the almightie; all which things cannot be comprehended in one booke: I haue therefore disposed the said latter 300. yeeres into diuers bookes, beginning now with the sixth booke, at the reigne of king Henry the 6. In which booke beside the grieuous and sundry persecutions raised vp by Antichrist, to be noted, herein is also to be obserued, that whereas it hath of long time beene receiued and thought of the common people, that this religion now generally vsed, hath sprung vp and risen but of late, euen by the space (as many do thinke) of 20. or 30. yeeres, it may now manifestly appeare, not only by the Acts and Monuments heretofore passed, but also by the histories hereafter following, how this profession of Christs religion hath beene spread abrode in England of old and ancient time, not only from the space of these 200. late yeeres, from the time of Wickliffe, but hath continually from time to time sparkled abrode, although the flames thereof haue neuer so perfectly burst out, as they haue done within these hundred yeeres and more: As by these histories here collected and gathered out of Registers, especially of the dioces of Norwich, shall manifestly appeare: wherein may be seene what men, and how many both men and women within the said dioces of Norwich, haue beene, which haue defended the same cause of doctrine, which now is receiued by vs in the church. Which persons although then they were not so strongly armed in their cause and quarrell, as of late yeeres they haue beene, yet were they warriers in Christs church, and fought for their power in the same cause. And although they gaue backe through tyrannie, yet iudge thou the best good Reader, and refer the cause thereof to God, who reuealeth all things according to his determinate will and appointed time.

King Henry 6. Anno 1422.

His yong prince being vnder the age of one yeere, after the death of his father, succeeded in his reigne and kingdome of England; Anno 1422. and in the eight yeere was crowned at Westminster: and the second yeere after was crowned also at Paris, Henrie bishoppe of Winchester, cardinall, being present at them both, and reigned 38. yeeres, and then was deposed by Edward the fourth, as hereafter (Christ willing) shall bee declared in his time. In the first yeere of his reigne was burned the constant witnesse bearer and testis of Christs doctrine, William Taylo, a priest, vnder Henry Chicheley archbishop of Canturbury. Of this William Tailo I read, that in the daies of Thomas Arundell, hee was first apprehended, and abiured. Afterward in the dates of Henry Chicheley, about the yeere of our Lord, 1421, which was a yeere before his burning, the said William Tailo appeared againe in the conuocation before the archbishop, being brought by the bishop of Worcester, being complained of to haue taught at Bissiow these articles following.

Exhibita mandi. Ex Regist. Cant.

William Tailor the first time apprehended. William Tailo againe apparech before the archbishop. Three articles first obiected to William Tailo.

The fourme of canonicall abiuration in the church when against them that were excommunicate.

First, that wholsoeuer hangeth any Scripture about his necke, taketh away the honor due only to God, and giueth it to the Diuell.

Secondly, that no humane person is to bee worshipped, but onely God is to be adored.

Thirdly, that the saints are not to be worshipped nor inuocated.

Upon these articles the said William Tailo being examined, denied that hee did preach or hold them in way of defending them, but only did commune and talke vpon the same especially vpon the second and third articles, onely in way of reasoning, and for argument sake. And to inforce his opinion to be true in that which he did hold, hee brought out of his bosome a paper or libell written, wherein were contained certaine articles, with the testimonies of the Doctours alledged, and exhibited the same vnto the archbishop. Who then being bid to stand aside, the archbishop consulting together with the bishops and other prelats, what was to be done in the matter, deliuered the writings vnto maister John Catlit, and Iohn Wiskingdale, the two Vicechancellors of Oxford, and Cantbridge, and to John Langdon monke of Canturbury. Who assisting with themselues, and with other Diuines, about the articles and allegations, on the Monday following, presented the said articles of William Tailo, to the archbishop and prelates, as erronedus and hereticall. Whereupon William Tailo being called before them, in conclusion was contented to reuoke the same, and for his penaunce was by them condemned to perpetuall prison.

Notwithstanding, through fauour they were contented, that he should be released from his carcerall indurance, in case he would put in sufficient surety in the kings chancerie, and sweare that he shall neuer hold or fauour any such opinions hereafter. And thus the said William Tailo, appointed to appeare the next Wednesday at Lambeth before the archbishop, to take his absolution from his long excommunication, during the time from Thomas Arundell, appeared againe before him; where hee laying aside his Arundoile, that is, his cloke, his cap, and stripped vnto his dublet, kneeled at the feete of the archbishop. Who then standing vp, and hauing a rod in his hand, began the Psalme Miserere, &c. his chapleins answering the second verse. After that was said the collect, Deus cui proprium, &c. with certaine other prayers. And so taking an oth of him, the archbishop committed him to the custodie of the bishop of Worcester, to whom power and authority was permitted to release him, vpon the conditions aforesaid. And thus was William Tailo for that time absolued, being enioyned notwithstanding to appeere at the next conuocation whensoeuer it should be, before the said archbishop or his successor that should follow him.

In the meane time, while William Tailo was thus in the custodie of the bishop of Worcester, there passed certaine writings betweene him, and one Thomas Smith priest at Bissiow, in the which writings William Tailo replied against the said Thomas, concerning the question of worshipping of saints. Upon the occasion of which reple being brought to the hands of the bishop of Worcester, William Tailo began anew to be troubled, and was brought againe before the publike conuocation of the clergie, by the said bishop of Worcester, to answere vnto his writings. This was Anno 1422. the 11. day of Februarie. Vnto the which conuocation the said William being presented, his writings were read to him; which he would not, nor could not deny to be of his owne hand writing.

The opinion of William Tailo concerning worshipping of saints.

The tenour and effect of whole writing onely tended to proue, that euery petition and praier to any supernaturall gift, ought to be directed to God alone, and to no creature. Albeit in this his writing hee did not vtterly denie, that it was not lawfull in any respect to pray to saints (and bringeth for the same Thomas Aquine) but onely in respect of that worship, which is called Cultus latriæ: And further to prosecuteth his mind herein, that he seemeth little or nothing to differ from the superstition of the papists: as most plainely appeareth by his owne words, saying: Nunquam tamen negaui, aut nego re intendo, merita aut sanctorum suffragia tam beatorum quam viantium, tam viuis, quam mortuis ad hoc dispositis, quantum possunt, suffragari, vel proficere; quia hoc est elicibile ex Scripturis, quæ non fallit, & ex consona ratione, &c. And moreouer he inferreth the example of Moses, who prayed vnto God, alledging the merits of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, which were dead, &c. And furthermore, passing from the testimonie of Hyerome, and alledging the example of Steuen, saith: Quod nunc magis exauditur pro veneratoribus suis, quam tunc exauditus est pro lapidatoribus. And at length hee commeth to this conclusion, proouing by saint Austin, in this manor: Ne igitur cum impijs & idolatris in veteri testamento, in circuitu ambulemus, nunquam deueniendo ad centrum, sanum est quod faciamus secundum consilium Apostoli sic dicentis: Accedamus cum fiducia ad thronum gratiæ eius, vt misericordiam consequamur & gratiam inueniamus in auxilio opportuno, &c. That is: And therefore lest we runne about in circles with the wicked, and with the idolaters of the old Testament, and neuer come to the center, therefore it is wholesome and good counsell, that wee follow the mind of the apostle, saying: Let vs resort with boldnesse vnto the throne of his grace, that we may obtaine mercie, and find grace in time of opportune helpe, &c.

Cultus latriæ, that is, worship which is only due to God.

Aug. super Psal.

Thus much out of the foresaid writing of William Taylor I haue excerped, to the intent that the indifferent Reader, ying his iudgement herein, may see how little matter was in this, wherefore he should be condemned by the papists. And yet notwithstanding the same writting being deliuered by the archbishop, to the foure orders of friers of London to be examined, was found erroneous and heretical in these points.

4. articles by the foure orders of friers laid against William Taylor.

First, that euery prayer, which is a petition of some supernaturall gift or free gift, is to be directed onely to God.

2 Item, that prayer is to be directed to God alone.

3 Item, to pray to any creature is to commit Idolatrie.

4 Also, an other opinion there was much like to the other, to make vp the fourth; so that although all these opinions agreed in one, yet to make vp a number euery order of the foure sorts of friers, thought to find out some matter to offer vp to the archbishop against him, lest one order should seeme more cunning or pregnant, in finding out more then could another: or else perchance lest any of them should seeme to fauor the party, in bringing nothing against him, as the rest had done.

☆ The burning of William Taylor priest.

When the Saturday was come, which was the 20. day of February, vpon the which day the foure orders were appointed to declare their censure vpon the articles in the chapter house of Paules, first appeareth frier Tille, for the black friers, then frier Winchelsey, then frier Lowe, after frier Ashwell, each frier for his order seuerally bringing his heresie, as is aboue specified.

Thus the verdict of these foure orders being giuen vp to the archbishop, and seuerally each order conuning in with his heresie, which was the 20. day of February: hereupon commeth downe a writ from the king, directed to the lord Maior and Sheriffes of London, De hæretico comburendo, dated the first day of March, Anno the first of his reigne. The copie whereof remaineth in the records of the Tolper, beginning thus: Rex Maiori & Vicecomitibus. Whereupon the said William Taylor condemned as a relapse, first was degraded, and after to be burned, and so was committed to the secular power. Who then being had to Smithfield, the first day of March, with christian constancie, after long imprisonment, there did consummate his martyrdome, 1422.

The manner of his degrading was all one with the degrading of John Hus before: for the papists vse but one forme for all men. First degrading them from priesthood, by taking from them the chalice and patine. From deaconship, by taking from them the gospell booke and tunicle. From subdeaconship, by taking from them the epistle booke and Tunicle. From Acolitesship, by taking from them the Cruet and candlesticke. From an exorcist, by taking away the booke of Exorcismus or Gardrall. From the lectorship, by taking away the church booke key and surplis. And likewise from Vsher, in taking away the surplis, and first tonsure, &c. All which they orderly accomplished vpon this godly martyr, before his burning.

The popes manner of degradation.

John Florence a Turner.

John Florence a Turner.

IJohn Florence a Turner, dwelling in Shelton, in the diocese of Norwich, was attached for that he held and taught these heresies here vnder written (as they called them) contrary to the determination of the church of Rome.

In primis, that the pope and cardinals haue no power to make or constitute any lawes.

Item, that there is no day to be kept holy, but onely the Sunday which God hath hallowed.

Item, that men ought to fast no other time, but of the Quatuor temporum.

Item, that images are not to be worshipped, neither that the people ought to set vp any lights before them in the churches, neither to go on pilgrimage, neither to offer for the dead, or with women that are purified.

Item, that curats should not take the tithes of their parishioners, but that such tithes should bee distred amongst the poore parishioners.

He meaneth they should not claime such tithes by any erection.

Item, that all such as sweare by their life or power, shall be damned, except they repent.

The displing of Iohn Florence.

Upon Wednesday being the second day of August in the yeere of our Lord, 1424, the said John Florence, personally appeared before William Bernam, chancellor to William bishop of Norwich, where as he proceeding against him, obiected the first article touching the power of the pope and cardinals: to which article the said John Florence answered in this manner. If the pope liued vprightly as Peter liued, he hath power to make lawes: otherwise I beleeue hee hath no power. But being afterward threatned by the iudge, he acknowledged that hee had erred, and submitted himselfe to the correction of the church, and was abiured, taking an oth that from that time forward he should not hold, teach, preach, or willingly defend any errour or heresie contrarie to the determination of the church of Rome, neither maintaine, helpe, or abet any that shall teach or hold any such errours or heresies, either priuilie or apertly; and for his offence in this behalfe done, he was enioyned this penance following.

That

The manner of this displing was with a white rod, whose laid vpon the head of the penitentiary.

That sundaies in a solemne procession in the cathedrall church of Norwich, hee should be displed before all the people. The like also should be done about his parish church of Shelton, three other seuerall sundaies, he being bare headed, bare footed and bare necked, after the maner of a publike penitentiarie, his body being couered with a canuas shirt and canuas breeches, carrying in his hand a taper of a pound waight; and that done he was dismissed.

Richard Belward of Erisam in the diocesse of Norwich.

RIchard Belward of Erisam, in the diocesse of Norwich, was accused for holding and teaching these errors and opinions here vnder written, contrary to the determination of the church of Rome.

In primis, that ecclesiasticall ministers and Ordinaries haue no power to excommunicat, neither can excommunicat. And albeit that a bishop doe excommunicat any man, God doth absolue him.

Item, that hee held the erroneous opinions and conclusions, that sir John Oldcastle held when he was in prison, and affirmed that sir John Oldcastle was a true catholike man, and falsly condemned and put to death without any reasonable cause.

Item, that such as goe on pilgrimage, offering to images made of wood and stone, are excommunicat, because they ought to offer to the quicke, and not to the dead: and that the ecclesiasticall ministers, that is to say, the curats doe sell God vpon Easter day, when as they receiue offerings of such as should communicate before they doe minister the sacrament vnto them.

Item, that he counselled diuers women, that they should not offer in the church for the dead, neither with women that were purified.

The words of the Register.

Item, that he blamed diuers of his neighbors that refused his doctrine, saying vnto them: Truly ye are soles that denie to learne the doctrine of my sect, for your neighbors which are of my sect, are able to confound and banquish all other that are of your sect.

Item, that the saints which are in heauen ought in no case to be prayed vnto, but only God.

Item, that the said Richard kepeth schooles of Lollardy in the English tongue, in the towne of Dichingham, and a certaine parchmentmaker bringeth him all the bookes containing that doctrine, from London.

The fifth day of July 1424. the said Richard Belward was brought before John bishop of Norwich, sitting in place of iudgement, where as the foresaid articles were obiected against the said Richard, which he there denied: whereupon the bishop appointed him another day to purge himselfe, the monday next after the feast of Saint Margaret: vpon which day being the 24. of July, in the yeere aforesaid, he appeared againe before the bishop, and brought with him nine of his neighbors to purge him vpon those articles, and there did solemnly purge himselfe. And afterward, forsomuch as the said bishop suspected the said Richard Belward greatly of Lollardy, he commanded him there presently to sweare vpon the Euangelists, that from that day forward he should not wittingly preach, teach, or defend any errour or heresie, contrary to the church of Rome, neither aid, assist, fauor or maintaine, priuily or apertly, any manner of person or persons, that should hold or maintaine the said errours or heresies. In the presence of master William Bernam, John Wadden, Robert Serle and John Berne esquire, and other of his neighbors which came vnto his purgation.

John Goddesell of Dichingham.

In like manner John Goddesell of Dichingham parchmentmaker, was defended and accused vpon the same articles, and thereupon brought before the bishop: where as hee denying them, purged himselfe by his neighbours, as Richard Belward before had done, being sworne also in like manner, as he was, and so was dismissed and set at liberty, vntill the yeere of our Lord 1428. when as he was againe apprehended, accused and abiured, as shall be more at large declared in the historie when wee come to that yeere. Sir Hugh Pie also, chaplaine of Ludney in the diocesse of Norwich, was likewise accused and brought before the bishop of Norwich the fifth day of July, anno 1424. for holding of these opinions following

Sir Hugh Pie priest.

That the people ought not to goe on pilgrimage.

Item, that the people ought not to giue almes, but onely vnto such as beg at their doores.

Item, that the image of the crosse and other images are not to be worshipped. And that the said Hugh had cast the crosse of Bomeshold into the fire to be burned, which he take from one John Welgate of Ludney. Which articles, as is aforesaid, being obiected against him, he vtterly denied: whereupon he had a day appointed to purge himselfe by the witnesse of three lay men, and three priests. That so done, he was sworne as the other before, and so dismissed.

Image of the crosse not to be worshipped.

After this, in the yeere of our Lord 1428. king Henry the 6. sent downe most cruell letters of commission vnto John Exeter and Iacolet Germaine, keeper of the castell of Colchester, for the apprehending of sir William White priest, and others suspected of heresies, the tenor whereof hereafter ensueth.

The copie of the kings letters directed to John Exeter, and Iacolet Germaine, keeper of the castell of Colchester, for the apprehending of sir William White priest, and other (as they called them) Lollards.

Henry by the grace of God king of England and of France, Lord of Ireland, to his welbeloued John Exeter, and Iacolet Germaine, keeper of the castell of Colchester, health.

A letter of the king.

Ye shall vnderstand that we fully trusting vnto your fidelitie and circumspections, haue appointed you ioyntly and seuerally to take and arrest William White priest, and Thomas, late chaplaine of Setling, in the county of Norfolke, and William Northampton priest, and all other whatsoeuer they bee that are suspect of heresie or Lallardie, wheresoeuer they may be found within the liberties or without, and straightway being so taken, to send them vnto our next gaile or prison, vntill such time as we shall haue taken other order for their deliuery: And therefore we straitly command you, that ye diligentlie attend about the premisses, and fulfill the same in forme aforesaid. Also we charge and command all and singuler Iustices of peace, Maiors, Shiriffes, Bailiffes, Constables, and all other our faithfull officers, by the tenor of these presents, that they doe assist, aid and counsell you and euery of you, in the execution of the premisses, as it shall be comely for them. In witnesse whereof, we haue caused these our letters patents to be made. Witnes my selfe at Westminster, the 6. of July, the 6. yeere of our raigne.

By vertue of which commission were finde in old monuments, that within short space after, John Exeter, which was appointed one of the commissioners, attached six persons in the towne of Bungay in the diocesse of Norwich, and committed them to William Day, and William Roe, Constables of the towne of Bungay, to be sent within ten daies following vnder safe custody, vnto the castell of Norwich. Whose names through the antiquity of the monument were so defaced, that we could not attaine to the perfect knowledge of them all: onely three names partly remained in the booke to be read, which were these.

¶ John Waddon of Tenderdon, in the countie of Kent, Bartlemew, monke of Ersham, in the county of Norfolke, Corneleader a married man, William Scurs.

These three were in the custody of the duke of Norfolke, at his castell of Fremingham.

Besides these, we also finde in the said old monuments within the diocesse of Norfolke and Suffolke, specially in the townes of Beckles, Ersham, and Ludney, a great number both of men and women to haue been vexed and cast in prison, and after their abiuration, brought to open shame in churches and markets, by the bishop of the said diocesse called William, and his chancellor William Bernham, John Exeter being the Register therein; so that within the space of three or foure yeers, that is, from the yeere 1428. vnto the yeere 1431. about the number of 120. men and women were examined and suffained great vexation for the profession of the christian faith: of whom some were only taken vpon suspition only, for eating of meates prohibited vpon vigill daies, who of their purgation made, escaped more easily away, and with lesse punishment, whose names here follow subscribed.

These forenamed persons and soulders of Christ, being much beaten with the cares and troubles of thole dates, although they were constrained to relent and abiure, that is, to protest otherwise with their tongues, then their hearts did thinke, partly though correction, and partly though infirmity (being as yet but new trained soulders in Gods field) yet for their god will they bare vnto the truth, although with their tongues they durst not expresse it, we haue thought good that their names should not be suppressed, aswell for other sundry causes, as specially for this: either to stop the mouthes of malignant aduersaries, or to answer to their ignorance: the following rather blinde affection, then the true knowledge of times and antiquities, for lacke of knowledge, blame that they knowinot, accusing the true doctrine of the word of God for newelties, and carping the teachers thereof for new broched brethren. Who, if they did as well foresee times passed, as they be vnwilling to follow times now present, they should vnderstand as well by these stories as other before, how this doctrine of the grace of God lacking no antiquity, hath from time to time continually sought to burst out, and in some places hath preuailed, although in most places though tyranny and the malice of men, Gods proceedings haue been suppressed and kept vnder from rising, in much as mens power and strength ioyned with craft and subtilty, could labour to kepe downe the same: as here by these god men of Northfolke and Suffolke, may well appeare. For if the knowledge and the god towardnesse of those god men, had had the like liberty of time, with the helpe of like authority, as wee haue now, and had not been restrained through the iniquity of time and tyranny of prelats, it had well appeared how old this doctrine would haue been, which now they contemne and reiect for the newnesse thereof: neither need Boner to haue asked of Thomas Hawkes, x such other, where their church was for forty yeres ago, in as much as for forty yeres ago, and more, within the country of Northfolke and Suffolke, was there found such plenty of the same profession and like doctrine which we now professe. And thus much for the number of the names of these persons.

Now as touching their articles which they did maintaine and defend: first, this is to be considered, as I finde it in the registers, such society and agreement of doctrine to be amongst them, that almost in their assertions and articles there was no difference. The doctrine of the one was the doctrine of all the other; what their articles were, partly it is shewed in the lease before: and partly here followeth to be declared more at large.

Although it is to be thought concerning these articles that many of them either were falsly obiected against them, or not truly reported of the notaries, according as the common maner is of these aduersaries, where the matter is good, there to make heresie, and of a little occasion, to stir vp great matter of slander, as they did before by the articles of John Wickliffe and John Hus, and others mo: So in like manner it seemeth they did in the articles of these men, either mistaking that which they said, or misunderstanding that which they meant, especially in these two articles concerning baptisme and paying of tithes. For whereas they speaking against the ceremonies and superfluous traditions then vsed in baptisme, as salt, oile, spittle, taper, light, crismes, crossing of the water, with such other accoūted them as no materiall thing in the holy institution of baptisme, the notaries slanderously deprauing this their assertion, to make it more odious to the eares of the people, so gaue out the article, as though they should hold, that the sacrament of baptisme vsed in the church by water, is but a light matter and of small effect.

Againe, in speaking against the christening the midwiues vse in priuat houses, against the opinion of such as thinke such children to be damned, which depart before they come to their baptisme, they are falsly reported, as though they should say, that christian people be sufficiently baptised in the bloud of Christ, and needs no water, and that infants be sufficiently baptised, if their parents be baptised before them. Which thing is so contrary to the manifest word, that it is not to be thought any to be so ignorant of the Gospell, that euer would or did affirme the same.

Moreouer, they thought or said peraduenture, that in certaine cases, tithes might be withholden from wicked priests sometime, and be conferred to better vses, to the behoofe of the poore: Therefore they are falsly slandered, as saying and affirming that not tithes were to be giuen to the ministers and curats of the churches.

And likewise for matrimony, wherein they are reported to hold and affirme, as though it consisted onely in the mutuall consent betwixt the man and the woman, nothing no other solemnizing in the publike church, and all because (as it is like) they denied it to be a sacrament. Other articles were obiected against them, as these which hereafter followe.

That auricular confession is not to be made vnto a priest, but vnto God only, because no priest hath any power to absolue a sinner from his sinne.

Item, that no priest hath power to make the body of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, but that after the sacramentall words, there remaineth pure material bread as before.

Item, that euery true christian man is a priest to God.

Item, that no man is bound vnder paine of damnation vnto Lent, or any other daies prohibited by the church of Rome.

Item, that the pope is antichrist, and his prelats the disciples of antichrist, and the pope hath no power to binde and lose vpon earth.

Item, that it is lawfull for euery christian to doe any bodily worke (sinne only except) vpon holy daies.

Item, that it is lawfull for priests to haue wiues.

Item, that excommunications and ecclesiasticall censures giuen out by the prelats, are not to be regarded.

Item, it is not lawfull to sweare in priuat cases.

Item, that men ought not to goe on pilgrimage.

Item, that there is no honor to be giuen to the Images of the crucifix, of our Lady, or any other saint.

Item, that the holy water hallowed in the church by the priest, is not holier or more vertue then other running or well water, because the Lord blessed all waters in their first creation.

Item, that the death of Thomas Becket was neither holy, neither meritorious.

Item, that the relikes, as dead mens bones, ought not to be worshipped or digged out of their graues, or set by in shrines.

Item, that praiers made in all places are acceptable vnto God.

Item, y men ought not to pray to any saint but only to God.

Item, that the bels and ringing in the church, was ordained for no other purpose then to fill the priests purses.

Item, that it is no sin to withstand the ecclesiasticall precepts.

Item,

These forenamed persons and soulders of Christ, being much beaten with the cares and troubles of thole dates, although they were constrained to relent and abiure, that is, to protest otherwise with their tongues, then their hearts did thinke, partly though correction, and partly though infirmity (being as yet but new trained soulders in Gods field) yet for their god will they bare vnto the truth, although with their tongues they durst not expresse it, we haue thought good that their names should not be suppressed, aswell for other sundry causes, as specially for this: either to stop the mouthes of malignant aduersaries, or to answer to their ignorance: the following rather blinde affection, then the true knowledge of times and antiquities, for lacke of knowledge, blame that they knowinot, accusing the true doctrine of the word of God for newelties, and carping the teachers thereof for new broched brethren. Articles.

a Treason of necessity vrgent the present.

The deuill of Sathanas Becket.

In this article is meant, that the wicked be in the church, but not of the church.

Item, that the catholike church is onely the congregation of the elect.

These were the articles which were generally obiected against them all, wherein they did so agree in one vniforme faith, that whatsoeuer one did hold, all the other did maintaine and hold the same. By the which their consent and doctrine it appeareth, that they all receiued it of some one instructer, who was William White: which being a scholler and followet of John Wickliffe, reuoked afterward into this country of Norfolke, and there instructed these men in the light of the Gospell. And now, as wee haue declared the names and articles of these good men, so it remaineth somewhat to speake of their troubles how they were handled, beginning first with William White.

The bishop vnmaskes himself in the matter, exhorting the people.

William White priest.

Cxlii. White martyr. Anno 1428 Ex Waldens. Eccles. 50.

THis William White being a follower of John Wickliffe, and a priest, not after the common sort of priests, but rather to be reputed amongst the number of them, of whom the wise man speaketh: He was as the morning starre in the middest of a cloud, &c. This man was well learned, vpright, and a well spoken priest. He gaue ouer his priesthood and benefice, and toke vnto him a godly young woman to his wife, named Ioane: notwithstanding hee did not therefore cease or leane from his former office and duty, but continually laboured to the glory and praise of his spouse Christ, by reading, writing and preaching. The principall points of his doctrine were these, which he was forced to recant at Canturburie.

That men should seeke for the forgiuenesse of their sinnes only at the hands of God.

That the wicked liuing of the pope and his holinesse, is nothing else but a diuelish estate and heady yoke of antichrist, and therefore he is an enemy vnto Christs truth.

That men ought not to worship images, or other idolatrous paintings.

That men ought not to worship the holy men which are dead.

The Romish church is aptly resembled to the cursed figge tree.

That the Romish church is the fig tree which the Lord Christ hath accursed, because it hath brought forth no fruit of the true beleefe.

That such as weare coules, or be annointed or shorn, are the lanceknights and soulders of Lucifer: and that they all, because their lamps are not burning, shall be shut out, when as the Lord shall come.

Vpon which articles he being attached at Canturbury vnder the archbishop Henry Chichelly, in the yere of our Lord 1424, there for a certaine space stoutly and manly witnessed the truth which he had preached: but like as there hee lost his courage and strength, so afterward he became againe much more stouter and stronger in Iesus Christ, x confessed his olwn errors and offence. For after this, he going into Norfolke with his said wife Ioane, and there occupying himselfe busily in teaching and conuerting the people vnto the true doctrin of Christ, at the last, by the meanes of the kings letters sent downe for that intent and purpose, he was apprehended and taken, and brought before William bishop of Norwich, by whom he was conuict, and condemned of 30. articles, and there was burned in Norwich, in the month of September, an. 1424.

Father Abraham, John Maddon priest, martyrs and burned.

ABout the same time also was burned father Abraham of Colchester, and John Maddon priest, for the like articles.

Concerning them which abiured, how and by whom they were examined, what depositions came in against them, and what was the order and maner of the penance inioyned them, here it might be set out at large: but for auoiding of prolixity, if shall be sufficient briefly to touch certaine of the principals, whereby the better vnderstanding may be giuen to the reader, after what maner and order all the other were intreated.

First, amongst them which were arrested and caused to abiure in this yere afore specified, 1428. was Thomas Pie, and John Mendham of Aldborough, who being conuict vpon diuers of the articles before mentioned, were inioyned penance to be done in their owne parish church, as by the bishops letter directed to the deane of Rhodenhall, and the parish priest of Aldborough both more at large appeare, the tenor whereof here ensueth.

The copy of the bishop of Norwich his letter.

A letter of the bishop of Norwich.

WIlliam by the sufferance of God bishop of Norwich, to our welbeloued sonnes in Christ the deane of Rodenhall of our diocesse, and to the parish priest of the parish church of Aldborough of the same our diocesse, health, grace and benediction. Forsomuch as we, according to our office lawfully proceeding to the correction and amendement of the soules of Thomas Pye and John Mendham of Aldborough of the diocesse aforesaid, because they haue holden, beleeued and affirmed, diuers and many errors and heresies, contrary to the determination of the holy church of Rome, and the vniuersall church and catholike faith, haue enioyned the said Thomas and John, appearing before vs personally, and confessing before vs iudicially that they haue holden, beleeued and affirmed, diuers and many errors and heresies, this penance hereunder written, for their offences to be done and fulfilled in maner, forme and time hereunder written, according as iustice doth require, that is to say, six fustigations or displings about the parish church of Aldborough aforesaid, before a solemne procession six seuerall sundaies, and three displings about the market place of Herelstone of our said diocesse three principall market daies, bare necked, head, legges and feet, their bodies being couered onely with their shirts and breeches, either of them carrying a taper in his hand of a pound waight, as well round about the church, as about the market place, in euery

The manner of the penance.

The description of the penance of Thomas Pye, and John Mendham.

The burning of William White.

This William White and his wife, had his most abode with one Thomas Moone of Ludney. This man was of so deof the foresaid appointed daies; which tapers the last sunday after ther penance finished, wee will that the said John and Thomas

Thomas do humbly and deuoutly offer vnto the high altar of the parish church of Aldborough at the time of the offertorie of the high Masse the same day, and that either of them going about the market place aforesaid, shall make foure seueral pauses or staies, and at euery of those same pauses, humbly and deuoutly receiue at your hands three disshings. Therefore we straitly charge and command you and either of you, ioyntly and seuerally by vertue of your obedience, that euery sunday and market day, after the receit of our present commandement, you doe effectually admonish, and bring forth the said Thomas Pye and Iohn Mendam to begin and accomplish their said penance, and so diligentlie to finish the same in maner and forme afore appointed. But if they will not obey your monitions, or rather our commandements in this behalfe, and begin and finish their said penance effectually, you or one of you shall cite them peremptorilie, that they or either of them appeare before vs or our commissarie, in the chapel of our palace at Norwich, the 12. day after the citation so made, if it be a court day, or else the next court day following, to declare if they or any of them haue any cause why they should not be excommunicate for their manifest offence in this behalfe committed, according to the forme and order of law, and further to receiue such punishment, as iustice shall prouide in that behalfe. And what you haue done in the premisses, whether the said Thomas and Iohn haue obeyed your admonitions, and performed the said penance or no: we will that you or one of you which haue receiued our said commandement, for the execution thereof, doe distinctly certifie vs betweene this and the last day of November next comming. Dated at our palace of Norwich vnder our commissaries seale, the 8. day of October, An. 1428.

This (gentle Reader) was for the most part, the order of their whole penance: howbeit, some were often times more cruelly handled: and after their penance they were banished out of the diocesse, and othersome more straitly vsed by longer imprisonment, whereof we will briefly rehearse one or two for example.

Iohn Beuerley alias Battild.

IOhn Beuerley alias Battild a labourer was attached by the wisar of Southcreke, the parish priest of Waterden and a lawyer, and so deliuered vnto maister William Barnam the bishops commissarie, who sent him to the castle of Norwich there to be kept in ironsuntil he as afterward he being brought before the Commissarie, and hauing nothing proued against him, he tooke an oth, that euery yeere afterward he should confesse his sins once a yeere to his curate, and receiue the Sacrament at Easter, as other christians ordeined for: his offence was enioyned that the Friday and Saturday next after he should fast bread and water, and vpon the Saturday to be whipped from the palace of Norwich, going round about by Conesland, and by S. Michaels church, by Cottlerein, and about the market, hauing in his hand a wax candle of two pence, to offer to the image of the Trinitie after he had done his penance. And for so much as he confessed that he had eaten fleshvpon Easter day, and was not shriuen in all Lent, nor receiued vpon Easter day, the Iudge enioyned him that he should fast Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday in Whitson-weeke, hauing but one meale a day of fish and other white meats, & after this penance so done, he should depart out of the diocesse, and neuer come there any more.

John Beuerley.

*Alias falsly accused.

Iohn Skilley of Flixton, miller.

IOhn Skilley of Flixton miller, being apprehended and brought before the bishop of Norwich the 14. day of March, 1428. for holding and maintaining the articles aboue written, was thereupon conuict and forced to abiure; and after his abiuration solemnly made (which here to auoid tediousnes we omit) he had a most sharpe sentence of penance pronounced against him, the effect whereof being briefly collected, was this: That for so much as the said Skilley was conuict by his owne confession, for holding and maintaining the articles before written, and for receiuing certaine good and godly men into his house, as sir William White priest, and Iohn Wadden, whom they called famous, notorious, and damnable heretikes, and had now abiured the same, being first absolued from the sentence of excommunication which he had incurred by meanes of his opinions, he was enioyned for penance 7. yeres imprisonment in the monasterie of Langley, in the diocesse of Norwich. And for so much as in times past, he did vpon the Fridaies to eat flesh, he was inioyned to fast bread & water euery Friday, by the space of that seuen yeres to come; and that by the space of two yeres next immediatly after the 7. yeres expired, euery Wednesday in the beginning of Lent, and euery Maundie thursday, he should appeare before the bishop or his successor, or commissarie for the time being, in the cathedrall church of Norwich together with the other penitentiaries, to do open penance for his offences.

John Skilley. The penance of Iohn Skilley.

Besides these there were diuers other of the same company which the same yere were forced to like abiuration and penance. And so to proceed to the next yere following, which was 1429. there ensueth a great number in the same register, which were examined and did penance in like sort, to the number of 16. or 17. In the number of whom was Iohn Baker, or therwise called Vther Tunkall, who for hauing a booke with the Paternoster, the Aue and Creed in English, and for certaine other articles of talking, confession and inuocation contrarie to the determination of the Romish Church, after much vexation for the same, was caused to abiure and suffaine such penance, as the other before him had done.

The storie of Margery Backster.

A Mother was Margerie Backster, wife of William Backster Wright in Swarthan, the same yere accused: against whom, one Ioane wife of Clifeland, was brought in by the bishop, and compelled to depose, and was made to bring in, in forme following.

Margerie Backster.

First, that the said Margerie Backster did inioyne this deponent, that she should in no case sweare, saying to her in English, haue beware of the Bee, for euery Bee will sting, and therfore take heed you sweare not, neither by God, neither by our ladie, neither by none other saint: and if ye doe contrary, the Bee will sting your tongue and benome your soule.

A woman brought in for swearing in the popes court. The Bee will sting.

Item, this deponent being instructed by the said Margery, that she did euery day at Church, she answered that she kneled downe and said 5. Pater nosters, in worship of the crucifix, and as many Aue Maries in worship of our ladie. Whom Margerie rebuked, saying: You do euil to kneele or pray to such Images in the Churches, for God dwelleth not in such Churches, neither shall come downe out of heauen, and will giue you no more reward for such prayer, then a candle lighted and set vnder the couer of the font, will giue light by night to those which are in the Church: saying moreouer in English, Leaue twights, of stocks be we and forme such crosses and Images, and after that, leaue painters glere them with colours. And if you desire so much to see the true crosse of Christ, I will shew it you at home in your owne house. Which this deponent being desirous to see, the said Margery stretching out her armes abroad, said to this deponent: this is the true crosse of Christ, and this crosse thou oughtest and maist euery day, behold and worship in thine owne house, and therefore it is but paine to run to the Church to worship dead crosses and Images.

Against Images.

Item, this deponent being demanded by the said Margery how she beleeued touching the Sacrament of the altar, said that she beleeued the Sacrament of the altar after the consecration, to be the very bodie of Christ in forme of bread. To whom Margerie said: Your beleefe is nought: For if euerie such Sacrament were God, and the very bodie of Christ, there should be an infinite number of Gods, because that a thousand priests and more doe euery day make a thousand such Gods, and afterward eate them, and void them out againe by their hinder parts filthilie stircking vnder the hedges, where as you may find a great many such gods, if you will seeke for them. And therefore know for a certaintie, that by the grace of God it shall neuer be my God, because it is falsly and deceitfully ordeined by the priests in the church, to induce the simple people to idolatry: for it is only material bread.

The Sacrament is not God.

Moreouer, the said Margerie said to this deponent, that Thomas of Canturbury, whom the people called S. Thomas, was a false traitor, and damned in hell, because hee traiterously endowed the Churches with possessions, and ruled by many heresies in the Church, which seduce the simple people; and therfore if God be blessed, the said Thomas is accursed; and those false priests that say that hee suffered his death patiently before the altar, doe lie: For as a false coward ly traitor he was slaine in the church doore as he was flying away.

Sir. Thomas Becket traitor.

Thomas Becket slaine, not before the altar, but in his flying.

Moreouer, this deponent saith, that the said Margery told her that the cursed Pope, Cardinals, Archbish. and Bishops, and specially the Bishop of Norwich and others that support and maintaine heresies and Idolatrie, raigning and ruling ouer the people, shall shortly haue the like same or worse mischiefe fall vpon them, that that cursed man Thomas of Canterbury had. For they falsly and cursedlie deceiue the people with their false manners and lawes, to extort money of the simple folke to suffaine their pride, riot and idlenesse. And know assuredlie that the vengeance of God will speedilie come vpon them, which haue most cruellie slaine the children of God, Father Abraham, and William White, a true preacher of the law of God, and Iohn Wadden, with many other godlie men: which vengeance had come vpon the said Caiphas, the Bishop of Norwich and his ministers, which are members of the diuell, before this time, if the Pope had not sent once those false pardons vnto those parties, which the said Caiphas had falsly obtained to induce the people to make procession for the state of them and of the Church. Which pardons brought the simple people to cursed idolatrie.

Father Abraham, William Sautre, Iohn Wadden.

Item, the said Margerie said to this deponent, that euerie faithfull man or woman is not bound to fast in Lent, or other daies appointed for fasting by the Church, and that euerie man may lawfully eate flesh and all other meates vpon the said daies and times: and that it were better to eate the fragments left vpon Thursday at night or the fasting daies, then to go to the market to bring themselues in debt to buy fish: and that pope Syluester made the Lent.

Against the Popes fasting daies.

Item, the said Margery said to this deponent, that William White was falsly condemned for an heretike, and that he was a good and holy man, and that he willed her to follow him to the place of execution, where as the saw that when he would haue opened his mouth to speake vnto the people to instruct them, a diuell one of bishop Caiphas seruants strucke him on the lips, and stopped his mouth, that he could in no case declare the will of God.

Will. White willing to speake at the stake, was stucken on the mouth.

Item, this deponent saith, that the said Margery taught her that she should not goe on pilgrimage, neither to our lady of Walsingham, nor to any other saint or place.

Also this deponent saith, that the said Margery desired her that she and Ioane her maid would come secretly in the night to her chamber, and there she should heare her husband reade the law of Christ vnto them; which law was written in a booke that her husband was wont to reade to her by night, and that her husband is well learned in the christian verity.

Also that the same Margery had talked with a woman named Ioane Welf, and that the said woman is in a good way of saluation.

Also that the said Margery said to this deponent: Ioane, it appeareth by your countenance, that you intend to disclose this that I haue said vnto you: and this deponent sware that she would neuer disclose it, without the said Margery gaue her occasion. Then said Margery vnto this deponent, if thou doe accuse mee vnto the bishop, I will doe vnto thee as I did once vnto a certaine frier a Carmelite of Yarmouth, which was the best learned frier in all the country. Then this deponent desired to know what she had done to the frier. Vnto whom Margery answered, that she had talked with the said frier, rebuking him because he did beg, saying: that it was no almes to giue him any good thing, except hee would leaue his habit, and goe to the plough, and so he should please God more, then following the life of some of those friers. Then the frier required of the said Margery, whether shee could teach him or tell him any thing else. Then the said Margery (as shee affirmed to this deponent) declared to this frier the gospels in English, and then the frier departed from her. After this, the same frier accused the said Margery of heresie; and shee vnderstanding that the frier had accused her, accused the frier againe, that he would haue had to doe with her carnally; and because she would not consent vnto him, the frier had accused her of heresie. And moreouer the said, that her husband would haue killed the frier therefore: and so the frier for feare held his peace, and went his way for shame.

Against auricular confession.

This Margery also said, that she had often times bin fained-ly confessed to the Deane of the fields, because he should thinke her to be a woman of good life; and therefore he gaue the said Margery often times mony. Then this deponent asked her whether she had confessed her sinnes to a priest or not. And she answered, that she had neuer offended any priest, and therefore she would neuer confesse her selfe to any priest, neither obey him, because they haue no power to absolue any man from their sinnes, for that they offend daily more grieuously then other men; and therefore that men ought not to confesse themselues only vnto God, and to no priest.

Against Images worship.

Item, that the said Margery said to this deponent, that the people did worship diuels which fell from heauen with Lucifer, which diuels in their fall to the earth, entred into the Images which stand in the churches, and haue long lurked and dwelled in them: so that the people worshipping those Images, commit idolatry.

Item, she said more to this deponent, that holy bread and holy water were but trifles of no effect or force, and that the bels are to be cast out of the church, and that they are excommunicat which first ordained them.

Moreouer, that she should not be burned, although she were conuict of Lollardry, for that shee had a charter of saluation in her body.

Also the said deponent saith, that Agnes Bethem her seruant, being sent to the house of the said Margery the saturday after Ashwednesday, the said Margery not being within, found a basse pot standing ouer the fire, with a piece of bacon and otemeale seething in it, as it is said Agnes reported to this deponent.

There were also besides this deponent, diuers other sworn and examined vpon the said Margery, as Iohn Grimley and Agnes Berthem, seruants to William Clifland, which all together confirmed the former depositions.

This much we haue thought good to note as concerning Margery Backster, which we haue gathered out of the old monuments and registers. But what became of her after this her accusation, because we finde no mention made in the said registers, we are not able to declare.

The same yere also were the like depositions made by one William Wright against diuers good men, as here followeth.

First this deponent saith, that William Tailor told Iohn Pury of Ludney, in the house of Iohn Bungay of Weghton, in the presence of Iohn Bungay, Robert Gigges wright of Partham, and Iohn Vther, that all the good men of Partham which were fauorers and helpers to that good man William White are cruell troubled now a daies, and that the said William White was a good and holy doctor: and that the best doctor after him was William Swerden, which wrought with the said William Tailor of Ludney, by the space of one moneth, and that the first sunday of the same moneth, the said William Swerden did sit all day vpon the table at worke, saying to the said William Tailor, that he would not goe to church to shew himselfe a Scribe or a Pharisie: and the second sunday he put on gentlemans apparell, and went to Norwich to heare and know the bishop and his ministers vsed the poor christians there in prison.

Will. Sailor of Ludney.

Also the said William Wright, deposed that William Tailor of Ludney was one of the sect, and went to London with sir Hugh Pie, and had conuersation of certaine times with sir William White, hauing often conference vpon the Lollards doctrine.

The wife and daughter of Thom. Screne.

Item, that Anise, wife of Thomas Screne, is of the same sect, and fauored them, and receiued them often, and also the daughter of Thomas Screne is partly of the same sect, and can reade English.

Rich. Fletcher.

Item, that Richard Fletcher of Beckles, is a most perfit doctor in that sect, and can very well and perfitly expound the holy Scriptures, and hath a booke of the new law in English, which was sir Hugh Pies sheet.

Mr. Belward.

Item, that Nicolas Belward, sonne of Iohn Belward, dwelling in the parish of Southelam, is one of the same sect, and hath a new testament which he bought at London for foure marks and fortie pence, and taught the said William Wright and Margery his wife, and wrought with them continually by the space of one yere, and studied diligently vpon the said new Testament.

A new testament cost forty marks, and forty pence.

Tho. Gremner.

Item, that Thomas Gremner, Turner of Dychingame, is perfect in that sect and law.

John Clarke.

John Clarke the younger of Bergh, had the bedding and apparell of William Swerden in his custody, after the returne of William White from Bergh, and is of the same sect.

Wil. Bate.

Item, William Bate, Tailor of Sething and his wife, and his sonne, which can read English very well, are of the same sect.

Wil. Skirming.

Item, William Skirming of Sething, receiued Ioane the wife of William White into his house, being brought thither by William Swerden, after their departure from Partham.

Wil. Osborne, John Rene, Swadwin Cooper.

Item, William Osborne of Sething, John Rene glouer, and Baldwin Cooper of Beckles are of the same sect.

John Pert.

Item John Pert, late seruant of Thomas Pone, is of the same sect, and can reade well, and did reade in the presence of William White, and was the first that brought sir Hugh Pie into the company of the Lollards, which assembled oftentimes together at the house of the said Thomas Pone, and conferred vpon their doctrine.

Sir Hugh Pie bequeathed to Alice, seruant to William White, a new Testament, which they then called the booke of the new law, and was in the custody of Oswald Godfrey of Colchester.

John Perker.

Item, sir Hugh Pie bequeathed to Alice, seruant to William White, a new Testament, which they then called the booke of the new law, and was in the custody of Oswald Godfrey of Colchester.

Apocrypha.

John Perker, mercer of a village by Ipswich, is a famous doctor of that sect. Also he said, that father Abraham of Colchester is a good man.

Item he said William Wright deposeth, that it is read in the prophecies amongst the Lollards, that the sect of Lollards shall be in a manner destroied: notwithstanding at the length the Lollards shall preuaile and haue the victory against all their enemies.

Also he said, that Tucke knoweth all of that sect in Suffolke, Norfolke and Ely.

Besides these, there were many other the same yere tried, whose names being before expressed in the table of Norfolke men, here for breuities sake we omit further to intreat of, passing ouer to the next yere following, which was 1430. Ex Regist. Norw.

Ex Regist. Norw.

John Burrell.

IOhn Burrell, seruant to Thomas Pone of Ludney, in the diocesse of Norwich, was apprehended and arrested for heresie the 9. day of September, in this yere of our Lord 1430. and examined by maister William Bernam the bishops commissary, vpon the articles before mentioned, and diuers others hereafter following obieted against him.

In primis, that the catholike church is the soule of euery good christian man.

Lent fast, fish dates.

Item, that no man is bound to fast the Lent or other fasting daies appointed by the church, for they were not appointed by God, but paradined by the priests: and that euery man may eat flesh or fish vpon the same daies indifferently, according to his owne will, and euery friday is a free day to eat both flesh and fish indifferently.

Pilgrimage to the poore.

Item, that pilgrimage ought not to be made, but only vnto the poore.

Masses for the dead unprofitable.

Item, that it is not lawfull to sweare, but in case of life and death.

Item, that masses and prayers for the dead, are but vaine, for the soules of the dead are either in heauen or hell: and there is none other place of purgatory but this world. Vpon the which articles he being conuict, was forced to abiure tinre, and suffered like pertance, as the other before had done.

The Scotte of Ludney.

Thomas Scotte of Ludney, was apprehended and attached for suspition of hereste, against whom were obiected by the bishop, the articles before written, but specially this article, that he had familiarity and communication with diuers heretikes, and had receiued, comforted, supported, and maintained diuers of them, as sir William White, sir Hugh Pye, Thomas Pet, and William Sallis priests, with many other more: upon the which articles, he being conuict before the bishop, was forced to abiure, and receiued the like penance, in like manner as before.

Sir Will. White, Hugh Pye, Tho. Pet, Will. Sallis, priests.

Rob. Grigges of Dartham.

In like maner, Robert Grigges of Dartham was brought before the bishop the 17. day of February, in the yere aforesaid, for holding and affirming the foresaid articles, but specially these hereafter following.

Articles.

That the sacrament of confirmation ministred by the bishop, did auale nothing to saluation.

That it was no sinne to withstand the ordinances of the church of Rome.

That holy bread and holy water were but trifles, and that the bread and the water were the worse for the coniurations and characters which the priests make ouer them.

Upon which articles he being conuict, was forced to abiure, and receiued penance in maner and forme as the other had done before him.

The like also albeit somewhat more sharpe, happened vnto Iohn Fynch of Colchester, the 20. day of September, who albeit he was of the diocesse of London, being suspect of hereste, was attached in Ipswich in the diocesse of Norwich, and brought before the bishop there, before whom he being conuict of the like articles, as all the other before him, was enioyned penance, three displings in solemne procession about the cathedrall church of Norwich three seuerall sundaies, and three displings about the market place of Norwich three principall market daies, his head, necke, and feet being bare, and his body couered only with a short shirt or wastare, hauing in his hands a taper of wax of a pound waight, which the next sunday after his penance, he should offer to the Trinity: and that for the space of three yeres after, euery Ashwednesday and Maundy Thursday, he should appeare in the cathedrall church of Norwich, before the bishop or his viecgerent to doe open penance amongst the other penitentiaries for his offences.

John Fynch of Colchester.

Penitentiarie.

There were besides these men which we haue here rehearsed, diuers and many other, who, both for the concordance of the matter, and also for that their articles and punishments were all one, we haue thought good at this time to passe ouer, especially forsomuch as their names be before recited in the catalogue.

Anno 1420

About the same time, euen the same yere 1420. shortly after the solemne coronation of king Henry the fifth, a certaine man named Richard Houeden a woll winder, and a citizen of London, receiued also the croune of martyrdome.

Nicolas Canon of Eye.

Nicolas Canon of Eye.

Anno 1431

NOw to proceed in our story of Norfolke and Suffolke, in following the order of yeres, we finde that in the yere of our Lord 1431. one Nicolas Canon of Eye was brought before the bishop of Norwich for suspition of hereste, with certain witnesses sworne to depose against him touching his maners and conuersation, which witnesses appointing one William Chillopher to speake in the name of them all, he deposed in maner and forme following.

First, that on Easter day, when all the parishioners went about the church of Eye solemnly in procession, as the manner was, the said Nicolas Canon as it were mocking and deriding the other parishioners, went about the church the contrarie way, and met the procession.

This article he confessed, and affirmed that he thought he did well in so doing. Depositions.

Item, the said Nicolas asked of master John Colman of Eye, this question: Master Colman, what thinke you of the sacrament of the altar? To whom the said Colman answered: Nicolas, I thinke that the sacrament of the altar is very God and very man, the very flesh and very blood of our Lord Iesus Christ vnder the fourme of bread and wine. Unto whom Nicolas in derision said: Truly if the sacrament of the altar be very God and very man, and the very body and blood of our Lord Iesu Christ, then may very God and very man be put in a small trome; as when it is in the priests mouth, that receiueth it at masse. And why may not wee simple men, as well eat flesh vpon fridaies, and all other prohibited daies, as the priest to eat the flesh, and drinke the blood of our Lord euery day indifferently? The which article, the said Nicolas denieth that he spake vnto master Colman, but vnto a monke of Hatcleneye: and furthermore, he thought he had spoken well in that behalfe. If the sacrament be very flesh, then the priests eat flesh on Friday.

Item, that on Corpus Christi day, at the elenation of high masse, when all the parishioners and other strangers kneeled downe, holding vp their handes, and doing reuerence vnto the sacrament, the said Nicolas went behinde a piller of the church, and turning his face from the high altar, mocked them that did reuerence vnto the sacrament.

This article he also acknowledging, affirmed that he beleeued himselfe to doe well in so doing.

Item, when his mother would haue the said Nicolas to lift vp his right hand, and to crosse himselfe from the crafts and assaults of the diuell, forsomuch as he deferred the doing thereof, his mother tooke vp his right hand and crossed him, saying: In nomine patris, filij, & spiritus sancti, Amen. Which ended, the said Nicolas immediatly deriding his mothers blessing, take vp his right hand of his own accord, and blessed him otherwise, as his aduersaries report of him. This article the said Nicolas acknowledged to be true.

Item, that vpon Allhallowe day, in the time of elenation of high masse, when as many of the parishioners of Eye lighted many torches, and carried them vp to the high altar, kneeling downe there in reuerence and honor of the sacrament, the said Nicolas carrying a torch, went vp hard to the high altar, and standing behind the priests back saying masse, at the time of the elenation he stood vpright vpon his feet, turning his back to the priest, and his face toward the people, and would doe no reuerence vnto the sacrament. This article he acknowledged, affirming that he thought he had done well in that behalfe. All which articles the bishops commissary caused to be copied out word for word, and to be sent vnto master William Worsted, prior of the cathedrall church of Norwich and to other doctors of Diuinity of the order of begging friers, that they might deliberate vpon them, and shew their mindes betweene that and thursday next following. Upon which thursday, being the last of November, the yere aforesaid, the said Nicolas was againe examined before master Barnam and diuers other, vpon two other articles which he had confessed vnto J. Erpeto notary, and Tho. Scrusten bachelor of Diuinity, and others. Thereof the first article was this: that the said Nicolas Canon being of perfit mind and remembrance, confessed that he doubted whether in the sacrament of the altar were the very body of Christ or no. This article he confessed before the commissary to be true. Nicolas Canon turned his backe to the sacrament. Another examination of Nicolas Canon.

Item, that he being of perfit mind and remembrance, beleeued that a man ought not to confesse his sinnes to a priest. This article he also confessed that he doubted vpon. Articles obiected.

Now remaineth to declare what these doctors aforesaid concluded vpon the articles: whose answere vnto the same was this.

First of all, as touching the first article, they said that the article in the same termes as it was propounded, is not simply an hereste, but an error. The iudgement of the priest and doctors vpon the articles.

Item, as touching the second article, the doctors agree as in the first.

Item, as touching the third article, they affirme that it is an hereste.

Unto the fourth article, they answered as vnto the first and second. An hereste to doubt whether

Item, the doctors affirme the fifth article to be an hereste. Item, the Sacrament be the perfect bodie of Christ or no.

Item, as touching the sixth article, the doctors conclude, that if the said Nicolas being of perfect mind and remembrance, did doubt whether the Sacrament of the altar were the verie perfect bodie of Christ or no, then the article is simplie an hereste.

Nicolas Canon declared an hereticke.

Whereupon the said Commissarie declared and pronounced the said Nicolas Canon vpon the determination of the foresaid doctors, to be an heretike, and thereupon forced the said Nicolas to abiure all the said articles. That done, he enioyned the said Nicolas penance for his offences, thæ displings about the cloister of the cathedrall church of Norwich, before a solemne procession, bare headed and bare foote, carrying a taper of halfe a pound in his hand, going after the manner aforesaid, like a mere penitentiarie: the which his penance, the iudge commanded should be respited vntill the comming of the bishop into his diocesse, and that in the meane time he should be kept in prison, to the end that he should not infect the flock with his venime and poison of errors and hereseles.

Penance enioyned to Nicolas Canon.

Thus haue we briefly discoursed vnto you, the great troubles and afflictions, which happened in Norfolke and Suffolke by the space of those foure yeres before mentioned, hauing ysaunce out briefly for euerie yere, certaine notable examples, sufficient for the declaration of all the rest, for so much as their opinions being nothing different, their penance and punishment did also nothing differ, otherwise then by those particular examples may be plainly seene.

Thomas Bagley priest, martyr.

AND now to proceed as we haue begun with our former stories, generally we find in Fabians chronicles, that in the same yere of our Lord 1431. Thomas Bagley a priest, vicar of Honenden beside Malden, being a valiant disciple, and adherent of Wickliffe, was condemned by the bishops of hereste at London about the middest of Lent, and was degraded and burned in Smithfield.

THe same yere also was Paul Craw a Bohemian taken at Saint Andrewes by the bishop Henrie, and deliuered ouer to the secular power to be burnt, for holding contrarie opinions vnto the church of Rome touching the Sacrament of the Lords supper, the worshipping of Saints, auricular confession, with other of Wickliffes opinions.

✠ The storie of Thomas Rhedon, a French man, and a Carmelite frier, burnt in Italie for the profession of Christ.

Thomas Rhedonensis, martyr. Ex Antonino. 3. part. hist. fol. 165.

WE haue declared before, how this cruell storme of persecution which first began with vs in England, after it had long raged here against many good and godly men, it brake out and passed into Bohemie, and after within a short time, the fire of this persecution increasing by little and little, inuaded Scotland, and from thence now with greater force and violence, this furious deuouring flame hath entred Italy, and suffereth not any part of the world to be free from the murther and slaughter of most good and godly men. It hapned about this time, that one Thomas Rhedon, a frier of that sect, which taketh his name of the mount Carmelus, by chance came with the Venetian ambalsadors into Italy. This man although he was of that sort and sect, which in stead of Christians, are called Carmelites, yet was he of a far other religion, and vnderstood the word of God, iudging, that God ought not to be worshipped, neither in that mount, nor at Jerusalem only, but in spirit and truth. This man being a true Carmelite, and sauouring with his whole hart that new sweet musse of Jesus Christ, firth earnest study and desire seeking after a christian integritie of life, prepared himselfe first to go into Italy, trusting that he should find there, or else in no place, some, by whose good life and fruing he might be edified and instructed. For there ought more abundance of vertue and godliuing to be, then in that place, which is counted to be the fort and fountaine of all religion? And how could it otherwise be, but that where as so great holines is professed, thereupon all mens eyes are bent, as vpon a stage, where as Saint Peters seate is, and is thought to be the ruler and gouernour of all the church, all things should flourish and abound worthie of so great expectation in that place? This holy man hauing these things before his eyes, and considering the same with himselfe, forsooke his owne countrie and citie, and went into Rome, conceiuing a firme and sure hope, that by the example of so many notable and worthie men, he should greatly profit in godlines and learning: but the successe of the matter did bitterly frustrate his hope, for all things were cleane contrarie. Whatsoeuer he saw, was nothing else but more dissimulation and hypocrisie. In stead of gold, he found nothing but coales: and for to say the truth, he found nothing else there but gold and siluer. In stead of heauenly gifts, there raigned amongst them the pompe and pride of the world. In place of godlines, riot. In stead of learning and studie, slothfulnes and superstition. Tyrannie and hautinesse of mind had possessed the place of apostolike simplicitie: that now there remained no more any place or liberte for a man to learne that which he knew not, or to teach that which he perfectly vnderstood. Finally, all things were turned arse ward, all things hapned vnto him contrarie to his expectation wheresoeuer he went. But nothing so much offended this good mans mind, as the intolerable ambition, and pompous pride in them, whom example of humilitie should especially commend and praise to the whole world. And albeit that he saw here nothing, which did accord and agree with the rule of the Apostles: yet these things did so much passe all measure and patience, that he could by no meanes refraine his tongue in so great abuse and corruption of the church, seeing such ambitious pride in their buildings, apparell, in their palaces, in their daintie fare, in their great traines of seruants, in their horse and armour, and finally in all things pertaining vnto them. Which things, how much they did varie from the prescript rule of the Gospell, so much the more was this good man forced to speake. Albeit he did well vnderstand how little he should preuaile by speaking: for if admonition would profit any thing at all, the bookes of Wickliffe and diuers other were not wanting. The famous testimonies of John Hus, and of Jerome of Prage, and their blood shed for the same, was yet present before their eyes: at those most effectuall exhortations, they were sklitt scarred and amended, that they seemed twice more cruell then they were before. But all this could not feare this good man, but that in sonecessarie and wholesome an office, he would spend his life if need should be. So by this meanes, he which came to be a scholar vnto others, was now forced to be their teacher. And he which determined to follow other mens liues: maners had now contrarie set before them his life to be marked and followed. For he lined so amongst them, that his life might be a rule vnto them all, and so taught, as he might also be their schoolemaster. For euen as Paul had foreshewed vnto such as should be forced to line godly in Christ, that they should suffer persecution, such like reward happed vnto this man. He gaue vnto them the fruit of godlinesse, which they should follow: they againe set vpon his head the diademe of martyrdome. He shewed them the way to saluation, and they for the benefit of life rewarded him death: and whereas no rewards had been worthie for his great labours and trauels, they with most extreame ignominie persecuted him euen vnto the fire. For when as by continuall preaching he had gotten great enuie and hatred, the rulers began to consult together, by what meanes they might circumuent this mans life. Where they had recourse to their accustomed remedies: for it is a peculiar and continuall custome amongst the prelats of the church, that if any man did displease them, or that his talke be not according to their mind, or by any meanes hurtfull, or a hinderance to their lucre and gaine, by and by they staine out articles of some hereste, which they charge him withall. And like as euery liuing thing hath his peculiar and proper weapon to defend himselfe from harme, as nature hath armed the Boze with his tuskes, the Hedghog with his pricklies, the Lion is feared for his clawes, the Dog for his biting, the Bull fighteth with his hornes, neither doth the Asse lacke his houes to strike withall: euen so this is the only armour of the bishops, to strangle a man with hereste, if he once go about to mutter against their will and ambition: which thing may be easily perceiued and seene in this most holy man, before a great number of other. Who, when as now he began to ware grieuous vnto them, and could no longer be suffered: what did they? straight waies flie vnto their old policies, and as they had done with Hus, and Jerome of Prage, euen so went they about to padle against this man. They ouerwhelme him with suspition, they seeke to intangle him with questions, they examine him in iudgement, they compile articles against him, and lay hereste vnto his charge, they condemne him as an heretike, and being so condemned, they destroy and kill him. This was their godlines: this was the peaceable order of those Carmelites. Whose religion was to weare no sword nor shield, notwithstanding, they did beare in their hearts malice, rancour, bengeance, poison, craft and deceit, sharper then any sword. With how great care and policie is it prouided by law, that none of these clergie men should fight with sword in the streets? when as in iudgement and accusations (where as it is not lawfull for a man to oppresse his brother) there is no murtherer which hath more readie bengeance, or that doth more vilely esteeme his brothers soule then they. They shed no blod themselues, they strike not, nor kill, but they deliuer them ouer vnto others to be slaine. What difference is there I pray you, but that they are the authors, and the other are but the ministers of the cruell fact: they kill no man as murtherers do. How then? Although not after the same sort, yet they do it by another meane.

Poperic armed with policie, and defended with tyrannie.

His articles.

The articles which they falsely gathered against this man, are affirmed by some to be these.

That the church lacketh reformation, and that it shall be punished and reformed.

That Infidels, Jewes, Turkes, and Paynes, shall be conuerted vnto Christ in the latter daies.

That abominations are vsed at Rome.

That the vniust excommunication of the pope is not to be feared: and those which do not obserue the same, do not sinne or offend.

But yet there lacked a minister for these articles: albeit he could not long be wanting at Rome, where all things are to be sold, euen mens soules. For this office and ministerie, there was no man thought more meete, then William of Rouen, cardinall of Saint Sixtus in the mount, Vicechancellor of the court of Rome. Eugenius at that time was pope, who had a little before succeded pope Martin aboue mentioned. Before the which Eugenius, this godly Rhedonensis the Frenchman, was brought, and from thence sent into prison. And against after his imprisonment, and diuers and sundrie grieuous torments, he was brought before the Iudges. The Wolfe sate in iudgement, the lambe was accused. Why? because he had troubled the spring: But here need not many words. This good Thomas, not being able to resist the malice of these mightie potentates, had offended enough, and was easily conuict and condemned to be burned, but in such sort, as first of all he should be depriued of all such degrées as he had taken of priesthood: For it is counted an vnlawfull thing, that a priest should be punished with prophane punishment, whenas notwithstanding it is lawfull enough for priests to put any lay man to death, be he neuer so guiltlesse.

Eu. Antonin. 3. part. hist. fol. 165. W. Cardinalis Rhotomagensis his persecution. Thomas Rhedonensis brought before pope Eugenius.

How religiousllie and earnestly do they foresee, that the maiestie of priestly dignitie should not in any case be hurt? But how little care haue they, that their consciences be not hurt with false iudgements, and oppressing the guiltlesse? Wherefore, before that he should come vnto punishment, this good man must be degraded. The order and maner of this popish degrading, is partly before touched in the storie of Williams Taylor, fol. 606.

Thomas degraded.

After that it had pleased the bishops to degrade this man from the degrées wherewith before they had consecrated him, and thought not that sufficient, by and by after they deprined him of his life also, and burned him foure yéres after that he came to Rome. In the yéere of our Lord, 1436.

Thomas Rhedonensis a Frenchman, burned at Rome.

❧ The burning of Thomas Rhedonensis.

And thus through the cruelty of these most tyrannous prelats, this blessed martyr died. Albeit it is not to be thought that he died, but made a losse of this bodie, for a greater gaine of saluation, before the iust iudgement of God: Neither is it to be doubted, but that he liueth eternally vnder the altar with them, whose blod the Lord will reuenge, peraduenture to some for some of them, whom the earth hath here so long holden vnpunished.

As this Thomas aboue said suffered at Rome, so were diuers other in other places about Germanie executed neere about the same time, after the burning of John Hus: as Henrie Stumfelder priest, Henrie Kadrger priest, Iohn Drackenbarde priest, Peter Throaw, Matthew Hager minister. Pope Eugenius the fourth.

Henrie Stumfelder priest. Henrie Kadrger priest. Iohn Drackenbarde priest. Peter Throaw. Matthew Hager minister.

After the death of pope Martine, who raigned fourtéene yéares, succéeded Eugenius, the fourth of that name, about the yére of our Lord 1431. Of whom Antoninus thus writeth, that he was much giuen to warres, as may well declare his conflicts and fighting with the Romans: also the battels betweene the Venetians and the Florentines.

This pope began first to celebrate the councell of Basill, which councell Martine his predecessour had before intended, according to the institution of the councell of Constance. Notwithstanding, the said Eugenius perceiuing afterward, this councell of Basill not to fauour him and his doings, and fearing some detriment to come to him by the same, afterward laboured by all subtill practise to dissolue and interrupt the said councell, and from Basill to translate it first to Ferraria, then to Florentia, more néere to his owne sée of Rome. Concerning the which councell of Basill, for so much as we haue begun héere to make mention, it shall be no great digression out of the way, to discourse something thereof (the Lord so permitting) more at large, so much as for the most principall matters thereof shall séeme sufficient or necessarie to be knowne.

¶ Here followeth the order and maner of the councell of Basill, touching the principall matters concluded therin, briefly collected and abridged here in this present booke: the rest whereof we haue referred vnto our former edition, wherein the full discourse of the whole disputation is to be seene more at large, for such as haue list and leasure to see more therof.

IN the thirtie ninth session of the councell of Constance (as is before mentioned, page 547.) it was decred and prouided concerning the order and times of such generall councels as should hereafter follow. The first that should next ensue, to be kept the fifth yere after the said councell of Constance: The second to be holden the seuenth yere after that, and so orderly all other to follow successiuely from ten yére to ten yére. Wherefore, according to this decrée, followed a generall councell, fiue yéres after the councell of Constance, celebrate and holden at Sene, vnder pope Martine, an. 1424. but it soone broke vp. After the which councell, the terme of seuen yéres being expired, another councell was holden at Basill, in the yere of our Lord 1431. The which councell is noted to haue béen the most troublesome, and to haue endured longer then anie other councel before time celebrate and holden in the church. This councell continued almost the space of fourtéene yéeres: wherein it was concluded, as before in the councell of Constance, that the generall councels were aboue the pope, and both of these two councels did attribute the chiefe authoritie in decréeing and determining vnto the generall councell: which is the cause that the contrarie part doth derogat so much from the authoritie of this present councell.

The councell of Basill. Ex Aenea Silvio. Ex Cocleo in hist. Hussi. Ex eu peralipom. Abbat. Vrsperg.

When as pope Martine the fifth had appointed Iulian, cardinall and deacon of Saint Angell, his legat, to celebrate and hold a generall councell at Basill for the reformation of the church, and rooting out of heresies, within short space after pope Martine died, in whose seat Eugenius the fourth succeeded, who confirmed vnto the said cardinall Iulian, the same authoritie which his predecessour before had giuen him. Vnto this councell of Basill being begun, came the emperour Sigismund, who during his life time, with his presence and authoritie, did protect and defend the said Synode. After the emperors death, pope Eugenius altering his former mind and purpose, would transport the councell vnto Bononie, and thereby hindred the successe of the councell of Basill. And first he held a contrarie councell at Ferraria, and afterward at Florence: For after the death of the emperor Sigismund, there were no princes or noble men, that had any care or regard of the councell. Eugenius the pope pretended causes, as touching the Greekes, which should come vnto the councell, and the vniting of their church vnto the West church, the which Greekes would in no wise passe the Alpes: Also as touching his owne incommoditie, that he could not come vnto Basill, being so long a iourney, and that all his men might haue easie accesse vnto Bononia, and that amongst the Germains (which in their owne countrie are so intractable) nothing can be attempted for their reformation: whereupon he citedcardinall Iulian, and the fathers of the councel vnto Bononia, vnder great penalitie. They againe cited the pope, that either he should come himselfe vnto the councell, or send Ambassadors vnder the like penalitie. For this cause the ambassadours of Albert king of the Romaines and of the other princes of Germanie, assembled together first at Norenberge, and when as they could determine nothing there, they assembled againe at Frankford, to appeale the dissention betweene the councell and the pope: for it was thought, that the Electours of the empire might best assemble and meet in that place. In the meane time the emperours ambassadours, and the ambassadours of the Electors, went vnto Basill, and hauing conference with the ambassadours of the others princes which were there, they did earnestly exhort the fathers of the councell, that they would embrace and receiue the bnitie, which they would offer. The requeste of the princes was, was, that the fathers would transport the councell, and go vnto another place: the which only thing pope Eugenius feared alwaies to seeke and desire, that thereby he might either diuide the fathers of the councell, or take away their libertie.

Dissention betweene the councell of Basill, and pope Eugenius.

The prelats of the councell refused the popes request.

Notwithstanding, this sacred Synode thought good neither to denie the princes requeste, nor to grant that which pope Eugenius required. During this doubt, the emperours ambassadours, the bishops of Iadatania and Augusta, (being much required and sturred thereunto) appointed a noble and valiant baron called Conrade Weinsperge, by the kings commandement, to be protector and defender of the councell, and the fathers. Whereby as the enemies perceiued the emperours minde to be alienate from the pope, so the fathers of the councell vnderstood his good will towards them, for so much as he would not haue sent them a protector, if he had not iudged it a lawfull councell: neither againe would he haue iudged it a councell in Basill, if he had giuen credit to pope Eugenius. But by meanes of a great pestilence which began to grow, the assemblie that should haue béen holden at Frankford, was transported vnto Wentz. The ambassadors of the princes also thought good to go thither, if they might find any meanes of vnitie, wherebey they might vnite and knit the pope againe vnto the councell.

The princes assembled at Wentz, to make vnitie betweene the councel and the pope.

The assemblie was verie famous: for there were present the archbishops of Wentz, Collen, and Treuers, Electours of the sacred empire, and all the ambassadours of the other Electours. Notwithstanding, the archbishop of Collen was the chiefe fauourer of the councell in this assemblie, who with all his labour and diligence went about to bring the matter vnto a godend. Rabanus the archbishop of Treuers shewed himselfe somewhat more rough. The sacred Synode also thought good to send thither their ambassadours, and appointed out the Patriarke of Aquileia, the bishop of Vicene, and the bishop of Argen: diuinea, Iohn Segouius, and Thomas de Corcellis, with diuers others. There was no man there present which would name himselfe the ambassadour of Eugenius: Albeit there were many of his fauourers and friends come thither, both from the councell, and also out of Florence, the which albeit they had sworne to the contrarie, yet fauoured they more Eugenius then the councell. But the chiefe Hercules of all the Eugenians, was Nicolas Cusanus, a man singularly well learned, and of great experience. After diuers consultations had, the Electours of the empire, and the ambassadours of the other princes of Germanie, thought good to giue out commandement throughout their whole nation and countrie, that the Decrees of the councell of Basill should be receiued and obserued.

Whilest these things were thus debated at Wentz, there sprang a certaine verie doubtfull question amongst the diuines which remained at Basill, whether Eugenius might be called an heretike, which had so rebellioully contemned the commandements of the church. Hereupon they gathered themselues together, disputing long amongst themselues, some affirming, and other some holding the negatiue part. Vpon this their disputation, there arose three seuerall opinions, some affirming that he was an heretike, othersome, not only an heretike, but also a relapse. The third sort would neither grant him to be an heretike nor a relapse. Amongst these Diuines, the chiefe and principall both in learning and authoritie, was the bishop of Ebzun, ambassadour of the king of Castile, and a certaine Scottish abbat: which, as two most valiant champions, subdued all their enemies, so that all the rest did either consent vnto their arguments, or gaue place vnto them, and so their determination take place, and Eugenius was pronounced both an heretike and relapse. Eight conclusions were there determined and allowed amongst the Diuines, which they called verities: the copie whereof they did diuulgate throughout all christendome.

Three opinions touching the pope.

The death of pope Martin. Pope Eugenius the fourth.

When the ambassadours of the councell were returned from Wentz, and that certaine report was made of the allowing of their decrées, the fathers of the councell thought good to discusse the conclusions of the diuines more at large. Whereupon by the commandement of the deputies, all the masters and doctors and clergie, were called together, with all the residue of the prelats, into the Chapterhouse of the great church, there openly to dispute and discusse Eugenius heresie. The which thing sore grieued the bishop of Millaine, fearing lest this disputation would worke the deposition of Eugenius, the which, as he said, he had alwaies letted for feare of a schisme. Wherefore he called not by all manner of waies to labour, to stop and trouble the matter, exhorting them that were absent by his letters, and encouraging those that were present by his words, to the defence of Eugenius. But at the last, there was a great assemblie in the Chapterhouse, some comming thither to dispute, and othersome to heare. This disputation continued fiue daies, both forenoone and afternoone, amongst whom cardinall Lodouicus archbishop Arelatensis, was appointed as Iudge and Arbiter of the whole disputation: who beside many other notable vertues, was both valiant and constant. Nicolas Amici, which was also a proctor of the faith, a famous man amongst the diuines of Paris, demanded of euery man what their opinion was. Iohn Deinleffil, publike Notarie, wrote euery mans sentence and iudgement. The conclusions of the Diuines which were the ground and foundation of their disputation, were these héere following.

Conclusions of the disputation.

1 It is a veritie of the catholike faith, that the sacred generall councell hath power ouer the pope, or any other prelate.

2 The pope cannot by his owne authoritie, either dissolue, transport, or prorogue the generall councell being lawfully congregate, without the whole consent of the councell: and this is of like veritie.

3 He which doth obstinately resist these verities, is to be counted an heretike.

4 Pope Eugenius the fourth hath resisted these verities, when as at the first, by the fulnesse of his Apostolike power he attempted to dissolue or to transport the councell of Basill.

5 Eugenius being admonished by the sacred councell, did recant the errors repugnant to these verities.

6 The dissolution or translation of the councell attempted the second time by Eugenius, is against the forsaid verities, and containeth an inexcusable error touching the faith.

7 Eugenius in going about to dissolue and transport the councell againe, is fallen into his before reuoked errors.

8 Eugenius being warned by the Synode, that he should reuoke the dissolution or translation the second time attempted: after that his contumacie was declared, persuering in his rebellion, and erecting a councell at Ferraria, shewed himselfe thereby obstinate.

These were the conclusions which were read in the Chapterhouse before the fathers of the councell. Vpon the which, when they were desired to speake their minds, they all in a manner, conformed and allowed them. Notwithstanding, Panormitane archbishop disputed much against them. Likewise did the bishop of Burgen the king of Aragons Almoner. Yet did they not gainsay the three first conclusions, but only those wherein pope Eugenius was touched. This Panormitane as he was subtill, so did he subtilly dispute against the last conclusions, indeuouring himselfe to declare that Eugenius was not relapsed, and had great contention with the bishop of Argens, John Segouius, and Francis de Fure, Diuines. He diuided the articles of the faith into three sorts: Frailty, as in the Creed: largely, as in the declarations made by the church: most largely of all, as in those things which rise of the premisses; affirming, that Eugenius did by no meanes violate his faith in his first dissolution that he made, because it is not contained in the Creed, neither yet in the determinations of the church, that the pope cannot dissolue the councell: and that it séemeth not vnto him to rise of the determinations before made, but rather of the decrées of the councell of Constance. And further, that this, as a case omitted, is reserued for the pope to be discussed, for so much as in the chapter beginning Frequens, it appeareth that the place where the councell should be kept, ought to be chosen by the pope, the councell allowing the same, and nothing is thereof at all spoken. And if peraduenture Eugenius had offended in the first dissolution, notwithstanding he ought to be holden excused, because he did it by the councell of the cardinals, representing the church of Rome: whose authoritie hee said to be such, that the iudgement thereof should be preferred before all the world. Neither had there béen any sacred councell found to haue proceded against Eugenius as an heretike, and that is an euident signe, that the councell hath not thought him to haue swarued from the faith, neither to haue any occasion that he should be called heretike for his errors reuoked: and that he himselfe hath read the whole text, that the pope did not reuoke the dissolution as contrarie vnto the faith, but as hauing offence: Also that the last dissolution hath no such cause in it, for so much as likewise he had done it by the councell of the cardinals, and for the vniting of the Greekes, that he might not be compelled in a criminall cause, to answere by his procuratas, when as he being letted by sickenesse, could not come personally. So, for as much as in the first dissolution Eugenius hath fallen into no errour of faith, he cannot be perswaded that he can be called a relapse, for so much as he neither in the first, neither yet in the second dissolution did violate his faith.

Panormitane preferreth the iudgement of the cardinals of Rome, before all the world.

This Oration of Panormitane was more praised then allowed of all men. Notwithstanding, this effect it wrought, that afterward this word relapse was taken out of the conclusions, and in stead thereof this word prolapse put in. Neither durst Panormitane himselfe, altogether excuse Eugenius of heresie, but defended more the first dissolution, then the second: yet departed he not without anchore: for John Segouius an expert Diuine, rising vp, answered him concernly as was comely for such a prelat. He said, he granted that which Panormitane had spoken touching the diuision of the Articles of the faith into three points, for because it made for his purpose. For if those things are to be holden for articles of faith, said he, which may be gathered of the determinations of the Church, it were manifest that the conclusions whereupon we now contend, redound and come of the determinations of the Church: that is to say, of the councell of Constance: for, if therein the pope be made subiect vnto the generall councell, who is it that will say that the pope hath power ouer the councell which is aboue him: or that Eugenius ought to remaine pope, because hee could not dissolue the councell which is aboue him, without the consent thereof? The which article vndoubtedly, he hath violate and broken. And if any man will say that in the first dissolution this article was not violate, because there was no declaration made thereof, let him which so thinketh, thus vnderstand: that the bishop of Rome ought not onely to know the plaine and manifest, but also the secret and hidden things of the faith; for hee being the vicar of Christ, and the head of all other, ought to instruct and teach all men. But if so be hee will not, then hee shall be constrained for being head, because hee continued long in the dissolution after the declaration of the councell, neither did consent vnto the determination of the church; and therefore, if peraduenture hee did not erre in the faith, in dissoluing of the councell, yet did he erre in persuering in the same, as it manifestly appeareth by the saying of Clement oftentimes alleaged by Panormitan, wherein it is said, that hee which liueth rebellionsly, and neglecteth to doe good, is rather a member of the diuell then of Christ, and rather an infidell then a true beleeuer: so that Eugenius by disobeying the church, may worthily be called an infidell. Neither is it true that the pope hath not offended in the faith: For sith much, as well in that am where which beginneth Cogetanti, as also in the answ re which beginneth Speranz, made vnto the popes ambassadours, these words are manifest: this article concerneth faith, and wee had rather die then through cowardlines to giue place. By the which saying it is euident, the Synode to haue sufficiently admitted the pope that hee did against the faith, and therefore if he erred p afterward when as Eugenius reuoked the dissolution, hee also reuoked the errour of faith contained in the same. There are also diuers offences spring and risen through the errour of faith: for some say that the pope is vnder the councell, other some deny it, and this diuersitie of doctrine bringeth offence. Also it is expedite against the authorite of the councell, that the pope did reuoke the affections made in their name.

And albeit in such reuocations, the stile and order of iudgements is not obserued, notwithstanding it doth suffice in such case, when as the councell doth proceede against the pope, in which case onely the truth is to bee obserued, neither is the councell subiect vnto any positiue law, that it ought to obserue any ceremonies or iudicall orders. Also hee said that he vtterly condemned that singular glose which did preserue the pope before all the world, so that it might well be calle d singular, which decreed so foolish and fond things and vnworthie to be followed of any man: and that he did much marueil of Panormitane, and other Doctors of those daies, which wished they were about to extoll the authority of the glosses, do abase the same by adding a singularity thereto: for that glosse is singular which is alone. But who would not more esteeme a glosse constantly written and agreeable in all places, then that which in any one place teacheth any thing which may seeme to bee an errour; and that as touching the verity and truth? Saint Hyerome a graue and ancient Doctor is contrary to this glosse, who doubteth nothing at all but that the words as touching authority, is aboue the city it selfe, that is to say, Rome.

Segouius could scarcely saith this his Oration without interruption; for Panormitane oftentimes interrupting him, went about to confute now this and now that reason. Whereupon the bishop of Argen rising vp, a man not onely eloquent, but also of a stout courage, troubled Panormitane in his reasons and arguments, and put him from his purpose: yet they proceeded so farre, that they passed the manor of disputation, and did not abstaine from opprobrious taunts.

When the bishop of Argen chanced to say that the bishop of Rome ought to be the minister of the church, Panormitane could not suffer that: insomuch that hee so forgot himselfe that day, and his knowledge (which other wise was great) did so faile him, that he was not ashamed to say and affirme, that the pope was lord ouer the church. Whom Segouius answered: Marke (saith hee) O Panormitane, what thou saiest: for this is the most honourable title of the bishop of Rome, wherein he calleth himselfe the seruant of the seruants of God. Which is gathered vp in this point, when as Christ said vnto his disciples, when they demanded of him which of them was the greatest, you know hee answered them: The princes of the people haue rule and dominion ouer them, but amongst you it is not so, &c. Wherein hee doth vtterly prohibite lordship and dominion: and Peter which was the first vicar of Christ, saith: Feede the flocke of Christ which is committed vnto you, prouiding for them not by compulsion, but to liuing in. And immediately after hee said, not as lords ouer the clergie. For if Christ the Sonne of God came not to bee ministred vnto, but to minister and to serue, how then can his vicar haue any dominion or bee called lord, as you Panormitane will affirme? forsomuch as the disciple is not aboue his master, nor the seruant aboue his lord. And the Lord himselfe saith: Ye are not called masters, forsomuch as your only master is Christ, and he which is the greatest among you shall be your seruant. Panormitane being somewhat disquieted with this answere, the councell brake vp and departed.

The next day, there was a generall congregation, and they return. d all againe vnto the chapter house after dinner, where as the archbishop of Lions, the kings Orator being required to speake his mind, after he had by diuers and sundrie reasons proued Eugenius to be an heretike, he bitterly complained, detesting the negligence and ignauie of those that had preferred such a man vnto the papacie, and so moued all their hearts which were present, that they altogether with him did bewaile the calamities of the vniuersall church.

Then the bishop of Bergen, the ambassadour of Spaine, diuided the conclusions into two parts, some he called generall, and otherwhile personall, disputing very excellently as touching the three first conclusions, affirming that he did in no point doubt of them, but only þ the addition which made mention of the faith, seemed to be doubtfull vnto him. But vpon this point he staied much, to proue, that the councell was aboue the pope. The which after he had sufficiently proued both by Gods law and mans law, he taught it also by physicall reason, alledging Aristotle for witnesse. He said, that in euery well ordered kingdome, it ought specially to be decreed, that the whole realme should bee of more authority then the king; which if it happened contrary, it were not to bee called a kingdome, but a tyrannie: so likewise doth he thinke of the church, that it ought to be of more authority then the prince thereof, that is to say, the pope. The which his Oration hee vttered so eloquently, learnedly, and truely, that all men depended vpon him, and desired rather to haue him continue his Oration, then to haue an end thereof.

But when as he entred into the other conclusions, hee seemed to haue forgotten himselfe, and to bee no more the same man that he was: for neither was there the same eloquence in his words, neither grauity in oration, or constantnes of countenance, so that if he could haue seene himselfe, he would peraduenture greatly haue marualled at himselfe. Euery man might well see and perceiue then the power and force of the truth, which ministred copy of matter vnto him, so long as he spake in the defence thereof. But when as hee began once to speake against her, she tooke away euen his naturall eloquence from him. Notwithstanding Panormitane, and the bishop of Bergen, shewed this example of modestie, that albeit they would not confesse or grant the last conclusions to bee verities of faith: yet they would not that any man should follow or leane vnto their opinion, which were but meane diuines; but rather vnto the opinions of the diuines. But the king of Arragons Anner, being a subtill and craftie man, did not directly dispute vpon the conclusions, but picking out here and there certaine arguments, sought to let and hinder the councell. Against whom, an abbat of Scotland, a man of an excellent wit, disputed very much: and Thomas de Torcellis, a famous Diuine, alledged much against him out of the decrees of the sacred councell, with a certaine modell shamefastnes, alwaies beholding the ground, did very largely dispute in the defence of the conclusions.

But now to auoid tediousnes, I will onely proceed to declare arguments, whereby the conclusions were ratified and confirmed not minding to intreate of the fiue last conclusions, which concerne the person of Eugenius, but onely vpon the three first, whereunto I will adioyne certaine probable arguments, gathered out of the disputation of the fathers. In the first conclusion is the greatest force, and first to be discussed: touching the which, two things are to be required, and examined. The one, whether the generall councell haue authority ouer the pope. The other, whether the catholike faith commandeth it to be beleeued. As touching that the pope is subiect to the generall councell, it is excellently well proued by the reason before alledged, by the bishop of Bergen. For the pope is in the church, as a king in his kingdome: and for a king to be of more authority then his kingdome, it were too absurd: Ergo, neither ought the pope to bee aboue the church. For like as oftentimes kings which doe wickedly gouerne the common wealth, and exercise cruelty, are deprined of their kingdomes; euen so it is not to bee doubted, but that the bishops of Rome may be deposed by the church, that is to say, by the generall councels.

Neither do I herein allow them, which attribute so ample and large authority vnto kings, that they will not haue them bound vnder any lawes: for such as so doe say, bee but flatterers, which doe talke otherwise then they thinke. For albeit that they doe say that the moderation of the law is alway in the princes power: that doe I thus vnderstand, that when as reason shall perswade, he ought to digresse from the rigour of the law: for he is called a king, which careth and prouideth for the common wealth; taketh pleasure in the commodity and profit of the subiects, and in all his doings hath respect to the commodities of those, ouer whom he ruleth: which if he doe not, he is not to be counted a king, but a tyrant, whose property it is only to seeke his owne profit: for in this point a king differeth from a tyrant, that the one seeketh the commodity and profit of those whom he ruleth, and the other onely his owne. The which to make more manifest, the cause is also to be alledged, wherefore kings were ordained.

At the beginning (as Cicero in his Offices saith) it is certaine, that there was a certaine time when as the people liued without kings. But afterward, when lands and possessions began to be deuided according to the custome of euery nation, then were kings ordained for no other cause, but only to exercise iustice. For when as at the beginning, the common people were oppressed by rich and mighty men, they ranne by and by to some good and vertuous man, which should defend the poore from iniurie, and ordaine lawes, wherevnto the rich and poore might dwell together. But when as yet vnder the rule of kings, the poore were oftentimes oppressed, lawes were ordained and instituted, the which should iudge neither for hatred nor fauour, and giue like eare vnto the poore as vnto the rich: whereby we do vnderstand and know, not only the people, but also the king to be subiect to the lawes. For if we do see a king to contemne and despise the lawes, violently rob and spoile his subiects, deflowre virgins, dishonest matrones, and doe all things licentiously and temerariously: do not the nobles of the kingdome assemble together, depose him from his kingdome, set vp another in his place, which shall sweare to rule and gouerne vprightly, and be obedient vnto the lawes? Verily as reason doth perswade, euen so doth þ vse thereof also teach vs. It seemeth also agreeable vnto reason, that the same should be done in the church, that is to say, in the councell, which is done in any kingdome. And so is this sufficiently apparent, which we haue before said, that the pope is subiect vnto the councell.

But now to passe vnto the arguments of Diuinitie, the foundation of the matter which we do intreate vpon, are the words of our Sauiour Iesus Christ in diuers places, but especiallie where as he speaketh vnto Peter: Tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam, & portæ inferni non præualebunt aduersus eam: that is, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke will I build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it. Vpon which words it seemeth good to begin this disputation, for so much as some were wont to alleage these words, to ertoll the authoritie of the bishop of Rome. But (as it shall by and by appeare) the words of Christ had another sense and meaning then diuers of them do thinke, for by saith: and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it. Verilie this is a great pramise, and these words of the Lord are of great importance. For what greater word could there haue been spoken, then that the gates of hell should not preuaile against the Church? These gates of hell, as Saint Hyerome saith, doe signifie sinnes. Wherefore if sinnes cannot preuaile against the Church, neither can any maligne spirits preuaile against the same, which haue no power at all ouer mankind, but only through sinne. And for that cause, where as it is said in Iob, that there is no power vpon the earth that may be compared vnto the power of the maligne spirit, where by it followeth that the power of the Church is aboue all other power.

We may also vpon the same saying, reason after another sort: for so much as the gates of hell, that is to say, sinnes, cannot preuaile against the Church, the Church thereby is declared to be without sinne: the which cannot be spoken of the pope which is a mortall man, for so much as it is written, Seuen times in the day the iust man doth offend: If the Church bee without spot because it cannot be defiled with sinne, who is it that will preferre a sinfull man before an vndefiled Church? Neither let vs giue eare vnto those which will not referre these words of Christ vnto the Church, where as he saith, Oraui pro te Petre, vt non deficiat fides tua: That is to say, Peter I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith should not faile thee. For as Saint Augustine saith in the exposition of the Psalmes, Certaine things are spoken as though they seemed properlie to pertaine vnto the Apostle Peter, notwithstanding, they haue no eudent sense but when they are referred vnto the Church, the person whereof he is vnderstood figuratiuely to represent. Whereupon in another place in the questions of the new and old Testament, vpon the words, Rogaui pro te Petre, I haue prayed for thee Peter: What is doubted? Did he pray for Peter, and did he not pray for Iames and Iohn, beside the rest? It is manifest that vnder the name of Peter, all other are contained. For in another place of Saint Iohn he saith: I pray for them whom thou hast giuen me, and I will that hereafter I am, they shall be also with me. Whereupon we do oftentimes by the name of Peter vnderstand the Church, which we do nothing at all doubt to be done in this place: otherwise the truth could not consist, for so much as within a while after, the fault of Peter failed for a time by the denyall of Christ, but the faith of the Church, whose person Peter did represent, did alwaies persuere inuiolate.

As touching the bishops of Rome, if time would suffer vs, we could rehearse many examples, how that they either haue been heretikes, or replenished with other vices. Neither are we ignorant how that Marcellinus at the emperours commandement, did sacrifice vnto Idols, and that another (which is more horrible) did attaine vnto the papacie by a diuelish fraude and deceit. Notwithstanding, the testimonie of Paul vnto the Hebrewes shall suffice vs at this time, who saith, euery bishop to be compassed in with infirmitie, that is to say, with wickednesse and sinne. Also the testimonies of Christ himselfe do approue that the Church remaineth alwaies without sinne: for in Matthew hee saith, I am with you euen vnto the end of the world. The which words were not only spoken vnto the Apostles (for they continued not vnto the end of the world) but also vnto their successours: neither would Christ then signifie that he was God, dispersed throughout all the world, as he is also perceiued to be amongst sinners, but would declare a certaine gift of grace through his assistance, whereby he would preserue the holy Church consisting amongst his Apostles and their successors, alwaies immaculate and vndefiled.

And againe in another place; I (saith he) will pray, and he shall giue you another comforter, that he may remaine with you for euer, euen the Spirit of truth whom the world cannot receiue, because the world seeth him not, neither knoweth him, but you shall know him, because he shall remaine with you. The which words being spoken vnto the Disciples of Iesus, are also vnderstood to be spoken vnto their successours, and so consequently vnto the Church. And if the Spirit of truth be continuallie in the Church, no man can denie, but that the Church ought to continue vndefiled. By the same authoritie also that Christ is called the spouse of the Church, who seeth not, but that the Church is vndefiled? For the husband and the wife (as the Apostle saith) are two in one flesh, and (as he doth also adde) no man hateth his owne flesh: thereby it commeth to passe, that Christ cannot hate the Church, for so much as she is his spouse, and one flesh with him, and no man can hate himselfe: Ergo, the Church doth not sinne; for if it did sinne, it should be hated, for sinners the Lord doth hate. The which authorities being gathered together, we ought with the Apostle to confesse that the Church of God hath neither spot nor wrinkle. Also he writing vnto Timothie, affirmeth the Church to be the pillar and foundation of the truth: wherevpon in this song of the spouse it is said: Thy friend thou art altogether faire and beautifull, neither is there any spot in thee.

These words peraduenture may abash some, that I do go about to proue the Church to be without sinne. For when as the Church doth containe all men which are called Christians, which also doe agree and come together in one beliefe of faith, and participation of the Sacraments, I doe feare lest some men will thinke, that I do affirme all men to be without sinne: which is so farre from my meaning, that I doe verily thinke the contrarie to be mall time. For I suppose, that there is no man in the Church being clothed in this mortall flesh, without sinne. Neither doe these things varie or dilfent among themselues: For the Church hath this gift, that albeit euerie part and member thereof may sinne, yet the whole bodie cannot sinne. For there be alwaies good men in the Church, the which, albeit that they be subiect vnto humaine fragilitie, notwithstanding they haue so perfect a gift of sincere and pure vertue, that subduing all carnall desires and affections, they keepe themselues a pleasant and acceptable sacrifice vnto God. Neither do I consent or agree vnto the opinion of diuers, which affirme that the virgin Marie onely persuered in faith at the Lords passion. Wherevpon diuers haue not been ashamed to say that the faith might be so debilitate and weakened, that it should returne to one only old woman. Whose opinion or rather madnesse, Saint Paul seemeth openly to reiect, writing thus vnto the Romans: Do ye not know (saith he) what the Scripture witteth of Helias, how incessantly he called vpon God against the children of Israel, (saying) O Lord, they haue slaine thy Prophets, and digged downe thine altars, and I alone am left, and they seeke after my soule? But what answere receiued he of God? I haue left vnto my selfe yet seuen thousand men, which haue not bowed their knees vnto Baal. What other thing doth this answere of God declare, than that it is a faithfull opinion of them which thinke the church of God to be brought vnto so small a number? We ought to beleeue the words of Christ, which are altogether repugnant vnto those men who affirme that the Virgin only did persuere in faith. For Iesus said vnto his Father, O holy Father, saue them in thy name, whom thou hast giuen mee, that they may be one as we are one. When I was with them, I kept them in thy name: I haue kept them that thou gauest vnto me, and none of them perished, but onely the sonne of perdition. And I doe not desire that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest preserue them from euill.

Behold, Christ prayeth that his disciples should not fall, but should be preserued from euill, and he so praying, without doubt is heard: for he saith in another place, I know that thou heardest me. Whereby is to be heard, if all those for whom he praieth, swarued at the time of his passion? As for example: by what meanes did Christ hanging vpon the crosse, commend his dearely beloued mother vnto Iohn, if so be he were either then swarued, or should by and by after haue swarued from the faith? Moreouer, did not the Centurion by and by crie out and say, truly this is the Sonne of God? The Iewes also which at that time were farre distant from Ierusalem, might both be called faithfull, and also saued by their faith: seeing that (as the Apostle saith) men are bound vnto the Gospell, after it is once knowne and reuealed vnto them. But let vs leaue these men, and speake of that which is more likely, and let vs iudge that there hath been and is a great number of good men in the Church, and by them as by the more worthie part, let vs name the Church holy and immaculate, the which both comprehend as well the euill as the good. For the Church is compared vnto a net, which is cast into the sea, and gathereth together all kind of fishes.

The church compared vnto a net. Matth. 13.

And againe it is compared vnto a king, which made a marriage for his sonne, and sent forth his seruants to call those which were bidden vnto the wedding, and they gathered together good and euill, as many as they could find. Wherefore, their opinion is erroneous, which affirme, that only good men be comprehended in the Church: the which if it were true, it would confound all things, neither could we vnderstand or know where the Church were. But for so much as the Scripture saith, no man knoweth whether he be worthie of loue or hatred, their opinion is more to be allowed and truer, which include all the faithfull in the Church: of whom, although a great part be giuen to palpituousnesse and auarice, yet some notwithstanding are cleane from deadly sinne. The which part, as it is the most worthie, it giueth the name vnto the church, to be called most holie: which is so often done, that we are commanded to sing in our Creed, vnam sanctam Catholicam & Apostolicam Ecclesiam, that is to say, one holy Catholike and Apostolike Church: the which article the Synode of Constantinople added vnto the rest: Wherefore if the Church be holie, it is also without spot. But to returne to our former purpose, this word Sanctum, which signifieth holie (as Macrobius alleaging Trebatius, affirmeth) is sometimes taken for religious, and sometimes for cleane and vncorrupt. And after the same manner, we call the church holy, as the Apostle Peter calleth it immaculat, as we reade in the famous Epistle of Clement.

This saying of Ecclesiastes is not to be misunderstood, and also seemeth to another sense, to them is here meant.

To this end also tendeth that which is spoken by Saint Paul, that Christ is the head of the church: For if the church should vnholie sinne, she should not agree with her head Christ, who is in no point defiled. This also Christ himselfe would signifie vnto vs in Matthew, when he commendeth the house which was builded vpon the strong rocke, against the which, neither the windes, neither the flouds could preuaile. In the house of God (saith the Apostle) which is the Church builded vpon the strong rocke, which rocke (as the said Apostle declareth) is Christ. Who then is so vnshamefast, that he will affirme the church, which is founded vpon Christ, to be subiect to sinne? and will not rather crie out with the Prophet and say, Domine, dilexi decorem domus tuæ: That is to say, O Lord, I haue loued the beautie of thy house? Hereupon wrote Iohn Chrysostome this golden sentence: The church neuer ceaseth to be assaulted, neuer ceaseth to be laid in wait for: but in the name of Christ it hath alwaies the vpper hand, and ouercame. And albeit that other doe lie in wait for it, or that the floods doe beate against it, yet the foundation which is laid vpon the rocke, is not shaken. Saint Hilarie also saith, that it is the propertie of the church to vanquish when it is hurt, to vnderstand when it is reproued, to be in safetie when it is forsaken, and to obtaine victorie, when as it seemeth almost ouercome. Thus by manie reasons and testimonies, it is proued that the church both not erre: which is not spoken or affirmed of the bishops of Rome, so that this reason doth make the pope subiect vnto the church, for it is conuenient, that the lesse perfect be subiect vnto the more perfect. There be also manie other testimonies and reasons, whereof we will now speake that more intreate.

Christ is the rocke whereupon the church is builded.

The church neuer ceaseth to be assaulted.

He proueth by authoritie of the pope to be vnder the Councell.

If authoritie be sought for, saith Saint Hieronie (for I willingly accupie my selfe in his sentences, as in a most fertill field) the world is greater then a citie. What then I pray you Hieronie? Is the pope neither because he is head of the church of Rome? His authoritie is great, notwithstanding the vniuersall church is greater, which both not only comprehend one citie, but also the whole world. Hereupon it followeth, that if the church be the mother of all faithfull, then she hath the bishop of Rome for her sonne: otherwise, as Saint Augustine saith, he can neuer haue God for his father, which will not acknowledge the church for his mother. The which thing Anacletus vnderstanding, called the vniuersall church his mother, as the writers of the canons do know. And Caius titus saith: As a sonne he came to do the will of his Father, so we doe the will of our mother, which is the church. Wherby it appeareth, that how much the sonne is inferiour to the mother, so much the church is superiour ouer the bishop of Rome.

If the church be the mother, the pope must be her sonne.

Also we haue said before, that the church was the spouse of Christ, and the pope we know to be a vicar: but no man doth so ordaine a vicar, that he maketh his spouse subiect vnto him, but that the spouse is alwaies thought to be of more authoritie, then the vicar, for so much as she is one body with her husband, but the vicar is not so. Neither will I here passe ouer the words of Saint Paul vnto the Romans: Let euerie soule (saith he) be subiect vnto the higher powers: Neither doth he herein except the pope: For albeit that he be aboue all other men, yet it seemeth necessarie that he should be subiect to the church. Neither let him thinke himselfe hereby exempt, because it was said vnto Peter by Christ, Whatsoeuer thou bindest, &c. In this place, as we will hereafter declare, he representeth the person of a church, for we find it spoken afterward vnto them: Quodcunque ligaueritis super terram, ligatum erit in cœlis: that is, Whatsoeuer ye shall bind vpon earth, shall be also bound in heauen. And furthermore, if all power be giuen of Christ, as the Apostle writeth vnto the Corinthians, it is giuen for the edifying of the church, and not for the destruction thereof: why then may not the church correct the pope, if he abuse the keyes, and bring all things vnto ruine?

The exposition of this place, vpon Matthew 16. Gen. xxviii.

The church may depose the pope if he abuse the keyes.

Adde hereunto also another argument. A man in this life is lesser then the Angels, for we reade in Matthew of Iohn Baptist, that he which is least in the kingdome of heauen, is greater then he. Notwithstanding Christ saith in another place, that amongst the children of women there was not a greater then Iohn Baptist. But to proceed: men are forced by the example of Zacharias, to giue credit vnto Angels, lest through their misbeleefe they be stricken blinde as hee was. What more? The bishop of Rome is a man: Ergo, he is lesse then the Angels, and is bound to giue credit to the Angels. But the Angels learne of the church, and doe reuerently accord vnto her doctrine, as the Apostle writeth vnto the Ephesians: Ergo, the pope is bound to do the same, who is lesse then the Angels, and lesser then the church, whose authoritie is such, that worthily it is compared by Saint Augustine vnto the Sunne: that like as the Sunne by his light doth surmount all other lights, so the church is aboue all other authoritie and power. Wherevpon Saint Augustine writeth thus: I would not beleeue the Gospell, saith he, if the authoritie of the church did not moue me thereunto: the which is not in any place found to be spoken of the bishop of Rome, who reuerencing the church, and being manifest thereof, is not to be thought greater or equall to his Lord and master. Notwithstanding, the words of our Saniour Christ doe specially proue the bishop of Rome to be subiect to the church, as we will hereafter declare: For he sending Peter to preach vnto the church, said, Go, and say vnto the church. To the confirmation of whose authoritie, these words doe also pertaine: He that heareth you, heareth me. The which words are not only spoken vnto the Apostles, but also vnto their successours and vnto the whole church.

The church and not the pope compareth to the Sunne.

Whereupon it followeth, that if the pope do not hearken and giue eare vnto the church, hee doeth not giue eare vnto Christ, and consequently he is to be counted as an Ethnicke and Publican. For as Saint Augustine affirmeth, when as the church doth excommunicat, hee which is so excommunicate is bound in heauen, and when the church loseth, hee is loosed. Likewise if he be an heretike, which taketh away the supremacie of the church of Rome, as the Decrees of the councell of Constance doth determine, how much more is he to be counted an heretike, which taketh away the authoritie from the vniuersall church, wherein the church of Rome and all other are contained? Wherefore it is now euident, that it is the opinion of all men before our daies (if it may be called an opinion, which is confirmed by graue authors) that the pope is subiect vnto the vniuersall church. But this is called into question, whether hee ought also to be iudged of the generall councell. For there are some, which, (whether it be for desire of vaine glorie, or that through their flatterie they looke for some great reward) haue begunne to teach new and strange doctrines, and to exempt the bishop of Rome from the iurisdiction of the generall councell. Ambition hath blinded them, whereof not onlie this present Schisme, but also all other Schismes euen vnto this day haue had their originall. For as in times past the greedie desire and ambition of the papacie, brought in that pestiferous head, which through Arrius then first crept into the church, euen so they do specially nourish and maintaine this present heresie, which are not ashamed to begge. Of the which number, some crie out and say, the workes of the subiects ought to be iudged by the pope, but the pope to be referred only vnto the iudgement of God. Others said, that no man ought to iudge the high and principall seat, and that it cannot bee iudged either by the emperour, either by the clergie, either by any king or people. Other affirme, that the Lord hath referred vnto himselfe the depositions of the chiefe bishop. Others are not ashamed to affirme that the bishop of Rome although hee carrie soules in ocuer so great number vnto hell, yet he is not subiect vnto any correction or rebuke.

Whether the pope is to be iudged by the generall councell, &c.

These are the canons and the Friers Mendicants, and begging Friers.

Diuersitie of iudgements touching the bishop of Rome.

And because these their words are easilie resolued, they run straightwaies vnto the Gospell, and interprete the words of Christ, not according to the sense and meaning of the holie Ghost, but according to their owne will and disposition. They do greatly esteeme and regard this which was spoken vnto Peter: Tu vocaberis Cephas; that is, Then shalt be called Sephas: by the which word, they make him the head of the church. Also I will giue thee the keyes of the kingdome of heauen, and whatsoeuer thou shalt bind vpon earth, &c. I haue prayed for thee Peter, that thy faith should not faile. And againe, Feede my sheepe: Cast thy net into the deepe: Be not afraid, for from henceforth thou shalt be a fisher of men: Also that Christ commanded Peter as the prince of the Apostles, to pay toll for them both: and that Peter drew the net vnto the land,

They foolishly make the church of Rome both iudge and be iudged of seuerall courts.

neglecting the expositions of the Fathers.

land, full of great fishes: so that only Peter drew out his sword for the defence of Christ. All which places these men do greatlie estroll, altogether neglecting the expositions of the fathers: the which if (as reason were) they would consider, they should manifestly perceiue by the authorities aforesaid, that the pope is not aboue them when they are gathered together in councell, but when they are separate and diuided.

But these things being passed ouer, forsomuch as answer shall appeare by that which hereafter shall follow, wee will now declare what was reasoned of by the learned men vpon this question. But first wee would haue it knowne, that all men which are of any name or estimation, doe agree, that the pope is subiect to the Councell, and for the proofe thereof they repeate (in a manner) all those things which were before spoken of the Church: for they suppose all that, which is spoken of the Church, to serue for the generall Councell: And first of all, they alleage this saying of the Gospell, Die Ecclesiæ, tell it vnto the Church. In the which place it is conuenient to vnderstand, that Christ spake vnto Peter, instructing him what he should do as touching the correction of his brother. Hee saith, if thy brother offend or sinne against thee, rebuke him betweene thee and him alone. If hee giue eare vnto thee, thou hast won thy brother: but if he doe not giue eare vnto thee, take with thee one or two, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses all truth may stand: if then he will not giue eare vnto thee, Die Ecclesiæ, tell it vnto the Church.

Those things which were spoken of the Church, serue also for the generall Councell.

Peter representeth the double person.

Now it shall be vnderstand by the church in that place: shall we say that it is the multitude of the faithful dispersed throughout the whole world? My yoke is pleasant, saith the Lord, and my burden is light. But how is it light, if Christ command vs to doe that which is impossible to bee done? For how could Peter speake vnto the Church which was dispersed, or to seeke out euery Christian scattered in euery towne or citie? But the meaning of these words is farre otherwise, and they muste be otherwise interpeted: for which cause it is necessarie first we remember the double person, which Peter representeth, as the person of the high bishop, and a priuat man. The sense and meaning of his words are euident and plaine enough of themselues, that they need no supplement or alteration. Wee muste first marke and see, what this word Ecclesia signifieth, the which we do find but only to be twice spoken of by Christ since in this place, and againe when as he said vnto Peter: Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam: That is: Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke will I build my Church. Wherefore the Church signifieth the conuocation or congregation of the multitude. Die Ecclesiæ, tell it vnto the Church. That is to say, tell it vnto the Congregation of the faithfull: the which forsomuch as they are not accustomed to conuene together, but in a generall Councell, this interpretation (I thinke) is very good. Die Ecclesiæ, tell it vnto the church, that is to say, Die generali Concilio, tell it vnto the generall Councel.

Christ nameth the Church but twice in the Gospell.

What the Church is.

The interpretation of this place, Die Ecclesiæ.

In this case I would gladly heare if there be any man, which doth thinke these words to be more properly expressed in any prelate, then in the Councell, when as they must put one man for the multitude: which if it be admitted in the Scriptures we shall from henceforth find no firme or stable thing therein. But if any man doe marueil at this interpretation, let him search the old writers, and hee shall find that this is no new or strange interpretation, but the interpretation of the holie fathers and old doctors, which haue first giuen light vnto the Church, as pope Gregorie witnesseth (a man worthy of remembrance, both for the holinesse of his life, and his singular learning) whose words are these, written in his Register vnto the bishop of Constantinople: And we (said he) against whom so great an offence is committed through temerarious boldnesse, doe obserue and keepe that which the truth both commaund vs, saying, Si peccauerit in te frater: that is, If thy brother doe offend against thee, &c. And afterward he addeth more, If my rebukes and corrections be despised, it remaineth that I doe seeke helpe of the Church. The which words do manifestly declare the Church here to bee taken for the generall Councell. Neither did Gregorie say, that he would seeke help of the Church that is dispersed abroad in euery place, but of that which is gathered together, that is to say, the generall Councell; for that which is dispersed abroad, cannot bee had, except it bee gathered together. Also pope Nicolas reproouing Lotharius the king for adultery, said: If thou doest not amend the same, take heed that wee tell it not vnto the holy Church.

The Church taken for the generall Councell.

In the which saying pope Nicolas did not say, that hee would go throughout the world to certifie euery one, man by man: but that he would call the Church together, that is to say, the generall Councell, and there would publish and declare the offence of Lotharius, that he which had contemned the popes commandements, should feare the reuerence of the generall Councell. I could recite an infinite number of witnesses for that purpose, the which all tend into one end: but this one testimonie of the Councell of Constance shall suffice for them all, wherein it is said, that not onelie the pope in the correction of his brother is remitted vnto the Councell, when as hee cannot correct him of himselfe: but also when as any thing is done as touching the correction of the pope himselfe, the matter ought to be referred to the Councel. Whereby it appeareth our intr[illegible]pretation to be most true, which doth expound the Church to be in the generall Councel. Hereupon in the Acts of the Apostles, the congregations which were then holden, were called the Church. Also in the Councell of Nice, and in other Councels, when as many should bee excommunicated, abuses in manner, this sentence was adioyned: Hunc excommunicat Catholica & Apostolica Ecclesia: The Catholike and Apostolike Church doth excommunicate this man. And hereupon that title is giuen vnto the Councels wherein we do say, that the generall Councell doth represent the vniuersall Church. Wherefore the lawes and decrees of the Councell are called the lawes of the Church, for that the Church doth not set forth any lawes in any other place, then in the generall Councell: except wee will call the popes constitutions the lawes of the Church, which cannot be properly said but of the councel: since as, albeit all those which are of the Church do not assemble and come together, yet the most part of them are accustomed to be there present, and in those which come, the whole power of the Church both consist: Whereupon we reade in the Acts of the Apostles: It pleased the Apostles and Elders with all the Church. For albeit that all the faithfull were not there present (because great number of them remained at Antioch) yet notwithstanding it was called the whole Church, because the whole power of the Church consisted in the Councell. Thus for this present it is sufficient that wee vnderstand by the Church the generall councell.

The heades of the Apostles. The Councell of Nice.

The title of the Councels.

The constitutions of the bishops of Rome are not the lawes of the Church.

And now to returne vnto our purpose, let vs heare what our Saniour saith vnto Peter: If thy brother doe offend against thee, vnto this text following, tell it vnto the church: and let vs vnderstand the councell by the Church. Who is greater in this place, he which is sent vnto the councell, or the councell, whereunto Peter was sent? The veritie doth remit the bishop of Rome vnto the generall councell. And why so? verily because the bishops of Rome should not disdaine to acknowledge some power in earth, to bee aboue them, the which they should consult withall in matters of importance, and agree vnto the determinations thereof. Whereupon Peter is also called by another name Simon, the which, as Rabanus in his Homilies writeth, is interpreted in the Hebrew tongue, obedience, that all men might vnderstand obedience to be necessary, euen in the bishop of Rome.

By the Church he vnderstandeth the councell is vnderstood.

Simons obedience necessary in the bishops of Rome.

The authoritie of the councell of Constance might suffice vs in this point, but we thinke it good to stay a little vpon this matter, and to leaue no place open for any aduersaries: which vnlesse they go about to maintaine the vnstable willfulnesse of one man, preferring a priuate wealth before a common commoditie, it is incredible how great errors they doe stirre vp. Against the which, besides many other, Zacharias bishop of Chalcedon, a man both famous and eloquent, did earnestly striue: Who in the great and sacred Synode of Chalcedon, when as the sentence of the bishop of Rome was obiected vnto him, that the canon of pope Nicolas and other patriarchs was aboue the councell, he replied against it. And Zosimus the pope saith thus as touching the decrees of the general councell: The authoritie of this seat cannot make or alter any thing contrary to the decrees of the fathers. Neither doth hee here speake of the decrees of the fathers, which are dispersed abroad in cities or wildernesse, for they doe not bind the pope: but of them which are made and published by the fathers in the generall councell. For the more manifest declaration thereof, the words of pope Leo, the most eloquent of all the bishops of Rome, are here to be annered, who wrote vnto Anatholius, that the decrees of the councell of Nice, are in no part to be violate and broken: thereby (as it were) excluding himselfe and the high patriarke.

The fauourers and maintainers of the pope go about to maintaine and preferre the pleasure and profit of one before a common commoditie.

The authoritie also of Damasus vpon this sentence, is more manifest, writing vnto Aurelius the archbishop, as Iohannes Beleth in the booke of councels, whose worthy saying as touching the authoritie of the Synode is this: That they which are not compelled of necessitie, but of their owne will either frowardly do any thing, either presume to doe any thing, or willingly consent vnto those which would doe any thing contrary and against the sacred canons, they are worthilie thought and iudged to blaspheme the holy Ghost. Of the which blasphemy, whether Gabiel which called himselfe Eugenius, be patently partaker, let them iudge which haue heard him say, that it is so farre from his office and dutie to obay the generall councels, that he saith hee doth then best merite and deserue, when as hee contemneth the decrees of the councell. Damasus addeth yet moreouer. For this purpose, saith hee, the rules of the sacred canons, which are confecrated by the spirit of God and the reuerence of the whole world, are faithfully to be knowne and vnderstood of vs, and diligently obeyed vpon, that by no meanes, without a necessitie which cannot be eschued (which God forbid) we do transgresse any of the decrees of the holy fathers. Notwithstanding, we daily see in all the popes bulles and letters, these words, Non obstante: that is to say, notwithstanding: which no other necessitie hath brought in, then onely vnsatiable desire of gathering of mony. But let them take heed to these things which be the authors thereof.

The pope can not dispense against generall councels.

Non obstante in the popes bulles.

But now to returne againe vnto Damasus, mention is made made in the Epistles of Ambrose bishop of Syllaine of a certaine Epistle, which is said to be written by Damasus, unto the iudges deputed by the Councell of Capua, where hee declareth that it is not his office, to meddle with any matter which hath been before the Councell. By the which saying he doth manifestlie reprooue all those which affirme and say the bishop of Rome to be above the Councell. The which if it were true, Damasus might haue taken into his hands the cause of Bonifatius the bishop to determine, which was before begun by the Councell: but for so much as the Councell is above the pope, Damasus knew himselfe to be prohibited. Whereupon Hilarius also acknowledging the Synode to be about him, would haue his decrees confirmed by the Councell. Also the famous doctor S. Augustine in his epistle which he did write unto Glorius and Eleutius, and Felix the Grammarian, declareth the case. Cecilianus the bishop, was accused by Donatus, with others. Melchiades the pope with certaine other bishops absolued Cecilian, and confirmed him in his bishoprick. They being moued with those doings, made a schisme in the parts of Africa. S. Augustine reprooueth them, which hauing another remedie against the sentence of the pope did raise a schisme, and doth inuey against the sentence of the pope did raise a schisme, and doth inuey against them in this manner: Behold, let vs thinke those bishops which gaue iudgement at Rome, not to haue been good iudges: there remained yet the iudgement of the vniuersall Church, whereas the cause might haue been pleaded euen with the iudges themselues, so that if they were content not to haue giuen iust iudgement, their sentence might be broken.

The full iudgement of the Church is not to be found, but in the generall Councell.

Whereby it appeareth, that not onelie the sentence of the pope alone, but also the pope with his bishops toyned with him, might bee made fruitfull by the Councell: for the full iudgement of the vniuersall Church is not found elsewhere, then in the generall Councell. Let not any man doubt, in that S. Augustine semeth here onelie to speake of bishops: for if the tert of his epistle bee read ouer, hee shall find the bishop of Rome to bee comprehended amongst the other bishops. It was also prohibited by the Councels of Africa, that the bishops of Rome should not receiue or heare the appeales of any which did appeale from the Councell: which altogether declare the superioritie of the Councell. And this appeareth more plainlie in the Acts of the Apostles, where as Peter is rebuked by the congregation of the Apostles, because hee went in to Cornelius a Heathen man, as if it had not been lawfull for him to attempt any great matter without the knowledge of the congregation: and yet it was said unto him as well as others: Ite & Baptizate, &c. Go and baptize. But this seemeth to make more vnto the purpose, which S. Paul writeth vnto the Galathians, where as he saith, he resisted Peter euen into his face, because hee did not walke according to the veritie of the Gospell. Which words if they be well vnderstood, signifie none other thing by the veritie of the Gospell, then the Canon of the Councell decreed amongst the Apostles: for the Disciples being gathered together, had so determined it. Whereupon S. Paul doth speak, that Peter ought to haue obayed the generall Councell.

No appeale to be made from the Councell to the pope. Acts 15.

Gala. Peter constrained to obey the generall Councell.

The Decree of the Councell of Constance.

But now to finish this disputation, we will here adioyne the determination of the Councell of Constance, the which Councell aforesaid, willing to cut off all ambiguitie and doubts, and to prouide a certaine order of liuing, declared by a solemne decree that all men of what estate or condition so euer they were, yea, although that they were popes themselues, bee bound vnder the obedience and ordinances of the sacred generall Councels. And although there be a certaine restraint, where as it is said, in such things as pertaine vnto the faith, the extirpation of schisme, and the reformation of the Church, as well in the head as in the members: notwithstanding this amplificatiue clause which is adioyned, is to be noted, Et in pertinentibus ad ea, that is to say, withall the appertenants. The which addition is so large, that it contayneth all things in it, which may bee imagined or thought. For the Lord said thus vnto his Apostles, Goe ye & teach and preach all people. He did not say in these points onelie, but teach them to obserue and keepe all things whatsoeuer I haue commanded you. And in another place he saith, not this or that, but whatsoeuer ye shall bind, &c. which all together are alleaged for the authoritie of the Church and generall Councels. For the preferment thereof, these things alleaome in place: He that heareth you, heareth me. And againe: It it is giuen vnto you to know the mysteries of God. Also, Where 2. or 3. be gathered in my name &c. Again, Whatsoeuer ye shall aske, &c. Of like sort, saue them whom thou hast giuen mee, &c. And, I will be with them euen vnto the end of the world. Also out of Saint Paul these places are gathered: We are helpers of God, &c. Which hath made vs apt ministers of the new testament, &c. And he appointed some Apostles and some Prophets, &c. In all which places both Christ and the Apostles spake of the authoritie of many, which all together are alleaged for the authoritie of the vniuersall Church.

The Councell to be above the pope.

Diuers places reported out of the Gospels and Apostles, for authoritie of the Church and generall Councels, about the pope.

But for so much as that Church being dispersed and scattered abroad, cannot decree or ordaine any thing: therefore of necessitie it is to be said, that the chiefe and principall authoritie of the Church, both consist in the generall Councels, where as they assemble together. And therefore it was obserued in the primitiue Church, that hard and waightie matters were not intreated vpon, but only in the generall Councels and congregations. The same is also found to bee obserued afterward. For when as the Churches were diuided, general Councels were holden. And in the Councell of Nice, we do find the heresie of Arrius condemned. In the Councell of Constantinople the heresie of Macedonius. In the Councell of Ephesus, the heresie of Nestorius. In the Councell of Chalcedon, the heresies of Eutychius were also condemned: for so much as they thought the iudgment of the bishop of Rome, not to suffice to so great, and waighty matters: and also they thought, the sentence of the Councell to bee of greater force, then the sentence of the pope, for so much as he might erre as a man: but the Councell, wherein so many men were gathered together, being guided with the holy Ghost, could not erre. Also it is a very excellent saying of Martianus the Emperor, which setteth for that purpose, whose words are these: Truly he is to be counted a wicked and sacrilegious person, which after the sentence of so many good and holy men, will seeke to withdraw any part of his opinion. For it is a point of mere madnesse, at the same time and faire day light, to seeke for a fained light: for her which hauing found the truth, desireth to discusse any thing further, seeketh but after banishes and lies.

Weights matters intreated but only in generall Councels.

Now I thinke it is euident enough vnto all men, that the bishop of Rome is vnder the Councell. Notwithstanding some do yet still doubt, whether he may also be deposed by the Councell or not: For albeit it be proued that he is vnder the Councell, yet for all that, will they not grant, that he may bee also deposed by the Councell. Therefore, it shall bee no digressing at all from our purpose, sometimes to say vpon that matter: and first of all, to speake of these rasers, which are yet so carnell for the defence of the bishop of Rome: which being vanquished in one battell, still renewe another, and contend rather of obstinacie then of ignorance. They would haue here recited againe, that which we haue before spoken, as touching the preeminence of the bishop of Rome, of the patriarch. And as there are many of them more full of words then eloquent, they slap much of this point, whereas Christ said vnto Peter: Tibi dabo claues regni cœlorum; I will giue thee the keies of the kingdome of heauen, and whatsoeuer thou shalt binde vpon earth shall be bound in heauen: as though by these words he should be made head ouer the other. And again they doe amplifie it by this: Pasce oues meas: Feed my sheep, which they doe not find to be spoken to any other of the Apostles. And because it is said that Peter was the chiefe and the mouth of the Apostles, therefore they iudge it well spoken, that no man shall iudge the chiefe and principall see: being all of this opinion with Boniface, which said, that the pope ought to bee iudged for no cause, except he be perceiued or knowne to fearne from the faith, although he doe carry innumerable people with him headlong into hell, there to be perpetually tormented: as though he could not open the kingdome of heauen to others, if any other could shut it against him, neither that he could fede other if he himselfe lacked pasture.

Whether the pope may be deposed by the Councell or not.

The places, Tibi dabo claues regni cœlorum, Pasce oues meas, make nothing for the popes supremacie.

But we count these as things of no force or difficulty. For S. Augustine in the Sermon of the natiuitie of Peter and Paul saith in this wise: Our Lord Jesus Christ before his Passion, chose his disciples (as pe do know) whom he called brethren. Amongst those, Peter alone almost in euery place representeth the person of the Church, and therefore it was said vnto him, Tibo dabo claues regni cœlorum: That is to say, Vnto the will I giue the keies of the kingdome of heauen. These keies did he not receiue as one man, but as one bee receiued them for the Church. And in another place, where hee treateth of the Christian agonie, he saith: The keies of the kingdome of heauen were giuen vnto the Church, when as they were giuen vnto Peter: And when as it was spoken vnto him: Amas me? Pasce oues meas: That is to say, Louest thou me? fede my sheepe: it was spoken vnto them all. And Saint Ambrose in the beginning of his Pastorall, saith, Which sheepe and which flocke, the blessed Apostle S. Peter tooke no charge of alone, but together with vs, and we all together with him. By which words the foundation and principall arguments of those flatterers, are vtterlie subuerted and ouerthrowne. For if Peter represented the person of the Church, we ought not to ascribe the force of these words vnto Peter but vnto the church.

Peter representeth the person of the Church, and not of the pope.

The keies giuen to the Church, and not to one man.

Neither do I see how that can stand, which Boniface doth affirme, for it is farre distant from the truth, except it bee vnderstood otherwise then it is spoken.

Pope Boniface erreth.

But if may peraduenture seeme a great thing vnto some, that it is said, the bishop of Rome to be the head of the militant Church. For as in the bodie of man, Physitions do neuer giue counsell to cut off the head for any manner of sickness and disease, although it be neuer so full of vlcers, or infected: so in this mysticall bodie of the Church, the head ought alwaies to be kept: and albeit it be neuer so wicked, yet is it to be sufferred and borne withall. But now conuert this argument: If it were possible in the bodie of man, when one head is taken away, to find another to put in his place, as we see it may be done in the church, (and not heads then be oftentimes changed for diuers diseases. Moreouer, if we will thus reason, that the head of the church should be in respect of his body, as the head of man

The pope may be deposed by the Councell or not.

The bishop of Rome improperly called the head of the Church.

man in respect of the body of man: then doth it necessarily follow, that the head being dead, the body must also die, as is manifest in the body of man: So should it grow into an absurditie to confesse that the pope being dead, the church also should be dead: the which how far it dissenteth from the truth, it is most manifest. Therefore whatsoeuer other men say, I am not of opinion with them, which affirme the bishop of Rome to be head of the church, except peraduenture they doe make him the ministeriall head: for wee doe reade that Christ is the head of the church, and not the pope: and that he is the true head, immutable, perpetuall, and euerlasting, & the church is his body, whereof the pope himselfe is also a member, and the vicar of Christ, not to the destruction, but to the maintenance and edifying of the same body of Christ. Wherefore if he be found a damnable destroier of the church, he may be deposed and cast out, because he doth not that he was ordained to do: and we ought, as pope Leo saith, to be mindfull of the commandement giuen by in the Gospell; that if our eye, our foote, or our right hand doe offend vs, it should be cute from the body. For the Lord saith in another place: Euery tree which bringeth not forth fruit, shall be cut downe and cast into the fire. And in another place also it is said vnto vs: Take away all euill and wickednesse from among you. It is very iust and true which is written in the Epistle of Clement, vnto James the brother of our Lord. that he which will be saued, ought to be separate from them which will not be saued.

They doe not which say, that the pope cannot be deposed for any other cause, then for heresie.

But for the more manifest declaration hereof, wee must haue recourse to that which is spoken by the Lord in the Gospel of John: I am the true vine, saith the Lord, and my father is the husbandman, and ye are the branches: euery branch there- fore that bringeth not forth fruit in me, my father will cut off. These words were spoken vnto the Apostles, amongst whom also Peter was present, whom the Lord would haue cut off, if hee brought not forth his fruit. Also Saint Hierome vpon these words of Matthew: Vnsauory salt is profitable for nothing, but to be cast forth and troden of swine. Whereupon in the person of Peter and Paul, he saith thus: It is no easie matter to stand in the place of Peter and Paul, and to keepe the chaire of them which raigne with Christ. This vnsauory salt, that is to say, a foolish prelat, vnsauory in preaching, and foolish in offending, is good for nothing but to be cast forth, that is to say, deposed, and to be troden of swine, that is, of wicked spirits, which haue dominion ouer the wicked and naughty prelates, as their owne flocke and heard. Behold, this testimonie of Hierome is plaine and eudent. Let him be cast out, saith he.

Fruitlesse branches are to be cut off.

If the pope be vnsauory salt, he is to be cast away.

The popes supremacie confuted.

He expounded and speaketh it of the prelat, which vsurpeth the place of Peter, and so consequently of the bishop of Rome, who being vnsauory in preaching, and foolish in offending, ought to be deposed (as Hierome affirmeth) from his degree and dignity. Neither as some doe dreame, is he to be deposed for heresie only. All doubts in the bodie of Councels, rehearseth a certaine Epistle of Clement the successor of Peter, written vnto James the Apostle, where as the said Clement reciteth the words of Peter vnto himselfe, saith thus: If thou be occupied with worldly cares, thou shalt both deceiue thy selfe, and those which shall giue eare vnto thee: for thou canst not fully distribute vnto euery man those things which pertaine vnto saluation: whereby it shall come to passe, that thou as a man for not teaching those things which pertaine vnto saluation, shalt be deposed, and thy disciples shall perish through ignorance. Notwithstanding in another place, in stead of this word deposed, it is found, thou shalt be punished: which two words, if they be well vnderstood, doe not much differ, for deposition is often times vsed in the place of punishment. But peraduenture some will here obiect, that this Epistle is not to bee iudged Clements, because it is said to bee written vnto Iames, who as the ecclesiasticall history affirmeth, was dead before that Peter was put to death. But Clement might thinke that Iames was aliue when as he wrote: which was farre distant alunder, and messengers of the christians came not often vnto Rome. Moreouer, there is mention made of this Epistle in diuers places of the decretals, as most true, and therefore it shall be nothing from the purpose to rehearse other sayings out of the same Epistle; where hee saith, that he which liueth rebelliously, and refuseth both to learne and to doe good, is rather a member of the diuell then of Christ, and doth shew himselfe rather to be an infidell then a faithfull christian. Upon which words, the glose which Panormitane calleth singular, and is much allowed, saith, that if the crime or offence of the bishop of Rome be notorious, whereby the church is offended, if he be incorrigible, he may be accused thereof. If then he may be accused, Ergo also he may be punished, and according to the exigent of the fault deposed: otherwise he should be accused in vaine.

The keies giuen to the Church, and not to one man.

Now is there no more any place of defence left for our aduersaries, but that the pope may be deposed. Notwithstanding it is not yet euident whether hee may be deposed by the councell or no, which we now take in hand to discourse. And first of all, the aduersaries will grant this vnto vs, that the bishop of Rome may be deposed by the church, for so much as the pope being the vicar of the church, no man doubteth but that a lord may put out his vicar at his will and pleasure: neither is it to be doubted but that the pope is more truly called the vicar of the church, then of Christ. But if the church may depose the pope, Ergo the councell also may doe the same. Also the glose which Panormitane in his writing doth so greatly commend, hath this sentence: that the generall councell is iudge ouer the pope in all cases. Likewise the most sacred synode of Constantinople, which is allowed of all men, doth appoint the bishop of Rome to be vnder the iudgement of the councell: and the councell to iudge and determine of euery doubtfull matter or question that doth arise concerning the bishop of Rome. Neither let any man doubt hereof, because this word deposition is not mentioned: for it is said of euery doubtfull matter or question: for if the synod doe iudge of euery doubt; Ergo it shall also iudge, whether the pope shall be deposed or no: for that may also come in doubt. And because wee will not seeke examples farre off, Iohn 23. whom all the world did reuerence, was deposed of his papacy by the councell of Constance. Neither yet was he condemned for any heresie, but because he did offend the church by his manifold crimes, the sacred synod thought good to depose him: and euer since continually, the church hath proceeded by like example, that their opinion might cease, which affirme that the pope cannot be deposed but only for heresie.

Pope Iohn 23. deposed, but not for any heresie.

But here is yet one thing not to be omitted, that certaine men doe affirme the generall councels to be of no effect, except the pope doe call and appoint them, and his authority remaine with them. Whereupon they said that Dioscorus did rebuke Palchalius the bishop of Sicili, and legat of pope Leo, because that he did enterpalle without the authority of the Apostolike see, to call a councell at Ephesus. They also alledge another testimony of the synod of Chalcedon: where as when mention was made of the councell of Ephesus, all the bishops cried out, saying: We ought not to call it a councell, because it was neither gathered by the Apostolike authority, neither rightly kept. By the which authorities, they which say that the councels cannot bee holden without the consent of the pope, doe thinke themselues marueilously armed. Whose sentence and opinion, if it take place and prenaile as they desire, it shall bring with it the great ruine and decay of the church. For what remedy shall we finde, if that a wicked pope doe disturbe the whole church, destroy soules, seduce the people by his cruell examples, if finally he preach contrary vnto the faith, and fill the people full of heresies, shall wee pronide no way or stop for him? Shall we suffer all things to runne on vnto and decay with him? Who would thinke that the bishop of Rome would congregate a councell for his owne correction or deposition? for as men are prone vnto sinne, so would they also sinne without punishment. But when as I doe peruse ancient histories, and the acts of the Apostles, I doe not finde this order, that councels should be gathered only at the will of the pope: for the first councell of all, after that Matthias was substituted in the place of Judas, was not congregate at the commandement of Peter, but at the commandement of Christ, who commanded the Apostles that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but looke for the promise of the father.

Gala. Peter constrained to obey the generall Councell.

The Decree of the Councell of Constance.

They are true Catholikes which say, the pope ought only to do any thing in the Church with the consent of the generall councell.

Make where lose the pope is with him: no generall councell.

The 1. councell of the Apostles.

The second councell as touching the election of the deacons, Peter alone did not congregate, but the twelue Apostles: for it is written; The twelue Apostles calling together the multitude, &c.

They 2. councell of the Apostles.

The 3. councell of the Apostles.

The third councell, which was holden as touching the taking away of circumcision and other ceremonies of the law, was gathered together by a generall inspiration: for it is written The Apostles and Elders came together, &c.

The 4. councel of the Apostles.

The fourth councell, where as certaine things contained in the law are permitted, semeth to be gathered by Iames: and so discoursing throughout all, there can nothing be found in the primitiue church, whereby it should appeare that the authority of congregating of councels, should pertaine only vnto the bishops of Rome. Neither afterwards in the time of Constantinus Magnus, and other emperors, was the consent of the bishops of Rome greatly required to the congregating of councels: and therefore it is written thus of the synod of Chalcedon: The sacred and vniuersall synod gathered together at Chalcedon, the chiefe citie of the prouince of Bethunia, according vnto the grace of God, and the sanctions of the most godly and christian emperors Valentinian and Martian, doth not make any mention of the bishop of Rome, although his consent were there.

Generall councels in times past, congregated by emperors, and not by popes.

Wherefore, if the pope would resist, and would haue no councell congregate, yet if the greater part of the church doe iudge it necessary to haue a councell, the councell may be congregate whether the pope will or no. The councell holden at Pisa, was not congregate by the authority and consent of any pope, when as Gregory did condemne it, and Benedict cursed it. The same also may be said of the councell of Constance, which was assembled by the authority of pope John. Who in respect of the Spaniards was no true pope. And if the councell of Pisa were no true councell, pope John was no true pope: Wherevnto his consent to the congregation of the councell of Constance, was of no effect. Moreouer, it is more then folly to affirme, that when the pope hath once giuen his consent

If the greater part of the church doe desire a councell may be holden whether the pope will or no.

consent, if it should be called backe, that the Councell should then cease, for then it is no more in his power to reuoke his consent: And of necessitie he must be obedient vnto the Councell, whereof he is a member, and giue place vnto the greater parte: and if he separate himselfe from the consent of the greater part, and depart from the vnitie of the Church, he maketh himselfe a schismaticke.

How the pope is a schismaticke.

Now, to come vnto the second conclusion: if it be true, as it is indeed, that the pope is vnder the Councell, how can the pope then dissolue, after and transport the Councel, against the will of the same? For with what countenance can we say, that the inferior hath power ouer the superior? How can the Synode correct the pope, if the pope may dissolue the Synode contrarie to the will thereof? Admit that the pope be bidibidinous, couetous, a louer of warre and discord, and a most mortall enemie vnto the Church, and the name of Christ, how can the councell represse him, if he haue authoritie to dissolue the Councell? For allsome as euer that the bishop of Rome shall vnderstand that in the Councell they doe intreat of talke of his correction or punishment, straightwaies he will seeke remedie by dissoluing the Councell. For as Sacrobius saith: he that hath libertie to doe more then is fit or necessarie, will oftentimes doe more then is lawfull. If so be that the bishop of Rome may exempt himselfe from correction by dissoluing or transporting the Councell, it followeth that the Councell is not aboue him. Therefore we must either denie that which is afore said, that the pope is vnder the Councell: or else denie that the pope hath power to dissolue the Councell, contrarie to the will and determination of the Councell.

The pope cannot dissolue a generall Councell against the will of the same.

The saying of Sacrobius.

And as this first conclusion is most true, so are al other conclusions false, which seeme to impugne the same. Wherefore the second conclusion of the diuines is also manifest: albeit that some do admit it in certaine cases, and in other some exclude it againe. For if we do admit, that so certaine causes the pope may dissolue the Councell contrary to the will and determination thereof, that is to say, to make the pope iudge of the Councell, it was a cleane contrary vnto the first conclusion.

Whether the pope in certaine cases may dissolue the Councell.

Now it is proued that the Councell is aboue the pope, and cannot be dissolued by the pope without consent thereof. Now we must further see, whether it be an article of our faith to beleeue it: which matter hath respect vnto the third conclusion. For there haue been many, which albeit they did confesse these two conclusions to bee true, yet they doubted whether it were a veritie of the Catholike faith or no. Therefore this second part must be confirmed. And we must see whether it be an article of faith that the pope be vnder the Councell. Which being prooued, it shall also appeare to bee an article of faith, that the pope cannot dissolue the Councell without the consent thereof. Which consequent none of the contrary part hath refuted. First of all therefore we must inquire what faith is, that we may thereby the better vnderstand, what pertaineth thereunto.

The definition of faith.

Faith, as the diuines do define it, is a firme and stedfast cleauing vnto things, beleeued by the authoritie of him that beareth it. If then we beleeue, as is afore said, that the pope of Rome is vnder the Councell, some authoritie doth moue vs thereunto: so is it the faith of him which beleeueth it. But the question is not whether it bee an article of faith only, but whether it bee an article of the Catholike faith. Wherefore we must againe enquire what the catholike faith is. This word catholike is a Greeke word, and signifieth vniuersall. The Catholike faith, that is to say, the vniuersall faith, is not called because that euery man holdeth it, but because euerie man ought to beleeue it. For all men doe not beleeue that God is incarnat, but euery man ought so to beleeue. And albeit that many be against this faith, yet doth it not cease to be vniuersall. For what writeth the Apostle vnto the Romans? If some of them haue not beleeued, doth their vnbeleefe make the faith of God vaine? God forbid. Verily God is true, and euery man is a lier. Therefore to beleeue that the pope is vnder the Councell, is a point of the catholike faith, although some thinke the contrary: for we are bound to beleeue it, forsomuch as it is taken out of the Gospell. For we are not bound only to beleeue those things which are noted to vs in the Creed, but also all those things which are contained in the holy scriptures, whereof we may not denie one iot. And those things which we alleage for the superioritie of the generall Councell, are gathered out of the sayings of our Sauiour Iesus Christ, and the Epistles of S. Paul: Ergo, we are all bound to beleeue it. And to proue that these things are taken out of the Gospel, the Councell of Constance doth witnes, the which groundeth his authoritie vpon these words: Dic Ecclesiæ, that is to say, Tell it vnto the Church. And, Where two or three are gathered together in my name, &c. And, Whatsoeuer ye shal bind, &c. with other such like terts.

Rom. 3. Catholicke what it is.

The Councell of Constance. Chap. super ea. sess. 5.

Wherevpon pope Martine the fourth being yet at Constance, vnder the licence of the Councell, sent out his bulles, which doe reckon vp the articles, whereupon they ought to be examined, which had fallen into any heresie: amongst the which articles he putteth this article: whether he doe beleeue the sacred generall Councell to haue power immediatelie from God, and that the ordinances thereof are to bee receiued of all faithfull Christians: which if any man would denie, hee should bee counted an heretick. Wherefore, when as the sacred Synode of Constance doth set forth this veritie, as touching the superioritie of the generall Councell, what should let, but that wee also should confesse the same to bee a verity of the catholicke faith? For the catholicke Church being congregate at Constance, received that faith, that is to say, beleeued it by the authoritie of him which spake it, that is, Christ and his Saints.

The words of the Councell of Chalcedon, whereby he is declared an heretick that holdeth any opinion contrary to the Councell.

To this purpose also serue very well the words of the Synode of Chalcedon, written in this manner: It is not lawfull for him that is condemned by the whole Synode to nominate any bishop. The determination pleaseth all men. This is the faith of the fathers. He that holdeth any opinion contrary vnto this, is an heretick. And againe, it is a rule, that it is not lawfull to appeale from the elect and chosen Synode.

Marke the manifest witnesse of this most sacred Synode, which said, that hee is an heretick, which holdeth any opinion contrarie vnto the Councell: But he is no heretick, except he refuse the catholicke faith: Ergo, it was the catholicke faith to beleeue that it was not lawfull to appeale from the sacred Councell. But how was the same any point of the catholick faith? Verily forsomuch as the sacred Synode perusing ouer the holy Scriptures, hath received this conclusion out of the bookes of Christ and other holy fathers. And like as the Synode of Chalcedon tooke their conclusion out of the holy Scriptures, so did the Councell of Constance, this we now reason vpon. And like as the one is an article of the catholike faith, so is the other also. And he which holdeth any opinion contrarie to either of both, is an heretick.

Furthermore, they seeme vnto mee to dreame and dote, which confessing them to bee verities, will not confesse them to bee verities of faith. For if they bee verities, I pray you whereof are they verities? Truly not of Grammar, much lesse of Logike; and from Astronomie and Physicke they are farre distant. Neither is there any other man but a diuine, that will grant this verite, whom Scripture doth force vnto it of necessitie, if hee doe beleeue Christ, or his Apostles. Therefore this is a verite of the catholicke faith, which all men ought to embrace: and he which obstinately resisteth against the same, is to be iudged an heretike, as the third conclusion doth affirme. Neither let any man thinke it hard to credit, that hee should be called an heretick which goeth about to derogate any thing from the power of the generall Councell, which is confirmed by so many testimonies and authorities. Also Panormitan alleageth S. Hierome, saying: He which vnderstandeth the Scripture otherwise then the consent of the holy ghost doth require, albeit he do not depart from the church may be called an heretick.

Panormitan is noted, and ouer well nipped by his owne supposition.

Wherevpon it followeth, that he which vpon the words of Christ, saying vnto Peter, Dic Ecclesiæ. i. Tell it vnto the church, doth not vnderstand by the church the generall councell: vnderstandeth it otherwise then the sense of the holy Ghost doth require, and thereby may be noted as an heretick. And to prooue that the sense of the holy Ghost is otherwise then he doth iudge it, the councel of Constance doth declare: For he which interpreting those words, Dic Ecclesiæ. i. Tell it vnto the church, spoken by the holy Ghost, vnderstandeth them to be spoken of the generall councel. By these and many other waighties reasons the 3. aforesaid conclusions, seemed true vnto the diuines, and vpongh them they also allowed the residue.

Tell the church, that is to say, the generall Councell.

The third part of Panormitans oration.

Now haue we sufficiently said, as touching that which was before promised: neither doe I thinke any man now to be in doubt of these 3. first conclusions. Now to returne againe into our storie, it is our purpose to declare those things which happened after the conclusions of the diuines: for there are many things worthie of remembrance, which also may happily be profitable vnto the posteritie.

The bishop of Burgen.

Euen the disputation was ended and a finall conclusion of these matters euen at hand, the archbishop of Spillaine and Panormitane with the residue of their fellow ambassadors of the king of Arragon, and duke of Spillaine, armed themselues with all their power to let the matter, exhorting all men of their faction to withstand it with stout and valiant stomackes.

Panormitans oration.

The bishops of Castile, and their followers.

And first of all, allsoone as the congregation was assembled together, the bishop of Burgen exhorted them to deferre the conclusion, and to tarry for the Ambassadors of other prouinces, which would returne from Sentz.

After him Panormitane with a graue and Rhetoricall Oration, spake (in a manner) as followeth.

I haue (said he) had a commandement by the Prophet, to crie without ceasing: Which Prophet said: Cry out, ceasse not, lift vp thy voice as a trumpet. If that in any matter at any time it be, he ought to haue cried, this matter specially which is now in hand lacketh crying and crying out, when as the state of the vniuersall Church is intreated vpon, either to be preserued, or vtterlie ouerthrowne: and that hee hath cried so much in this matter, that hee doubted not, but the saying of Dauid was fulfilled in him, where hee saith: Laboraui clamans, rauce sunt fauces mee: I haue laboured, crying out, that my iawes are become hoarce.

Notwith-

Notwithstanding that hee would both now, and as often as need should require, without ceasing still crie out, and specially now in this most difficult and waightie matter: therein he required the sacred Councell gently to heare both him, and the Ambassadours of other princes: Adding moreouer foure things to bee considered in all requests made of any man. The which he also required the fathers now presentlie, to marke and consider: Who it is that maketh the requeste. What is required. Why it should be required: and what effect would come by the requeste either granted or denied. As touching the first point he said: That not onelie kings and excellent princes with their prelats to be of great power: and then reckoned vp the king of Castile, the king of Arragō, the duke of Spillaine, and the bishops of the same princes, rehearsing also the merits and good deeds of the said kings, and also of the duke of Spillaine. But when as hee came to make mention of the prelats, he could not refraine himselfe, but began to wax somewhat hot, saying, that the greatest number of prelats were on his part. For if the bishops & abbats were counted, it were not to be doubted, but the greatest part of them would haue this present matter deferred: and forsomuch as the whole power of the Councell doth consist in the bishops, it is not to be suffered, that they being neglected and contemned, that should be concluded, which pleased the greater part of the inferiors: For the heics (said he) were giuen to the apostles, and to their successors, which are the bishops: also, that there are three kinds of Synods, episcopall, prouinciall, and generall, and none of all these without bishops.

Foure things to be considered in euery requeste.

The woorde of Councell would haue dignitie to be considered in Councell, and not voices.

Wherefore the manner and order of the present Councell seemed vndecent, where as things were not waighed according men excell in dignitie, but by most voices: Notwithstanding according to the most famous epistle of Clement, the bishops were the pillers and heics of heauen, and the inferiors had no determining voice, but only a consultative voice with them: wherefore there would bee a great offence in this behalfe, if a matter of faith should be determined without the bishops: in which matter not onely the bishops, but also the secular princes ought to be admitted. And so to much as they, in the name of their princes desired to bee admitted to the examination of this present matter, and would examine the matter more sutle, he complained greatly how vniustly a thing it was that they should be contemned or despised.

Panormitane feareth to be lay the process against the pope.

After many things spoken to this end and effect, he passed ouer to the second part of his oration, declaring what it was that he required: not gold, nor siluer, neither pretious stones, neither prouinces nor kingdoms, neither a thing hard to be done, but that only the delay of the sacred Councel was required, and that the fathers would stay in the processe against the pope, and in the conclusion and determination of matters which are now in hand. Neither should the delay be long, but only vntill the returne of the Ambassadors from Sentz, whom he knew well would returne very shortly. That this was but a small matter, and to be small intreatie, because there was no danger in it. And also it should seeme iniurious, not to tarrie for the ambassadors of the princes which were then at Sentz, whenas they were not absent for their owne priuate commoditie, but about the affaires of the common wealth, and the commoditie of peace: neither had he forgotten, that at their departure they had desired, that during their absence, there should be nothing renued concerning the matters of Eugenius.

Then immediatly adioyning the third part of his oration, where the time should be required, he concluded, that it was not required for the priuate commoditie of any one man, but for a common wealth: not to cause any trouble or vnquietnes, but for the better examination of the matter, that all things might passe with peace and quietnesse, that the matter might be so much the more firme and stable, by how much it is ratified and allowed by the consent of many. And so hee proceeded to the last part of his argument, requiring the fathers that they would consider and waigh in their minds the effect that would follow, if they should grant or denie this requeste. For, said he, if ye shall denie this small petition of the princes, they all will be agreeued therewith, and take this repulse in ill part. They will say, they are contemned of you, neither will they bee obedient vnto you, or receiue your decrees. In baine shall yee make lawes except the princes doe execute them, and all your decrees shall be but vaine: yet would I thinke this to be borne withall, if I did not feare greater matters to ensue. What if they should ioyne themselues with Eugenius, who not onely beseeth to holde you of your liuings, but also of your liues: Alas, what slaughter and murther doe the eies of my mind behold and see? Would God my opinion were but vaine. But if you do grant and consent vnto their petitions, they will thinke themselues bound vnto you: they will receiue and embrace your decrees, and whatsoeuer you shall require of them shall be obtained. They will forsake your aduersary, they will speak euill of him and abhorre him: but you they will commend and praise, you they will reuerence: vnto you they will wholly submit themselues: and then shall sollow that most excellent fruit of reformation and tranquillitie of the Church. And thus he required the matter to bee respited on all parts. At the last hee said, that except the Ambassadors of the princes were heard, he had a protestation written, which he would command to be read before them all.

Bishops only to haue determining voice in Councels.

The praise of Lodouicus the Protonotary.

When Panormitan had made an end of his oration, Lodouicus the protonotarie of Rome rose vp, a man of singular wit and memorie, that he was thought not to be inferior vnto any of the famous men aforetime. In somuch that he had alwaies in memorie what soeuer he had heard or read, and neuer forgat any thing that he had seene. This man first commending Panormitan, said: that he came but the day before from the baths, & that it seemed vnto him a strange thing which was now brought in question: wherein hee desired to heare other mens minds, and also to bee heard of others, and that those prelates which were at Sentz should be called for, to be present at the discussing of this matter, in the name and behalfe of their princes, which prelats were men of great estimation, and the orators of most mightie princes.

It is no maruel why he alleageth some men, as better matter for of naught he feareth no man can make a good shooe. And more here how Gods truth is sought by his enemies, when men dissemble and close the truth.

Truth seeketh no corners.

Hee allowed also the saying of Panormitane touching the voices of the inferiours, that it seemeth not to bee against the truth, that only bishops should haue a deciding or determining voice in Councels. And albeit that some in this disputation doe thinke that, which is written in the 15. chapter of the acts, to be their force or defence: notwithstanding he was nothing moued therewith, nor take it to be of any effect, albeit it was said: It seemed good vnto the holy Ghost and to vs; whereas both the Apostles and the elders were gathered together: where by it appeared, that the others had a deciding voice with the Apostles. For he said, that there was no argument to be gathered of the Acts of the Apostles, whose examples were more to be marueiled at, then to be followed: and that it doth not appeare there, that the Apostles called the elders of their owne head, but that it is onelie declared that they were there present: whereupon nothing could be inferred. And that it seemed vnto him, that the inferiours in the councell of Basill, were admitted to determine with the bishops but of grace and fauour onelie, because the bishops may communicate their authoritie vnto others. He alleaged for testimonie, the bishop of Tuscen, a man of great authoritie, who would not suffer any incorporation, or fellowship of the meaner sort, and therefore, neither any inferior, neither himselfe, which as yet was not made bishop, to haue any deciding voice in the Councell. Wherefore forasmuch as the matter was waighty, which was now in hand, and that the bishops spake against it, he required the Councell that they would of necessitie stay and tarrie for the Ambassadors of the princes comming from Sentz.

The patience and answere of Arelatensis.

His oration was so much the more grieuous, in that manie were touched with his words, and specialliie in that point, that hee said, the Apostles were not to be followed: for that all men did impugne as a blasphemy. But here a man may maruell, that a man of such excellencie, alleaged no more or better matter. But in this point the memorie of the man is to be pardoned, which did not willingly speake in this matter, and desired nothing sonuch, as not to obtaine that which he intreated for. After him many other spake their minds, but all to this end, that they might protract the time, and deferre the conclusion of these matters.

Then Lodouicus the cardinall Arelatensis, a man of marueilous constancie, and borne for the gouernance of generall Councels, gathering together the words of all the orators, spake in this wise: Most reuerend fathers, this is no new or strange businesse, nor begun to day or yesterday. For it is now many weekes agoe, since the conclusions were disputed vpon amongst the diuines, and sent into Sentz, and to all other parts of the world. After this, they were disputed vpon fiue daies continuallie, and fully discussed, and after that not without great delay appointed by the deputies, and as the truth seeketh no corners, so all things were done publikely and openlie. Neither can any man pretend ignorance, neither are the prelats or Princes contemned: For wee called all that were present at Basill, and exhorted all the rest so to bee present. And forsomuch as mention is made of the most noble king of Castile: who is it that is ignorant, that the kings Maiorus were there present? The bishop of Burgen and Ebrun, men of singular learning and eloquence, and you also Panormitane your selfe, which here represent the person of the most famous king of Arragon, were twice present your selfe in the chapter house, and disputed twice most subtillie, and there declared your mind, what you thought in that matter. What doe you desire any more? Also out of the territorie of the duke of Spillaine, there was present the archbishop of Spillaine, who albeit, he be no Ambassadour, yet how famous a prelate here is, you are not ignorant. When he had spoken these words, the archb. being sometthat moued, said vnto him: My lord cardinall, you supplie the roome of a president no better, then I do the place of a dukes orator, and began to taunt him with many words. But the Cardinall, (as hee was a man most patient, and would not be prouoked to anger by any meanes) said: this is it that I euen now desired. For if the archbishop bee an Ambassador, then hath the duke no cause to complaine, which had his orator present at the discussing of those matters.

I passe ouer other princes, because they do not complaine.

Notwith-

Notwithstanding, the most Christian K. of France, had there the bishop of Lyons, a grave and sober man, his Ambassadour at the disputation. As for other princes, I see no cause why they should be carried for, which knowing the Councels to be congregate for such matters as pertaine unto faith, see not thinke it absurd, that the doubtfull matters of faith should bee declared in the Councell: There unto if they had been willing to come, they would have been prefent ere this.

Why this matter should needs so much discussing, as some will have, I do not understand. For if I be well remembred, Panormitane and also Ludouicus, have oftentimes affirmed in this place, even the very same thing which the conclusions signifie. And if any of them now will goe about to gainsay it, it will happen unto them, as it did unto Didimus. To whom, when as on a time, hee repugned against a certaine bishop, as vaine and frivolous, his olone booke was deliuered unto him, wherein the same was written: So likewise these two men (meaning Panormitane and Ludouicus the Protonotary, although they be excellently learned, and eloquent: yet may they be confuted by their owne writings. Besides this: there are Synodall epistles and decrees of this Councell, which are full of such conclusions. What is it then whereupon an any difficultie can bee raised? What is it that may be impugned? Shall wee now bring that against in doubt, which hath so often been declared, affirmed, and decreed? But (say they) the princes and Ambassadors are absent, which are bishops, by whose prefence the decrees should bee of more authoritie. Well, they are not onely absent which are gone to Bentz; but almost an infinit number of others, dispersed throughout the whole world: whom if we should tarry to looke for, nothing at any time should be decred. They are all called unto the Councell: they might have come if they would. As those that are present, power is given, and they ought to debate these matters. If any man will say, that they which are absent, are about the affaires of the common-wealth: truely we see them not thither, but they went rather against the will of the Councell, then with the consent thereof.

And admit that they had been sent by the Councell: yet were not our power to much restrained, but that we might reprome the Church, for otherwise there should neuer any thing be done in the Councell: for so much as allwaies some are sent out by the Councell, and some are allwaies to be looked and tarried for, and therefore wee must either doe nothing at all, or send out no prelats from the councel. Whereas he said, that prelats, and specially bishops are contemned, that is most far frō the truth, for they haue the chiefe and first places. They speake first, and giue their voices first of all unto all things: and if so be they do speak learnedly and truly, all the inferiors without any gainesaying did some follow their mind.

Neither peradventure shall it be found untrue, that there was neuer any Synode, which did more amplifie the power and authoritie of bishops then this. For what haue the bishops been in our daies, but only shadowes? Might they not well haue been called shepheards without the sheepe? What had they more then their miter and their staffe, when as they could determine nothing ouer their subiects? Verily in the primitive Church, the bishops had the greatest power and authoritie: but now was it come to that point that they exceeded the common sort of priests onely in the habit and tonsure. But we haue reformed them againe to their old state, we haue reduced the collation of benefices againe unto them: we haue restored unto them the confirmation of elections: we haue brought again the causes of the subiects to be heard into their hands: haue made them bishops which were none before. What cause is there then, that the bishops should say, they are contemned of the Councell? Or what iniurious thing haue we at any time done unto them? But Panormitan saith, that forsomuch as most bishops are on his part, and few against him, the conclution is not to be determined by the multitude of the inferiors: but let Panormitan remember himselfe, that this is no new kind of proceeding.

This order of proceeding, the Councell ordained from the beginning, neither hath it been changed at any time since. And this order Panormitane in times past hath pleased you well enough, when as the multitude did follow your mind. But now, because they doe not follow your mind, they doe displease you. But the decrees of the Councell are not so mutable, as the wils of men. Know yee moreouer, that the very same bishops which doe consent with you in word, doe not consent with you in mind, neither speake the same secretly, which they now doe openly. They doe feare that which you told them at home in their countrie, that except they would follow your mind, they should displease the king. They feare the power of the prince, and to bee spoiled of their temporalties: neither haue they free libertie to speake as is requisite in Councels. Although they were true bishops, and true pastors of soules, they would not doubt to put their liues in venture for their sheepe, neither bee afraid to shed their bloud for their mother the Church.

But at this present (the more is the pitie) it is too rare to find a prelate in this world, which doth not preferre his temporalties before his spiritualties: wilh the love whereof, they are so withdrawne, that they study rather to please princes then God, and confesse God in corners, but princes they will openly confesse. Of whom the Lord speaketh in his Gospell: Euery one, saith he, that confesseth me before men, I will confesse him before my father which is in heauen. And contrariwise, the Lord will not confesse him before his father which is afraid to confesse the Lord before men. Neither is it true which Panormitan saith, most bishops to be on his part; for here are many bishops present whom hee doth not reckon, because they are not of his opinion. Neither is the dignitie of the fathers, to be respected in the Councell, as he saith, but onely reason, nor any thing more to be lookt for then the truth: neither will I for my part, preferre a lie of any bishop, be he never so rich, before a veritie or truth of a poore priest. Neither ought a bishop to disdaine, if he be rude or vnlearned, that the multitude doth not followe him, or that the voice of a poore learned and eloquent priest should be preferred before his. For wisdome dwelleth often times under a bare and ragged cloke, then in rich ornaments and apparell.

Wherefore I pray you my Lord bishops, do not so much contemne your inferiors, for the first which died for Christ, the which also opened unto all other the way of martyrdome, was no bishop but only a Leuite. As for that which Ludouicus and Panormitane doe alleage touching the voices of bishops, I know not where they haue it. Wherefore I desire them that they would tell me, where they haue found it. But if we repeat the examples of old Councels, we shall find that the inferiors were alwaies present with the bishops. And albeit that Ludouicus doe forbid vs the examples of the Apostles, I pray my selfe most vpon their doings. For what is more comely for vs to follow, then the doctrine and customes of the primitive Church? It is said therefore in the 1. chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, If seemed good vnto the holy Ghost, and to vs. The which word (to vs) is referred vnto them which are before named, the Apostles and the Elders. Neither this word, (it seemed good) signifieth in this place consultation, but decision and determination; whereby it appeareth, that other beside the bishops had determining voices. In another place also of the said Acts, when as the Apostles should intreat vpon any waighty matter, they durst not determine by themselues, but the rest called together the multitude.

Here Ludouicus saith, that it doth not appeare that the Apostles called other of necessitie: but I say vnto him, how know'st thou that they did not call them of necessitie? But forsomuch as both parts are uncertain: nothing doth prohibit vs to follow the Apostles. For seeing that all things were written for our learning, it appeareth that the Apostles would giue vs example, that in waightie matters we should admit our inferiours. And therefore in all Councels which were celebrate and holden afterwards, we find that priests were also present: as in the Councell of Nice, which of all other was most famous, Athanasius being then but onely a priest, withstood the Arrians, and inforced their arguments: Albeit, there were also other priests. And albeit mention be made of three hundred thirtene tho bishops, yet it is not denied, but that the inferiors were there, whom I thinke to be omitted for this cause, for that they were almost innumerable: for as pou know well enough, the denomination for the most part, is taken of the most worthie.

In the Synode of Chalcedon (which was counted one of the foure principall Synods) it is said that there were present 600. priests: the which name is common both vnto bishops and priests. In other Councels the name both of bishops and priests is omitted, and mention made onely of fathers, which hath the same signification that this word Elders had in the Acts of the Apostles. We haue also a testimonie of the eccleastical historie, how that there was a Councell gathered at Rome of fr. bishops, and as many priests and deacons against the Nouatians, which called themselues Cathari. Also, when Paul ꝑ bishop of Antioch, in the time of Galerie the emperor, preached that Christ was a man of common nature, the Councell assembled against him in Antioch: wherevnto there came bishops out of Cesarea, Cappadocia, out of Pontus, Asia, and from Jerusalem, and many other bishops, priests and deacons: and it is said, that for that cause the Councell was often holden.

And at the last, in the same place, vnder Aurelius the emperour, Paul was condemned of all Christian Churches which were vnder heauen: neither was there any man, which did more confound the said Paul, then Malchion a priest of Antioch, which taught Rhetorike in Antioch. But to make no long digression from the matter, wee haue most euident testimonies, for the defence of the inferiours. For the chiefe and principall amongst all the diuines, Saint Austen vpon the words of Matthew, where as Christ saith vnto Peter, I will giue thee the keies of the kingdome of heauen, saith, that by those words the iudiciall power was giuen, not onely vnto Peter, but also to the other Apostles, and to the whole Church: the bishops and priests. If then priests haue a iudiciall power in the Church, what should let that they haue not also a determining voice in the Councels? The famous doctor Saint Hierom doth also agree with Saint Austen, whose words are these vpon vpon the epistle of Paul vnto Titus. Before that difference was made in religion by the instigation of the diuell, or that it was spoken amongst the people, I hold of Paul, I of Apollo, and I of Cephas, the churches were gouerned by the common consent and counsell of the priests: for a priest is the verie same that a bishop is. Wherefore all bishops ought to vnderstand, that they are of greater power then priests, rather by customs then by the dispensation of the truth of God, and that they ought to rule the church together. And this wee doe also gather out of Paul vnto Titus, which maketh so much concordance betweene bishops and priests, that oftentimes he calleth priests bishops; whereby it doth euidently appeare, that priests are not to be excluded from the conuentions of bishops, and determinations of matters. Albeit as Saint Hierome writeth, that bishops only by custome are preferred before priests, it may be, that a contrarie custome may take away that custome: For if priests ought to rule the church together with the bishops, it is euident that it also pertaineth vnto them to decide and determine the doubtfull matters of the church.

Wherefore the testimonie of Saint Paul is euident: for (as he writing vnto the Ephesians, saith:) If Christ instituted his Apostles, Prophets, Pastours, and Teachers to the worke of the ministerie, for the edifying of his church vntill such time as we should meet him, for this purpose that there should be no doubt in the diuersitie of doctrine, who doubteth then, but that the gouernance of the church is committed vnto others together with the Apostles? Let these our champions now hold their peace, and seeme to be no lesser then they ought to be. The memorial of the councell of Constance, is yet fresh in memorie, where as diuers of vs were present, and I my selfe also which was neither cardinall nor bishop, but only a doctor, where I did see, without any maner of doubt or difficultie, the inferiours to be admitted with the bishops, to the deciding of hard and doubtfull matters. Neither ought we to be ashamed to follow the example of that most sacred and great councell, which also followed the examples of the councell of Pisa, and the great councell at Lateran, wherein it is not to be doubted, but that the priests did iointly iudge together with the bishops.

Howsoeuer, if abbats, as we do see it obserued in all countels, haue a determining voice, which notwithstanding were not instituted by Christ: why should not priests haue the same, whose order Christ ordained by his Apostles? Hereupon also, if only bishops should haue a determining voice, nothing should be done, but what pleased the Italian nation, the which alone doth exceed all other nations, or at the least is equall with them, in number of bishops. And howsoeuer it be, I iudge it in this behalfe to bee a worke of God, that the inferiours should be admitted to the determinations: for God hath now reuealed that vnto little ones which he hath hidden from the wise.

Behold you do see the zeale, constancie, vprightnesse, and magnanimitie of these inferiours. Where should the councell now be, if only bishops and cardinals should haue their voice? Where should the authoritie of the councels be: where should the catholike faith be? where should the decrees and reformation be? for all things haue now a long time been vnder the will of Eugenius, and he had now obtained his wicked and naughtie purpose, except these inferiours, whom you now contemne, had withstood him. These are they which haue contemned the pituation made by Eugenius. These, I say, are they which haue not regarded his threatnings, ꝓmis and perfecution. These are they which being taken, imprisoned and dismembred, haue not feared to defend the truth of the councell: yea, even these are they, who albeit they were by Eugenius deliuered ouer for a prey, yet would they still continue in the sacred councell, and feared not to suffer warre, famine, and most cruell pestilence: and finally, what thing is it, that these men haue not willingly suffered for the right and equitie of the councell? you might haue heard this inferiour for euen in the middest of their tribulatiōs, with a lond voice crie out and say, Albeit that al men become obedient into that subuerter of the church Eugenius, and that euery man do depart from the veritie of the faith and constitutions of the fathers, consenting vnto the commandements of Eugenius, yet we and our brethren will be constant, and doubt not to die for the truth and traditions of the holy fathers, the which indeed they haue done. Neither could they be feared with threatnings, or discouraged with any spoiles, neither could any feare or hope turne them from their most blessed purpose: And (to speake somewhat of mine owne order) whether arte cardinals haue done the like or no, that iudge you.

As for bishops, whom Panormitan alone would haue to determine, you see how few of them are on our part, and euen they which are here present, are not able, by vertue to ouercome iniquitie, they feare the tereene power, and commit offence with their hurt. Haue you not heard how they all said, they would consent vnto the kings will and pleasure? But the inferiours are they which haue had truth, righteousnesse, and God himselfe, before their eyes, and they are greatly to be commended for shewing themselues such men vnto the church of God. But why doe I defend the cause of these inferiours? When as some will also exclude those bishops which are but bishops by name and title, and haue no possession of the church, from our companie, not vnderstanding that whilest they go about to put backe those men, they do condemne Peter, and the other Apostles, who (as it is euident) were long without any great flocke, neither was Rome vnto Peter, nor Jerusalem vnto James, at any time wholy obedient: for at that time no great number of people, but a small flocke beleeued in Christ.

For, I pray you, what is that we should require of these bishops? They haue no flocke: but that is not their fault. They haue no reuenues: but money maketh not a bishop, and as the Lord saith, Beati pauperes spiritu: that is, Blessed are the poore in spirit. Neither was there any rich bishops in the primitiue Church, neither did the ancient Church reiect Dionysius bishop of Millaine, Eusebius bishop of Vercelles, or Hilarie bishop of Pictauia, although they were neuer so poore, and banished without a flocke. But if we will grant the truth, the poore are more apt to giue iudgement then the rich, because that riches bring feare, and their pouerte causeth libertie. For the poore men do not feare tyrannie as our rich men do, which being giuen ouer vnto all kind of vanities, idlenesse and sloth, will rather denie Christ, then lacke their accustomed pleasures: whom not their flocke, but their reuenues make bishops, delighting so much in riches, that they iudge all poore men vnhappie. But, as Cicero saith; Nothing can happen better vnto a wise man, then mediocritie of substance. Wherevpon it is written in the Gospell, It is easier for a Camell to passe through a needles eye, then for a rich man to enter into the kingdome of heauen.

But now to returne to a more full declaration of Panormitans words, I determine to passe ouer two points which he propounded in the beginning of his oration, that is: Quis petant, & cur petant, that is, who maketh the petition, and for what cause they make their petition. We grant that they are great men, and men of power, and (as he doth affirme) that they haue deserued good of the church; neither do I doubt but that they are moued thereunto, with a sincere affection. But whether it be a small matter that is required, or that the same effects would rise thereupon, which he spake of; it is not to be enquired. A delay (saith he) is required: a delay for a few daies. A small matter: a matter of no importance: a matter easie to be granted. Notwithstanding let Panormitan here marke well, that he requireth a delay in a matter of faith. The verities are alreadie declared: they be alreadie discussed and determined. I know there should be but a little delay, it would grow to a long delay: for oftentimes the delay of one moment, is the losse of a whole yeere; hereof we haue many examples. Hannibal when he had obtained his victorie at Cannas, if he had gone straight vnto Rome, by all mens iudgements, he had taken the citie. But for so much as he did deferre it vntill the next day, the Romans hauing recouered their force againe; he was thut out, and deserued to heare this opprobrie:

Hannibal thou knowest victorie to get,
But how to vse it thou knowest not yet.

Likewise the French men, after they had taken Rome and besieged the Capitoll, whiles that they greedilie sought to haue great summes of money, and delayed the time in making of their truce, Camillus comming vpon them did most shamefully driue them out againe. But what need I to rehearse old stories, whenas our owne examples are sufficient for vs? We know your selues how often these delayes haue been hurtfull vnto you, and how often the delay of a few daies hath growne to a long tract of time. For now this is the eighth yeere that you haue spent in delaies: and you haue seene that allwayes of one delay another hath sprung and risen. Wherefore I do require, that Panormitan should consider, that the conclution being this day disturbed, we know not whether it will be brought to passe hereafter againe or no: manie impediments or lets may rise. Neither doth Panormitan say, that this delay being obtained, he would afterward consent with his fellowes vnto the conclusions: for he denieth that he hath any commandement thereunto; and (which is more to be considered) he hath cast the ambaslabours at their returne from Bentz, may bring such newes, whereby these conclusions may be omitted: as though any thing were more excellent then the truth.

The which thing doth manifestly declare, that they do not seeke delayes for the better examination of the matter, but for to impugne the conclusions the more stronglie. Neither do I agree with Panormitan, as touching the effects which he said should rise either of the denial, or granting of the requests: For I see no cause why the princes should so greatly require any delay. There are no letters of any prince come vnto vs as touching such request, neither is there anie man latelie come from them, neither is it greatlie materiall vnto them, but that the matters of faith should be determined. But this is a most pernicious conclusion which Panormitan hath made, and not to be looked for at the hands of thole moll godly princes, where as hee saith, if once they opplease them, they will take out part. Ifcontrariwise, they will decline into Sugerinus, and wholly resist and rebell against vs. This is a marvellous word, and a wonderfull conclusion, altogether unworthy to be spoken of such a man. The decrees of the councell of Constance are, that all manner of men, of what state or condition soeuer they be, are bound to the ordinances and decrees of the generall councels. But Panormitans words do not tend to that effect, for he would not haue the princes obedient vnto the councell, but the councell to be obedient vnto the princes.

The decrees of the councell of Constance.

Alas, most reuerend fathers, alas, what times and daies, what manners and conditions are these? Into what miserie are we now brought? How shall we at any time bring to passe, that the pope being Christs vicar, and (as they say) another Christ in earth, should be subiect vnto the councell of the christians, if the councell it selfe ought to obey worldly princes? But ears, if he councell it selfe ought to obey worldly princes? But I pray you look for no such things at the princes hands. Do not beleeue that they will forsake their mother the church. Do not thinke them so farre alienate from the truth, that they would haue it oppressed.

If these things seeme so unutterable, what shall we say, when as they make the pope a God?

The conclusions whereupon the controuersie is, are most true, most holy, most allowable. If the princes do refuse them, they do not resist against vs, but against the holy Scriptures, yea and against Christ himselfe: which you ought neither to beleeue, neither was it comely for Panormitan so to say. Panormitan (by your licence be it spoken) you haue vttered most cruell words, neither do you seeme to go about any other matter, then to inculcate terror and feare into the minds of the fathers: for you haue rehearsed great perils and dangers, except we submit our selues vnto the princes.

But you most reuerend fathers, shall not be afraid of them which kill the bodie, the soule they cannot kill: neither shall ye forsake the truth, although you should shed your blod for the same. Neither ought we to be any whit more slacke in the maintell of our mother the church, and the catholike faith, then those most holy martyrs, which haue established the church with their blod. For why should it be any grieuous matter vnto vs to suffer for Christ, which for our sakes hath suffered so cruell and grieuous death? Who when he was an immortall God, void of all passions tooke vpon him the shape of a mortall man, and feared not for our redemption to suffer torments vpon the crosse. Set before your eyes the princes of the Apostles, Peter, Paul, Andrew, James, and Bartholomew (and not to speake only of bishops) sparke what Stephen, Laurence, Sebastian and Fabian did. Some were hanged, some beheaded, some stoned to death, other some burned, and others tormented with most cruell and grieuous torments suffered for Christs sake. I pray you for Gods sake let vs follow the example of these men. If we will be bishops and succeed in honour, let vs not feare martyrdome. Alas what effeminate hearts haue we? Alas what faint hearted people are we? They in times past by the contempt of death, conuerted the whole world, which was full of gentilitie and idolatrie: and we through our sluggishnesse and desire of life, do bring the christian religion out of the whole world into one corner: and I feare greatly, lest the little also which is left, we shall lose through our cowardlinesse: if that be followed by following Panormitans mind, we do commit the whole gouernance and defence of the church into the princes. But now place the stout and valiant men in this time of tribulation, and feare not to suffer death for the church, which Curtius feared not to do for the citie of Rome: which Mencetheus for Thebes, and Codrus for Athens, willingly take vpon them.

They which denie this doctrine, are here taxed and sharply reproued.

A christian exhortation to martyrdome.

This came to passe when the three orders of religion (the Domenicke Dominicans, the Franciscke Minorites, and the Carmelites) were sent into the Realme.

Not only the martyrs, but also the Gentiles might moue and stir vs to cast off all the feare of death. What is to be said of Thrasimus the Athenian (with how vnfull heart and mind, and pleasant countenance, did he drinke the poison? What say you vnto Socrates that most excellent Philosopher? did he either weepe or sigh, when he supped vp the poison? They hoped for that which we are most certaine of: Not by dying to die, but to change this present life for a better.

Examples of gods men dying for their Countrie.

Truly we ought to be ashamed, being admonished by so many examples, instructed with so great learning, yea and redeemed with the pretious blod of Christ, so greatly to feare death.

Sato writeth not of one or two men, but of whole legions, which haue cheerefully and courageously gone vnto those places, from whence they knew they should not returne. With like courage did the Lacedemonians giue themselues to death at Thermopylis, of whom Simonides writeth thus:

Dic hoffper Spartanos te hic vidisse iacentes,
Dum sanctis patriæ legibus obsequimur.

Report thou stranger, the Spartaines heere to lie,
Whiles that their countrie lawes they obeyed willingly.

The noble Lacedemonians.

Neither iudge the contrarie, but that the Lacedemonians went euen of purpose vnto death: vnto whom their captaine Leonidas said: O ye Lacedemonians, go forward couragiously, for this day we shal sup together with the infernal Gods. But I moll reuerend fathers, do not inuite you vnto the infernals as he did his Lacedemonians, but vnto the celestiall and euerlasting ioyes of Paradise, if that you can suffer death for the truths sake, and patiently abide the threatnings of these princes, if there be any threatnings at all. I call you vnto that eternal glorie: where as there is no alteration of state, nothing decayeth or fadeth: where all gods and pure: all things be assounde: where as no man inuieth, no man enuieth another, no man stealeth from another, no man violently taketh from another, no man banisheth, no man murdereth, and finally no man dieth. Where as all men are blessed and happie, all are of one mind and one accord, all are immortall, all are of like estate, and that all men haue euery man hath, and that euerie man hath, all men haue. Which things if we will consider, we shall truly answere Panormitan, as Theodorus Cyzenus is said to haue answered Lysimachus the king, when he threatned to hang him: his said, I pray you threaten these horrible things vnto your courtiers, as for Theodorus, it maketh no matter whether he rot about the ground or vnder the ground. Solike wise let vs answere vnto the princes, if there be any that doe threaten vs, and let vs not feare their tormentes.

The blessed state of the life to come.

The worthie answere of Theodorus Cyzenus.

What doth a longer life preuaile to helpe vs? No man hath liued too short a time, which hath obtained the perfect gift of vertue. And if the death which a man sustereth in the quarrell of his countrie, seemeth not only to be glorious amongst the Rhetoricians, but also happie and blessed, what shall we say for these deathes which are sustained for the countrie of all countries, the church? Truely, most reuerend fathers, it is too much that our aduersaries do perswade themselues of vs, for they iudge vs fearefull, faintly, and faint hearted: and therefore they do obiect princes vnto you, because they thinke that you will not suffer hunger, thirst, exile in the quarrell and defence of the church. But I thinke you will esteeme it no hard matter, for the obtaining of euerlasting life, to do the same which Cyprian did for the obtaining of transitorie riches, to put themselues in danger of the sea and wind, and suffer most cruell stormes.

No death to be feared for Christs church.

The hunters lie abroad in the nights in the snow, in the hils and woods, and are tormented with cold: yet haue they none other reward, but some vnlde beast of no value or price. I pray you that ought you then to do, whose reward shall be Paradise? I am ashamed of our ignauie, when as I reade that women, yea euen yong maidens haue violently obtained heauen through their martyrdome, and we are made afraid only with the name of death. This riuer of Rheine which runneth along by the citie, in times past hath carried eleuen thousand virgins vnto martyrdome. In India (as Cicero writeth) when anie man was dead, his wiues (for there they had many wiues) came into contention who should be burned with him: and the whom he loued best, hauing vanquished the other, all the rest ioyfully following her, was cast into the fire with the dead carcase of her husband and burnt. The other which were ouercome, departed full of heauinesse and sorrow, wishing rather to haue died then liue.

Example of Martiners and Hunters.

Example of the eleuen thousand virgins.

The which courage we now taking vpon vs for Christs sake, will answere Panormitan euen as the Lacedemonians answered Philip, who when as by his letters he threatned them, that he would stop all that which they went about, they asked him whether he would also let them to die. Therefore as you are excellent men, so vse your vertue, which is alwaies fras, and remaineth alwaies inuincible. For you doe know that power is giuen you of the Lord, and strength from the most highest: who will take account of your workes, and examine your thoughts: vnto whom ye should be carefull to render a good account, iudging rightly and keeping the law of righteousnesse, and in all things walking according to the will of God, and not according to the will of men.

Humilitie sister to nobilitie.

And whereas the ambassadours of Eugenius, do openly preach and declare a new doctrine, extolling the bishop of Rome aboue the vniuersall church, to the end that ignorant soules be not snared, ye shall not cease or leaue to publish the three first conclusions, following the example of the Apostle Paul, which would in no point giue place vnto Peter when he walked not according to the Gospell. As for the other matters, which do respect the only person of Eugenius (because Panormitan and the other Ambassadors of the princes, shall not say that we doe passe our bounds) ye shall deferre them for this present.

Amodeus archbishop of Lions.

Anno 1438

When as cardinall Arelatensis had made an end of his oration, there was a great noise, crying out and brawling euery where. The Presidents commandements were not regarded, neither was the accustomed order obserued: for sometimes they spake vnto Panormitan, sometime vnto Lodouicus: na man was suffered to speake, but in haste the bishops brawled with bishops, and the inferiours with their fellowes. All was full of contention and debate: which when as Lodouicus the Patriarch of Aquileia perceiued, a man of no lesse courage and stomacke, then of nobilitie and birth, being also a bishe, fo the scale which he bare vnto the vniuersall church, turning himselfe vnto Panormitan and Lodouicus the Protonotarie, said: Doe not thinke the matter shall so passe, you know not not yet the manners of the Germaines, for if you go forward on this fashion, it will not be lawfull for you to depart out of this countrey with whole heads. With which words Panormitan, Ludouicus, and the archbishop of Sillaine, being stricken (as it were with lightning from heauen) rose vp and said: Is our libertie thus taken from vs? What meantly it that the Patriarch doth threaten vs, that our heads should be broken? And turning themselues vnto Iohn earle of Dierstein, which then supplied the protonos place, they demanded of him whether he would defend the councel, and preserue all men in their libertie, or no?

The earle of Dierstein.

The praise of the citizens of Basill.

The citizens also and Senatours, were present to prouide and foresee that no offence should rise, for the citizens obserued alwaies this order, that they would be present in all affaires, which they supposed would breed diffension, foreseeing specially that no tumults should rise, otherwise then with words. They vsed alwaies such a marcellous foresight and prouidence, that no man vnto this day, could haue any cause against them, to complaine for violating their promise. Wherefore if at any time any citizens haue deserued wel at the hands of the church, surely this praise is to be giuen vnto the Basilians. These men together with Iohn earle of Dierstein, being present in the assemblie of the fathers, gaue a signe of preseruation of their libertie. The earle (albeit he was moued at the strangeneſſe of the matter, for he would not haue thought so great contentions could haue risen amongst wise men) answered by his interpreter, that they all should bee of good chere. For the emperours safe-conduct should be obserued and kept euen to the vttermost: neither should the Patriarch, nor anie other once violate the libertie, or take away the assurance granted by the emperour. Notwithstanding he desired the Patriarch that he would call backe his words againe, and not to speake anymore in such sort. But that famous father, being nothing at all moued, or troubled, committed his whole mind vnto Iohn de Wachesellene, auditor of the chamber, a man both graue and eloquent, to be declared. Who affirmed that the Patriarchs mind was not to threaten anie man, or disturbe the libertie of the councell, but to moue the fathers vnto constancie, that they should be mindfull of the reformation, which they had promised vnto the whole world, and not to lay one thing to day, and another to morow: for if they would so do, it were to be feared, lest the laitie seeing themselues deluded, and despairing of reformation should rise against the clergie.

Ambrose. ad Valentinianum.

Therefore he moniteth the fathers to forsee and prouide for the perill, that they should not depart from the councell, nothing being determined or done: and finally he desired pardon, if in his words he had offended either against the councell, Panormitane, or anyother man. Whereby he declared it to be true which is commonly said, that humilitie is the sister of nobilitie: both which did verie excellently appeare in this man. Yet for all this, could not the humilitie of the Patriarke stop or stay their noise or cries: for as often as mention was made of reading the Concordaum, great noise and rumours were still made, for to stop the same. Then Amodeus archbishop of Lions, and primate of all France, a man of great reuerence and authoritie, being touched with the zeale of faith, which he saw there to be stopped and suppressed, said: Most reuerend fathers, I haue now a great occasion for to speake: for it is now seuen yeares or more, that I haue been amongst you, yet haue I neuer seene the matter at that point which it is now at, most like vnto a miracle; for euen presently I doe behold most wonderfull signes of miracles; for it is no small matter that the lame doe walke, the dumbe doe speake, and that poore men preach the Gospell. Whereupon I pray you commeth this sudden change? How happeneth it that those which lie lurking at home, are now suddenlie start vp? Why hath giuen hearing to the deafe, and speech to the dumbe? Who hath taught the poore men to preach the Gospell? I doe see here a new sort of prelats come in, which vnto this present haue kept silence, and now begin to speake. Is not this like to a miracle? I would to God they came to defend the truth, and not to impugne iustice.

Bishops that lie at home, haue tongues here to speake for the pope.

Marke how they are turned backe which sometime taxed the truth and were now become fleers and flatterers.

Constancie lacked in diuers of this councell.

But this is more to be marueiled at then any miracle, that I do see the best learned men of all, impugne our conclusions which are most certaine and true: And they which now reproue them, in times past allowed them. You are not ignorant how that Lodouicus the Protonotarie preached these verities at Louaine and at Colen, and brought them from thence, confirmed with the authorities of the Vniuersities. Wherefore albeit that he be now changed, yet is the truth in no point altered. And therefore I desire you and beseech you all, that ye will not giue eare vnto these men, which albeit they are most excellently learned, yet haue they no constancie in them: which doth adorne all other vertues.

When he had ended his oration, Lodouicus the Protonotarie rising vp, said: It is most true that I brought those verities, but you doe call them verities of faith, which addition seemeth verie doubtfull vnto me. When he had spoken these words cardinall Arelatensis required that the Concordaum of the timelne men should be read, and many whispered him in the eare, that he should go forward, and not alter his purpose.

Then Panormitan, as tone as the Concordaum began to be read, rising vp with his companions and other Arragons, cried out with a loud voice, saying: You fathers do contemne our requests, you contemne kings and princes, and despise prelats; but take heed lest whilest that ye despise all men, you be not despised of all men: You would conclude, but it is not your part so to conclude. We are the greater part of prelats, we make the councell, and it is our part to conclude, and I in the name of all other prelats do conclude, that it is to be deferred and delayed. With this word, there sprang such a noise and rumour in the councell as is accustomed to be in battell with the sound of trumpets and noise of horsemen, when as two armies ioine. Some curling that which Panormitan went about, othersome allowing the same: So that diuerslitie of minds made diuers contentions.

Panormitan speaketh like himselfe.

Then Nicolas Amici, a Diuine of Paris, according vnto his office, said: Panormitan, I appeale from this your conclusion, to the iudgement of the councell here present, neither do I affirme any thing to be ratified which you haue done, as I am readie to proue, if it shall seeme good. The contrarie part seemed now to be in the better place, for they had already concluded. The other part had neither concluded, neither was it seene how they could conclude amongst so great cries and vproares. Notwithstanding amongst all this troublous noise, Iohn Segouius, a singular Diuine of the Vniuersitie of Salamantine lacked not audience: for the whole councell was desirous for to heare him: wherefore all men as soone as he rose vp kept silence, and he perceiuing that they were desirous to heare him speake, began in this sort.

Nicolas Amici, a Diuine of Paris.

The oration of Segouius.

Most reuerend fathers, the zeale and loue of the house of God moueth me now to speake: and I would to God that I had been either blind, this day, not to haue seene those things which haue happened, or that I had been deafe, that I should not haue heard those words, which haue been spoken. Why is it that is so stonie or hard hearted, which can abstaine from teares, when as the authoritie of the church is so spoiled, libertie taken away both from vs and the councell, and that there is no place giuen vnto the verities? O sweet Iesu, why hast thou forsaken thy spouse? Behold and looke vpon thy people, and helpe vs if our requests are iust.

We come hither to prouide for the necessitie of the church, we require nothing for our selues, and our desire is only that truth might appeare. We trusted now to haue concluded vpon the verities which were sometimes allowed in the sacred deputations. The Orators of the princes are present, and require the conclusions to be deserred. But we be not vnmindfull of those things which Ambrose wrote vnto Valentinian the emperour in this manner: If we shall intreate vpon the order of the holy Scripture and ancient times past: who is it that will denie but that in case of faith (I lay in case of faith) the bishops ought to iudge vpon christian emperours, and not emperours vpon bishops? Neither do we admit their petition but vpon most vrgent causes: Notwithstanding we heard them patiently and willingly, whilest that they did speake, euen so long as they would.

How farre and wherein bishops ought to iudge vpon emperors.

But now if any of our part would speake, by and by he is interrupted, troubled and letted. What honestie is this? what modestie or grauitie? is it lawfull so to do in the councell? Where is the liberty of the councell of Epsole now become? (where are our decrees, which do not only prohibit tumults, but also all small bablings and talke?) They say, it is because we contemne them: but they are they, which not only contemne the councell, but also resist the same. The Patriarch spake but one small word against them, and that of no euil intent or purpose, and by and by they complained that their libertie was broken: but they, when as they do enforce the councell, when as they forbid the President to speake, and will not suffer the ordinances to be read, do not iudge that they do any thing contrarie to the libertie of the councell. They say, they are the councell themselues, and yet they intreat the councell. These things do not I vnderstand: for if they be the councell, why do they intreate themselues? If they be not the councell, why do they not suffer the councell for to speake? Why doe they not take for an answere of him to whom they make their petitions?

He meaneth Panormitan, which did conclude without the examination of twelue men.

Truly this is to too much violence, and certes our patience is also to much, to suffer such excelle euen in the face of the church. But this doth most of all grieue me, and this do I most muruell at, that Panormitan, a man of singular wit and doctrine, did conclude without any disculling or deciding of the deputies, and without the examination of the twelue men, or anie rite or order. The which except mine eyes had beheld and seene, I would scarcely beleeue, if any other man should report it vnto me, or him: Neither do I yet know, whether I may sufficiently credit my selfe, the matter seemeth so horrible: for I doe not see by what authoritie his conclusion doth stand, except it be by the authoritie of his king, whom he saith will haue it so. But you most reuerend fathers, take heed that ye bring in no such custome: for so it shall come to passe, that in all matters, a fewe froward prelats shall haue one to conclude for them.

And albeit Panormitan hath proued (as he thinketh) by strong reasons, that the verity ought to be deferred, yet not-notwithstanding I dare require you most reuerend fathers to follow the example of the Apostle, who (as Arelatensis hath well declared) would not giue one houres respite vnto Peter, when he swarued from the truth of the Gospell. The faith is precious to be reteined and holpen, neither doth any thing sustaine more danger by delaies, then faith doth. For heresies except they be rooted out at the first, when they are once growne, are hardly taken away. Therefore I desire you speedily to helpe and aide. Hoise vp your sailes, and launch out your oares. What should we tarrie looking for either the prelats or the princes? You are now in conflict: I onely desire that you would hasten vnto the victorie. Regard not the threatnings of those princes, neither the oppressies of those contumelious persons: for you are blessed, saith the Lord, when as men curse you and persecute you, speaking all euill against you, making lies and flanders vpon you for my sake; reioyce and be glad, for great is your reward in heauen. That is not our Lord God able to take vs out of the furnace of hote burning fire, and deliuer vs out of the hands of those princes? I beseech you most reuerend fathers and louing brethren, haue no lesse hope in Iesus Christ, then Sidrach, Misach, and Abednago had, which feared not that old king Nabuchodonosor: and let the princes know, that the most high ruleth ouer the kingdoms of men, and giueth them vnto whom he pleaseth. God beholdeth all things from aboue; he is (I say) in the middest amongst vs; wherefore are ye then afraid? Be of god courage, and shew your selues as a strong wall for the church of God: suffer not the faith to perish vnder your handes. The almightie God is present with you. He is present that will defend you. Feare not them which seeke onely to kill the bodie. Vse iustice and equitie, and be assured that he will not deliuer you ouer into the handes of the backbiter and slaunderer. Against I say vnto you, shew your selues valiant and stout: Defend your mother the church. And vnto thee, O thou president I say, that thou oughtest rather to please God then man, for if thou depart thence without a finall conclusion, know assuredly that thou shalt render account in the strait iudgement of God. And thus without any more words, hee sate downe in his place.

Paul wrote giue to feare for figure when he warned a-wiues.

Marke the great constancy and christian zeal of a reuerend man.

Exhortation to constancie.

In the meane time, many graue and ancient men haderhasted Panormitan that he should giue ouer his conclusion. The bishop of Burgen was verie instant and earnest with him, that he should make vnitie and concord amongst the fathers, and went about to make an vnitie with al men. But neither the fathers of the councell were determined to depart without a conclusion, neither Panormitan was minded to alter his intent and purpose. All things were disturbed, neither did the prelats sit in their seats, as they were accustomed, but as euery mans affection led him. Some went to the cardinall Arelatensis, some vnto Panormitan and exhorted them, as if they had been princes or rulers of armies. Then Arelatensis knowing the matter to be in danger, and that there was no readie way to make a conclusion, thought to vse some policie, to appease the tumult.

The bishop of Burgen verie louingly concyled.

How men be prone to leane vnto princes.

Note the godly policie of the Cardinall.

Most reuerend fathers, said he, we haue receiued now letters out of France, which declare vnto me marueilous things: that there are mereable newes sprung vp there, which if you will giue me willing audience, I will declare vnto you. By this meanes there was a sodden silence throughout the whole councell, and by this marueilous policie he made all men attentiue to heare. Whom as he saw he had free libertie to speake, vnfolded euery fable or historie of any letters sent, he opened the whole order of the matter, and as it is requisit in an Oratour, came by little and little to the principall point, saying; that Sugenius his messengers filled all France, preaching a new doctrine, and extolling the authoritie of the bishop of Rome, aboue the generall councels: against whom, except speedie remedie were found, it would come to passe, that many would giue credit vnto them, and therefore the sacred councell ought of necessitie, to prouide remedie, and of necessitie to conclude vpon the verities which were examined, that thereby the temeritie of the Eugenians might be repressed; which verities, although they were eight in number, yet was it not the fathers intent to conclude vpon them all, but only the three first: euen as I also (saith he) here do conclude, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost.

The conclusion of the councell.

The holy Ghost working against the pope.

The sorowe of Panormitan for impugning thereof.

When he had finished his Oration, with a cheerefull and merrie countenance rising vp, he departed. Some of them kissed him, and some of them kissed the skirts of his garments. A great number followed him, and greatly commended his wisedome, that being a French man borne, had that day vanquished the Italians, which were men of great policie. Howbeit this was all mens opinion, that it was done rather by the operation of the holy Ghost, then by the cardinals owne power. The other of the contrarie faction, as men bereft of their minds, hanging downe their heades, departed euery man to his lodging. They went not together, neither saluted one another: so that their countenances declared vnto euery man that they were ouercome. Something more also is reported of Panormitan, that when he came to his lodging, and was gone vnto his chamber, he complained with himselfe vpon his king, which had compelled him to striue against the truth, and put both his soule and good name in danger of losing; and that in the middest of his teares and complaints he fell asleepe, and did eat no meat, vntill late in the euening for verie sorowe for that he had neither ignorantly, neither vnwillingly impugned the truth.

The bishop of Concen spitefully.

The bishop of Lions and Burgen.

After this there was great consultation amongst the Eugentians, what were best to be done in this matter. Some thought god to depart and leaue the councell; other some thought it meeter to tarrie, and with all indeuour to resist that nothing should further be done against the Eugenians: and this opinion remained amongst them. The next day after, being the fifteenth day of Aprill, the archbishop of Lions and the bishop of Burgen, calling together the prelats into the chapter house of the great church, began many things as touching peace. The bishop of Burgen perswaded that there should be deputations appointed that day, vnto whom the archbishop of Lions should giue power to make an agreement. Vnto whom answere was made, as they thought, verie roughly, but as other iudged, gently, but notwithstanding iustly and truly: For, they said there could be no vnitie or concord made, before the aduersaries confessed their fault and asked pardon therefore.

The first assemblie of the councell.

Marke what the truth must suffer.

The day following, the said bishop of Burgen, with the other Lombards and Cathelans, went vnto the Germaines, and from thence vnto the Senate of the citie, speaking much as touching the prohibiting of schismes. The Germaines referred themselues to those things which the deputation should determine. The Senate of the citie (as they were great men of wisdome, which would do nothing without diligent aduice and deliberation) answered, that the matter pertained not vnto them, but vnto the councell: the fathers whereof were most wise men, and knew not ignorant what pertained vnto the christian faith; and if there were any danger toward, it should be declared vnto the councell and not to the Senate: For they beleeue that the Elders of the councell, if they were premonished, would foresee that there should no hurt happen: as for the Senate of the citie, it was their dutie only to defend the fathers and to preserue the promise of the citie. With this answere the bishop of Burgen departed.

The answers of them both.

Dimarueilous despite and contumelie in a bishop for if Arelatensis had kept whores or concubines, he would haue passed him: but to maintaine learned me was a great offence.

In the meane time the fathers of the councell had drawne out a forme of a decree vpon the former conclusions, and had appointed the same in the last deputations. By the time the princes oratours were returned from the assemblie at Spentz, and holding a councell among themselues, they had determined to let the decree. The ninth day of May there was a generall connocation holden, whereunto all men resorted, either part putting forth himselfe vnto the conflict.

The forme of the decree is written and approued.

The fathers of the councell slandered by Panormitan. Foure signes to know the good from the bad.

The princes Ambaldadours were called by the bishop of Lubecke and Conrade de Winsperg the protectour, into the quier, and there kept: where as they intreated of a vnitie and by what meanes it might be had, and there they tarried longer then some thought to be: the which matter gaue occasion to bring things well to passe, beyond all expectation. The only forme of the decree was appointed to be concluded that day; whereupon, as some as cardinall Arelatensis perceiued the congregation to be full, and that the twelue men had agreed, and that there was a great expectation with silence, he thought good not to delay it for feare of tumult, but commanded by and by the publike concordances to be read, wherein this was also contained, that the cardinall Arelatensis might appoint a Session whensoeuer he would. Which being read, he being desired by the promotors, concluded according as the manner and custome is. The ambaldadours & princes being yet in the quier, as soone as they vnderstood how the matter passed, being verie much troubled and vexed, they brake off their talke, imputing all things to the bishop of Lubeck, which of purpose had kept them in the quier and protracted the time. Whereupon they entring into the congregation, filled the church full of complaints.

The policie of the cardinall Arelatensis.

Abbat Virgiliacensis.

Lubonteus the Protonotarie in labouring to stone learned, diligent to be good.

The Apostles principally gathered the Creed.

The bishop of Turnon.

First of all, the Orator of Lubecke complained both in his owne name and the name of the protector, as touching the conclusion, and required that the councell would reuoke the same. If that might be granted, he promised to intreat a peace, and to bee a prodour betweene the councell and the ambaldadours of the princes. But the archbishop of Turnon said, that it seemed vnto him euery man to haue free libertie to speake against that law which should be promulgate, vntill the Session, when the canons should be consecrated and receiue their force: when as the bishops in their pontificalibus, after the reading of the decree in the Session, should answere that it pleased them: otherwise the demand which was made by the promoters in the Session to be but vaine: and for that the conclusions were not yet allowed in the Session, therefore he said that he might without rebuke speake somewhat as touching the same; and that it was a great and hard matter, and not to be knit by in such a short time, and that he had the knowledge thereof but euen now: notwithstanding that hee being an archbishop ought to haue knowne the matter, that at his returne home, he might informe the king and also instruct those which were vnder him. And that hee and his fellowes before before any Session should be: would both heare and be heard of others. Neither doth it seeme good vnto him that the Session should be holden, before report were made of those things which the ambaldadors of the princes had done at Spentz, which would peraduenture be such as might alter and change the minds of the fathers. Then the bishop of Conce ambaldadour of the king of Castille, which was also lately returned from Spentz, a man of great vnderstanding, but lacking vtterance, gricuously complained that the prelats were contemned. Neither had it been (said he) any great matter if they had been tarried for, which not without great danger and expences, went to Spentz, not for their pleasure, but of necessitie. And afterward as it were smiling, he said, how mad am I that would haue the prelats to be tarried for, vntill they returne from Spentz, when as they are not taried for, whilest they came out of the quier of the church: do therefore as ye list. If there rise any offence or mischiefe hereupon, neither are we the ambaldadours of Castile to be blamed, neither can any man of right impute any thing to our most noble king.

Here were it long to repeate, with what rebukes and taunts they inueighed against the cardinall Arelatensis: but especially the bishop of Millaine railed most cruelly vpon him, saying y he fostered & maintained a rable of Sophisters and Scholemasters, and that he had concluded in matters of faith with them: calling him also another Catalin, vnto whom all desperate and naughtie persons had refuge, that he was their prince, and ruled the church with them: and that he would not giue care vnto the ambaldadours of the most noble princes, or to the most famous prelats in this most waighty matter. Albigunensis a bishop and a man of great nobilitie, descended of the emperours blod, albeit he had neuer alienate his mind before from the councell: yet left he should seeme to dissent from other ambaldadours of the princes, made the like complaint as touching the attempt of the prelats. After this it came vnto Panormitan to speake, who as he had a greater vehemencie in speaking, so also he did declare a more angrie stomacke and mind: for in the beginning of his Oration, he seemeth not to goe about according to the precept of Oratours, to get the good will of the hearers, but rather their hatred: for he said that our Sauiour shewed foure signes in the Gospell, whereby we should know the good from the reprobate: for he which is of God (saith he) heareth the words of God, but you heare not the words of God, because ye are not of God. And againe, he that doth euill hateth the light. And in another place also, by their fruits you shall know them. And a good tree cannot bring forth euill fruit.

Panormitan his reference vnto the last. But vnto Ludouicus the Protonotarie, which desired to be instructed: he said, he willed him to be satisfied with the words which were spoken vnto the bishop of Turnon.

To Ludouicus the Protonotarie.

All which sayings hee wrested against the fathers of the councell, because they would not heare the words of God, that is to say, the words of peace which the ambaldadours had spoken, because they fled from the light in the absence of the ambaldadours, priuily concluding, and because in their deputation they had not holden and kept the holy day but had concluded thereupon, also because they had the vpper hand in the foresaid conclusion, not by reason, but by deceit. As touching the fruits, he said that the fathers themselues should meditate and consider how that, if their fruits were not good, they also themselues were not good: and that hee did see another councell at hand, where as he feared lest these conclusions should be reuoked, as the fruit of an euill tree: and therefore, they ought not so suddenlie to proceed in so waighty matters: and that he would be yet more fullie heard before the Session, as well in his owne name, because he was an archbishop, as in the name of his prince, which reigned not ouer one kingdome alone but ouer many: Also he said that he heretofore by his words, deeds and writings, hath extolled the authoritie of the councell: and that he feared, left by these meanes, the authoritie thereof should be subuerted. At the last he required pardon if he had offended the fathers of the councell, for so much as verie sorowe and griefe forced him to speake so.

Nicolas Picenius an Italian.

The Abbat Virgiliacensis would haue made answere to those things which Panormitan had touched, concerning his deputation: but Arelatensis thought good that all the contrarie part should speake first, amongst whom, last of all Ludouicus the Protonotarie, the Honour of lawyers rose vp. And albeit that he spake vnwillingly, yet when he had begun, he could not refraine his words. And whiles he went about to seeme learned and eloquent, he vtterly forgot to be good. He said that the councell ought to take heed, that they intreated no matter of faith, against the prelats, lest any offence should follow, for that some would say it were a matter of no force or effect. For albeit that Christ chose twelue Apostles and seuentie Disciples, notwithstanding in the setting forth of the Creed, onlie the Apostles were present, thereby (as it were) giuing example, that the matters of faith did pertaine onely vnto the Apostles, and so consequently vnto bishops. Neither that they ought hastily to proceed in matters of faith, which ought to be clerely diffined, for so much as Peter affirmeth the tryall of faith to be much more pretious then gold, which is tried by the fire. And if the bishops be contemned, which are called the pillars and keyes of heauen, the faith cannot seeme to be well proued or examined. But at length he confessed, Articles of the Creed or of all put in by the Apostles, but some by the councels.

The article of the holy Ghost put in by the councell of Nicene.

that the inferiours might determine with the bishops, but denied that the least part of the bishops with the most part of the inferiours might determine any thing. From thence he passing to the matter of faith, said, that those verities whereupon question was now had, are articles of faith, if they were verities of faith. And for so much as euerie man should be bound for to beleeue those, therefore he would be better instructed and taught in that matter which he should beleeue as an article of faith. Neither should it be comely for the councell to denie him his requell, which according to the rule of the Apostle, ought to bee readie to giue account vnto euerie man which shall require it, touching the faith, which it holdeth.

The oration of the cardinall Arelatensis, to the imperiall ambaldadors.

After euery man had made an end of speaking, the cardinall Arelatensis calling his spirits together, made an Oration, wherein he answered now the one, and now the other. And first of all he commended the desires of the Imperiall ambaldadours, which offered to entreate a peace and vnitie; but neither necessitie, nor honestie (he said) should suffer those things which are concluded to be reuoked. He answered also, that the petition of the ambaldadours of France is most iust, in that they required to be instructed touching the faith: and that the councell would grant their requell, and send vnto them certaine Diuines, which should instruct them at home at their lodgings: but the matter was already concluded, and could no more be brought in question, that the Session was onelie holden, rather to beautifie the matter, then to confirme the same. And as touching that which the bishop of Concen so greeuously complained of, he doth not much marueil: for he could not know the procelle of the matter, when he was absent, who being better instructed, he supposed would speake no more any such words, for so much as a full man would require no vniust thing. Also that his protestation had no euill sense or meaning, in that he would not haue it imputed, neither vnto him, neither vnto his king, if any offence should rise vpon the conclusions. Notwithstanding it is not to be feared that any euill should spring of good workes. But vnto the bishop of Millaine he would answere nothing, because he saw him so moued and troubled, for feare of multiplying of more grieuous and ruinous words. As for Panormitan he referred vnto the last.

To the ambaldadours of France.

To the bishop of Concen.

Notwithstanding, he left not this vntouched which Ludouicus had spoken concerning the Apostles Creed. For albeit that in the setting forth of the Creed, the Apostles be only named, yet it doth not follow (saith he) that they only were present at the setting forth thereof. For it happeneth oftentimes that princes are commended and praised as chiefe authors and doers of things, whereas notwithstanding they haue other helpers; as it appeareth in battels, which although they are fought with the force of all the soulders, yet the victorie thereof is imputed but vnto a few. As in these our daies, they do ascribe all things which the armie doth either fortunately or wisely, vnto Nicolas Picenius, that most valiant captaine, which hath obtained so manie famous victories: albeit that oftentimes other haue been the inuenters of the policie, and workers of the feate. And therefore Ludouicus ought to know and vnderstand, that they are not only articles of faith which are contained in the Creed, but all other determinations made by the councels, as touching the faith. Neither is he ignorant, that there be some articles of the Creed which we now vse in the church, that were not put to by the Apostles, but afterward by generall councels: as that part wherein mention is made of the holy Ghost, which the councell of Lions did adde; in which councell also it is not to be doubted, but that the inferiours did iudge together with the bishops. But for so much as he had sufficiently declared that matter in the congregation before passed, he would stay no longer thereupon. But comming vnto Panormitan, he rehearsed his words Qui ex Deo est, verba Dei audit, Ioh. that is of God, heareth Gods word, which is very well taken out of the Gospell, but not well applied vnto the councell (said he:) for he firmely beleeued, that his predecessors haue indged, the holy Ghost to be in the middell of the councels, and therefore the words of the councels to be the words of the holy Ghost: which if any man do reiect, he denieth himselfe to be of God. Neither doth the councell hate the light, which both all things publikely and openly, whose congregations are cuident vnto all men, neither doth it as the conuenticles of the aduersaries, admit some, and exclude other some. Moreouer, the thing which is now in hand, was begun to be intreated of fiue or two monethes ago, and first the conclusions were largely disputed vpon in the Diuinitie schooles, and afterward sent vnto Spentz and other places of the world.

The article of the holy Ghost put in by the councell of Nicene.

Panormitan wounded with his owne dartes.

After all this, the fathers were called into the Quyer house of the great church, to the number of an hundred and twenty: amongst whom Panormitan which now complaineth, was also present, and according to his manner, did learnedlie and subtilly dispute, and had libertie to speak what he would. Likewise in the deputations, euery man spake his mind freely, and in the deputation where Panormitan was, the matter was three daies discussed. After this the twelue men did agree vpon it, and the generall congregation did conclude it. Neither hath there been at any time any thing more ripely or exactly handled, both openly, and also without any fraud or deceit. And whereas the deputation did sit vpon a holy day, there is no hurt in that, neither is it any new or strange thing, forasmuch as they haue often beldon their Session vpon festiuall daies, what as the matter hath had haste, and specially for that the matter of faith hath no holy daies. And further he said, that he did not conclude craftily and deceitfully, in the congregation, as Panormitan hath reported, but publikely and openly at the request of the Promoters. Neither hath any man any iust cause to complaine vpon him, for so much as when he was made president, he was sworne that alwaies when three or foure of the deputations did agree, he should conclude thereupon. And for so much as he had alreadie concluded in diuers causes touching the pope, he saw no cause why he should not conclude in the matter of faith, for that he was a cardinall, and did weare his red hat for this purpose, that he should bold his blood in the defence of the faith. Neither hath he done any thing now against the pope, for that omitting the fiue conclusions touching Eugenius, hee had concluded but onely the generall conclusions: which except he had done, the fathers should haue had iust cause to complaine against him (in that they trusting in his fidelitie and faithfulnesse, had chosen him President) if by him they should now be forsaken in this most necessarie cause of faith. And turning himselfe vnto the people, he desired the fathers to be of good comfort, for so much as he would neuer forsake them, yea although he should suffer death for, he had giuen his faith and fidelitie vnto the councell, which he would obserue and keepe: neither should any mans flattery or threatnings put him from his purpose: that he would be alwaies readie to do whatsoeuer the councell should command him, and neuer leaue the commandements of the deputies by any meanes vnperformed.

Arelatensis concluded not, but at the request of the protectors.

These foure deputations were foure seats of chosen men, which did discusse and determine those things which the fathers did conclude vpon. Clerify this is no Babylonical cardinall, but of the immaculate spouse Jesus Christ. He speaketh to the whole councell.

As touching that Panormitan had extolled the authoritie of the councell, he said that he was greatly to be thanked. But yet he ought to vnderstand and know the authoritie of the councell to be such, as cannot be augmented or increased by any mans praise or commendation, or be diminished by any opprobrie or slander. These things thus premised, he commanded the forme of the decree to be read. Then Panormitan and those which take his part, would needs haue a certaine protestation to be first read. There was great contention on euerie side. Notwithstanding at the last Arelatensis preuailed, and the forme of the decree was read vnto this word, Decernimus, that is to say, we decree. Then Panormitan rising vp, would not suffer it to be heard any further: And the bishop of Catania cried out saying, that it was vncomely that Arelatensis, with a few other bishops by name, should conclude the matter. The like did also all those which fauoured Panormitan. The cardinall of Terracona also (whilst there was that time had bolden his peace) did seriously rebuke his partakers, that as men being asleepe or in a dreame, they did not reade the protestation, and commanded by and by one of his familiars to reade it. But like as the aduersaries before did perturbe the reading of the concordances, so would not the fathers of the councell now giue place to the reading of the protestation. Which when Albiganensis did consider, he commanded the writing to be brought vnto him, and as he began to speake, suddenly Arelatensis rose vp, with a great number of the fathers to depart: which thing pleased the cardinall of Terracona and Panormitan verie well, for that they hoped that they alone with their adherents, should remaine in the church. Wherefore he reuoked Arelatensis to reuoke the conclusion, and to make another.

Euerie man may determine in matters of faith hauing the Scripture on his part.

Contention in the councell about reading of the protestation.

There was in that congregation in his place George the Protonotarie of Barbarina, sitting somewhat beneath his vncle, the cardinall of Terracona, a man but yong of age, but graue in wisedome, and noble in humanitie: who as soone as he saw the cardinall Arelatensis rise, he determined also to depart, and when as his vncle called him, commanding him to tarrie, he said; God forbid father that I should tarrie in your congregation, or do any thing contrarie to the oth which I haue taken. By which words he declared his excellent vertue and nobilitie, and admonished our men which remained, of those things which they had to do. His voice was the voice of the holy Ghost, and words more necessarie, then could bee thought. For if he had not spoken that word, the fathers of the councell had peraduenture departed, and gone their way, and the other remaining in the church, had made another conclusion which they would haue affirmed to haue been of force, because they would say the last conclusion was to be received. But many being warned by the words of the Protonotarie, and calling to remembrance the like chance of other councels before, called backe againe the multitude which were departing, and cried vpon the cardinall and the Patriarch to sit downe againe, and that they should not leaue the church void and quiet for their aduersaries. Whereupon suddenly all the whole multitude sate downe, and the gates were shut againe. In the meane time Matthews Albiganensis a bishop, read the protestation to none else but to himselfe alone, for it could not be heard for noise: which being ended the Lombardes and the Cathelanes confirmed the protestation. When the cardinall of Terracona said that he did agree to that distinction, they marualled at that saying. And when some smiled and laughed at him: What, said he, ye fooles do ye mocke me? do not the ambaslaadours of my king dissent from you? What do you marueil then if I do say I consent vnto their distinction: And with these words, he and almost all the Aragons, Lombardes and Cathelanes departed, all the other taried still. And albeit it was somewhat late (for it was past two at afternoone) Arelatensis seeing the congregation quiet, commanded the affaires of priuate persons to be read, as the manner is: which being ended, hee commanded also the publike affaires to bee read, and willed the conclusions and the forme of the decree to be read againe. There remained in the congregation, the ambassadours of the empire and of France, talking together of their affaires. Notwithstanding the bishop of Turnon heard mention made of the conclusions, and turning himselfe to the bishop of Lubecke, said: Loe, the matters of faith are now in hand againe, let vs go hence I pray you that we be not an offence vnto others, or that we be not said to dissent from the other ambassadours. To whom the bishop of Lubecke answered: Tarrie father, tarrie here, are not the conclusions most true: Why are you afraid to be here for the truth? These words were not heard of many, for they spake them softly betweene themselues. Notwithstanding I heard it, for I sitting at their feet, did diligently obserue what they said. Arelatensis, after all things were read, which he thought necessarie, at the request of the deputies concluded, and so making an end, dismissed the congregation. Twice it is declared, both great difficulty Arelatensis concluded, for so much as neither the matter, nor the forme could be concluded without dissention: and the conclusions were miraculous, and past all mens hope, but were obtained by the industrie of Arelatensis, or rather by the speciall gift of the holy Ghost.

The affaires of the councell are read.

They papists enroll that which maketh for their purpose, but the contrary they contemne, whether it be scripture or prophane.

Eneas Syluius being present collected this. Arelatensis concluded here, as he did also before, not without the consent of the deputies according to the order of the councell.

After this, it was determined betweene the Lombardes and Aragons to abstaine from the deputations for a certaine time, which they did not long obserue, notwithstanding the deputations were then verie quietly for a certaine space, neither was there any thing done worthie of remembrance vntill the fifteenth day of May, during which time, all meanes possible were sought to set a concord betweene the fathers, but it would not be. Then Nicolas Amici promoter of the faith, was called into the congregation, and briefly rehearsed those things which were done the daies before, and declared how that Arelatensis might point a session. Wherefore, for so much as delay in matters of faith was dangerous, he required that a session should be appointed against the morrow after, requiring the cardinall for his dignities sake, in that he was called the principall of the church, and the other bishops, that (as they had promised in their confectation) they would not now shrinke from the church in this laudable enterprise, and suffer the faith to be oppressed: but the other inferiours he required for their oth which they had taken, to shew themselues faithfull and constant herein. Then against there fell a great contention vpon these words: for Arelatensis, as he was required, did appoint a Session, and exhorted all men to be there present in their robes. The bishop of Lubecke rising vp, made a protestation in his owne name, and also in the name of his protector, that he would not consent, that there should be any Session, if it should in any part derogate from a agreement had at Mentz. Gregorius Spica also, his fellow ambassadour, consented to this protestation. When as the proctor of the councell appointed by the emperor, vnderstood himselfe to be named by the bishop of Lubecke, he marueiled a while what the matter should be. But being certified by an interpreter, he answered that he would in no case consent vnto the protestation of the bishop of Lubecke, and that he did not know any thing of their doings at Mentz: also that he was sent by the emperour to the sacred councell, and hath his charge which he doth well remember, and would be obedient thereunto. After whom the bishop of Concense, according to his accustomed manner, made his protestation, and after him also followed Panormitan. Whose words before I will repeat, I desire that no man would marueil that I make mention so often of Panormitan: for it is necessary to declare the matter in order as it was done.

Saint Hierome vnto Nepotianum de vita clericali.

Marke how politikely and sincerely he doth confute his aduersaries.

The bishop of Lubecke.

Conrade Wintzpergen Baron.

It happened in these matters, euen as it doth in warlike affaires: for as there, such as are most valiant and strong, and doe most worthie feats, obtaine most fame, as in the battell of Troy, Achilles and Hector: so in these spirituall wars and contentions, those which most excell in learning and eloquence, and do most then other, should be most renowned and named: for on the one part Panormitan was prince and captaine; on the other, Arelatensis: but his owne will made not the one captaine, but onely necessitie, for it behoued him to obey his prince. Notwithstanding he was not ignorant of the truth and veritie, neither did he resist willingly against it: for I haue seene him oftentimes in his librarie complaine of his prince, that he followed other mens councell. When as his time came to speake, he said that he did not a little marueil why the protectors of the faith, should require the prelats to haue a session, which was nothing pertaining to his office, and that he ought not to vsurpe the presidents place. And againe, he complained touching the contempt of the prelats, for the matter did presently touch the state of the apostolike see, and for that cause he see ought to be heard before any Session bee holden. Neither it is to be regarded (said he) that the councell of Constance saieth to haue decreed, that it should now be spoken of, forsomuch as pope Iohn was not heard at Constance, neither any man else, to speake for the see, by which words he seemed both to contemne and bring in doubt all the decrees of that most great and sacred Synode of Constance: therefore there was a great tumult, and all men cried out with one voice, saying: that the Synode of Constance is holy, and the authoritie thereof ought to be inuiolate. But he being still instant, with a stout and haughtie courage, affirmed, that the matter could not be finished without the ambassadors of the princes, and that the princes ought to be heard in a matter of faith. And againe, that the ambassadours themselues cannot consent, forsomuch as in the Colloquie holden at Mentz they had promised during the treatie of peace by them begun, they would receiue and allow nothing that the pope should either doe against the councell, or the councell against the pope: and that he doubted not, but that the three first conclusions declared Eugenius an heretike, insomuch that it was euident, that Eugenius did vehemently resist the two first. And therefore forsomuch as the Session was not perholden, and that it was lawfull for euery man before that Session to speake what he will, he desired and required them most instantly, that there might be no Session as yet holden. Vnto whom Arelatensis answered, that it was not to be doubted, but that the promoter of the faith, by his office might call the prelats to determine a matter of faith, and specially forsomuch as the deputation of the faith and the whole councell, had so giuen him in commandement.

Arelatensis answere to Panormitan. This deputation of faith, was the company of chosen men which did determine matters of faith.

No man hath heretofore more then Panormitant published the errours of Eugenius; whom he now so greatly defendeth.

The Session proclaimed.

Panormitan the Achilles of the Eugenianes, and Arelatensis the Hector of the councell.

As touching the prelats, hee saith, that albeit without all doubt bishops haue chiefe authoritie: yet notwithstanding it is accustomed in councels, not to make any conclusion in the name of the bishops, but in the name of the whole councell: and the vniuersall Church hath decreed certaine lawes in this councell, which should remaine inuiolate. Neither let the bishops thinke the presence of the inferiours grieuous vnto them, whenas oftentimes vnder a bare and torne coat, wisedome lieth hid: and vnder rich vestures and ornaments, follie lurketh. Bishops ought also to be mindfull of the saying of Domitius, which (as Saint Hierome reporteth) said: Why should I esteeme thee as a prince, if thou doest not regard mee as a Senator? For the bishops ought to esteeme priests as priests, if they will haue reuerence done vnto them as bishops. Neither ought the princes to be loked for, to the deciding of this matter, forsomuch as the Church is not congregated in the name of the princes, but in the name of Christ, which hath not receiued his power from princes, but immediatly from God: for to the defence thereof, he should perceiue the inferiours to be no lesse encouraged then the bishops, for that hee did well vnderstand and know, that they would not only spend their temporall goods, but also their liues for the defence thereof. As for some bishops, rather then they will lose any part of their temporalities, they will sell the libertie of the Church vnto the princes, and make them iudges and lords ouer the councell. As touching the acts at Mentz, hee doth not regard them, forsomuch as (as it is said) they accounted without their host: for hee saith, he doth not vnderstand how this can bee, that they had decreed neither to obay the pope, nor the councell. The one or the other they must needs bee obedient vnto: for there is no third tribunall, whereunto any obedience is due in these matters which concerne the faith and the saluation of soules: And finally, that the church would not suffer, that their affaires and matters of faith should bee determined by the iudgement of princes: for the holy Ghost is not subiect vnto princes, but princes vnto him: and vpon this conclusion hee would not feare, neither the losse of his goods, neither any death or martyrdome. And whereas Panormitane doth now shew himselfe so great a defender of Eugenius, he saith, that hee doth not a little marueil at it, for that in times past, no man hath more published Eugenius his errors then hee, whose especiall labour and counsell, both a decree monitorie, and also the suspension was admitted and set out against Eugenius: And now, whereupon this sudden change should come: hee saith, that he was bitterly ignorant, forsomuch as neither Eugenius had altered his life, neither could the church continue in such a schisme. Wherefore hee desired Panormitane diligently to consider, whether he spake according to his conscience or not: for (saith he) the conclusions which now shall bee decreed, are most generall: neither is there any mention in them of the pope: and moreouer the veritie of faith is contained in them: against the which if Eugenius did contend, it were more meet that the pope should bee corrected, then the veritie omitted. And thus he making an end all were wanting to come the next day vnto the Session. The protector also desired the sacred councell, that none should be suffered to bring any weapon to the Session. Forsomuch as he was readie to obserue the safe-conduct of the emperour, and together with the Senate of the citie, to prohibite all quarellers for doing of iniurie.

When the 16. day of May was come, all they whom the Session contented and pleased, assembled at the houre. The ambassadours also of the princes were come together into the quier of the Church, to attempt further what they could doe; and sending the bishop of Lubecke & Concense, and the deane of Turnon, an excellent learned man, they offered themselues to be present at the Session, if that the deposition of Eugenius might yet be deferred foure moneths. Who, when they had received a gentle answer of Arelatensis, and the other principals, returning again vnto the ambassadors, they would onely haue the first conclusion decreed, and thereupon sent againe vnto Arelatensis: vnto whom answere was made, that the chiefe force did consist in the two other conclusions, and that the councell would specially determine vpon them. If the ambassadours would not be present, they should vnderstand, that the concord was broken by them, which would not obserue that which they had offered. With which answere they departed, and the Session began to bee celebrate. There was no prelat of the Aragone present at it, neither out of Spaine, and out of Italie, onely the bishop of Bosticane, and the abbat of Dena, which for their constancie and stedfast good will toward the vniuersall church, could not be changed from their purpose: but of bodies and other inferiors, there were a great number of Aragons, and almost all the inferiors of Spaine and Italie, (for the inferiors feared not the princes, as the bishops did) and then the worthy stoutnesse of the Aragons and Cathelanes appeared in the inferiour sort, which would not thinke away in the necessitie of the church. Of the two other nations there were onely present twentie bishops. The residue lurked in their lodgings, professing the faith in their hearts, but not in their mouthes. Arelatensis considering afore what would come to passe, caused prayers to be made, and after their prayers made vnto almighty God, with teares and lamentation, that he would send them his holy spirit to aid and assist them, they were greatly comforted and encouraged. This congregation was famous, and albeit that there were not many bishops present, yet all the seats were filled with the bishops, prodors, archdeacons, presidents, priors, priests and doctors of both lawes, which I iudged to be about the number of 400. or more: amongst whom there was no noise, no chiding, no opprobrious words or contention, but one exhorted another to the profession of the faith, and there appeared a full and whole consent of them all to defend the Church. The bishop of Massilia a noble man, read the decree, which was attentiuely hearkened vnto, and not one word interrupted. When it was ended, Te Deum laudamus was sung with great ioy and gladnes, and so the session dissolued, which was in number the xxxij. session, and amongst all the rest the most quiet and peaceable.

Among 400. because that were present, there was not one all wroth.

The 33. Session.

The day following, being the xxij. of May, the princes ambassadors without all mens expectation, came vnto the generall congregation, by that their doing at the least, giuing their assent vnto the Session before passed. In celebrating wherof, if the fathers had erred, it had not been lawfull for the princes and ambassadors, to haue holden the councell with those fathers. But it was thought that they were touched with remorse of conscience, and euen now to detest and abhorre that which they had done: as it was not hidden to the ambassadors of the Empire and France. For the bishop of Lubecke said, that the cause of his absence was, for that hee was appointed by the emperours commandement, to intreat a peace: Wherefore it was not comely for him to be present at any businesse, thereby he should be vexed or troubled, with whom the peace should be intreated. Notwithstanding, he did much commend the Session before holden, and beleeued the decree therein promulgated to be most good and holy, and the veritie therein contained to be vndoubted; and said, that he would sticke thereunto both now and euer, euen to the death. But the bishop of Mannon, a man both learned and eloquent, speaking for him and his fellowes, said, that he heard how that they were euil spoken of amongst some, in that they had not honoured their king in that most sacred session, whom it becomned specially to exalt and defend the faith: which also for that cause aboue all other kings was named most Christian: notwithstanding, he said that they had a lawfull excuse, in that it was conuenient that they, which were sent to intreat peace, should doe nothing therby by their ambassage should be stopped or letted. Also there are two kinds of iniustice (said hee) whereby either things are done that should not bee done, or things that should bee done are not done. The first doth not alwaies bind, because it is conuenient to haue respect of time, place, and person. But the last doth alwaies bind, wherein he said, they were not culpable. But as touching the first point, they might seeme none to haue erred, because they were not present at the session: but yet in this point they had sufficient to answere, forsomuch as if they had been present at that session, they should haue been bunnet to haue intreated any peace with Eugenius: And therefore albeit they were wanting at so holie a business in that point they followed the example of Paul, which albeit he desired to be dissolued, and to be with Christ, yet for the further profit and aduancement of the Church, it was deferred. So likewise

In all Italy there were scarse the two prelats found which fought the commodities of the vniuersall Church, in Sigismunds time was none. Prayers made with teares.

Two kinds of iniustice.

wise he said, that they had now done, for that they were not absent because they doubted of the conclusions (which they judged to be most true and holy, and whereunto they would sticke euen unto the death) but because they would not be blamed: for the treatie of peace for which they came and yet that which they had not done in their owne persons, they had fulfilled (said he) by the seruants and houshold, whom altogether they commanded to reuerence that Session. I would that I had been then in the place of some great prelat; surely they should not haue gone unpunished, which thought to haue plaied so pope. For what doth the declaration of the truth hinder the treatie of peace? Or if it doe hurt, why is hee not counted as great an offender, which consenteth to him that declareth the truth, as he which both declare it? That shall we need any further testimonie for: now the ambassadors of the princes haue declared Eugenius to be an enemie unto the truth. But to passe ouer these things, it is sufficient that Eugenius wrote afterward unto the king of France, that hee did vnderstand the bishop of Tournon to become his enemie.

Arelatensis commendeth the ambassadors.

After that the bishop of Tournon had made an end, cardinall Arelatensis gaue thanks unto God, which had so defended his Church, and after great stormes and cloudes, had sent faire and cleare weather: and commending the good will of the emperour and the king of France toward the Church, he also praised the bishop of Lubeck and Tournon, for that oftentimes in the councell, and also of late at Mentz, they had defended the authoritie of the councell. But specially hee commended this their present doings, that they had openly confessed the truth, and had not sequestred themselues from the faith of the Church.

This councell was enstructed to take away the ambition of the bishops of Rome, that they should not think they may do all things according to their owne pleasure: and withdrawe themselues from the care of temporall things, which they regarded not.

Afterward, he entring into the declaration of the matter, said, that he was at Pysis and at Constance, and neuer saw a more quiet or deuout Session then this; affirming that this was not necessarie, to oppresse the ambition of the bishops of Rome, which exalting themselues aboue the vniuersall Church, thought it lawfull for them to doe all things after their owne pleasure, and that no one man from henceforth should transpost the councell from one place to another, as Eugenius attempted to doe, now to Bonomia, now to Florentia, then againe to Bononia, after to Ferraria, and after that againe to Florentia: and that hereafter the bishops should withdraw their minds from the carefulnes of temporall goods, (which as he himselfe did see) had no mind at all on spirituall matters: and therefore by how much this session was most holy and necessarie, by so much more the assent of the ambassadours was most laudable and acceptable to all the fathers. These words thus spoken, hee rose vp, and the congregation was dissolued.

The councell doth deliberate vpon the popes election.

Now after that Gabriel Condulmarius was deposed from the bishopricke of Rome, the principall fathers of the councell being called together in the chapter-house of the great Church consulted together, whether it were expedient that a new bishop should be created out of hand, or deferred for a time. Such as thought good that the election should bee done with speed, shewed how dangerous a thing it was for such a congregation to be without a head: also what a pestiferous sickines was on to be without a head: also what a pestiferous sickines was in all the citie, which not onely consumed young men and children but also men of middle age, and old men in like manner; and that this plague came first by strangers vnto the poze of the citie, and so infected the rich, and now was come vnto the fathers of the councell: amplifying moreouer, and encreasing the terros thereof, and making the thing worse then it was, as the manner is. Neither doth the decree (and they) any thing let or hinder, wherein it is prouided that there should be delay of 30. dates after the sees void: for that is to bee vnderstood when as the see is void, at such time as there is no councell holden: neither ought hee to tarrie or make any delay, lest the princes being perswaded by Gabriel, should resist: Unto whom the deposition of Gabriel, and the election of some other, is to be certified all vnder one message. The other thought good that there should bee a delay said: that the councell did lacke no head, forsomuch as Christ was the head thereof: neither did lacke a ruler, forsomuch as it was gouerned by the presidents and other officers: and that no mention should bee made of any pestilence in such case, seeing that, unto stout and strong men, death is not to bee feared, neither can any thing daunt or feare them which contend for the christian faith. As for that pestilence which doth now encrease and grow in the citie, forsomuch as iudgement is now giuen, it is to be hoped that it will asswage, which was thought to haue come for the neglecting of iustice. Also that in so doubtfull a matter, they ought rather to vse the princes against their will, then to neglect them: and that it is not to be feared, but that in this case, God will helpe those that are stout and valiant. The matter being thus discussed amongst them, (albeit that there were as many minds, as there were men) yet it seemed unto them all, that it was most profitable to chuse the bishop by and by, but most honest to deferre it.

Eu. Pius in vit. Eugenij.

Thereupon Iohn Segouius, a man of excellent learning said: God reuerend fathers, I am diuerly drawne by sundrie reasons, to this side and that. But as I waigh the matter more deepely in my mind, this is my opinion, that to come to a speedie election, it seemeth good, to speake after mans iudgement: but to delay it for two moneths, to speake after Gods iudgement, it seemeth much better. I doe iudge that not onelie the words, but also the meaning of our decree, ought to be obserued. Wherefore, if we will giue any credit vnto me, follow rather dangerous honestie, then secure vtilitie: albeit that indeed, vtilitie cannot be discerned from honestie. This opinion of delay take place among the fathers, and they determined to stay for the space of two moneths.

Dangerous honestie preferred before secure vtilitie.

In the meane time, messengers were sent vnto the princes to declare the deposition of Eugenius by the Synode, and publish it abroad.

During this time, the corrupt aire was nothing at all purged, but the mortalitie daily increasing, many died and were sicke. Whereupon a sudden feare came vpon the fathers. Neither were they sufficiently abused that they might not see: they thought it not to be without danger, either to depart or to tarry. Notwithstanding they thought it good to tary, and also they caused other to tarrie: that since they had ouercome famine, and the assaults of their enemies on earth, they would not seeme to shunke for the persecution of any plague or sickines. But forsomuch as they could not all be kept there, it was politikly prouided, that the councell should not seeme to be dissolued for any mans departure. And for the more establishment of the matter, there were certaine things read before the fathers, which they called De stabilimento, whose authoritie continued long time after. When as the dog-daies were come, and that all herbs withered with heat, the pestilence daily increased more and more, that it is incredible how many died. It was too horrible to see the coses hourely caried thorough the streets, when on euery side there was weeping, wailing and sighing. There was no house void of mourning: no mirth or laughter in no place, but matrons bewailing their husbands, & the husbands their wiues. Men and women went thorough the streets, and durst not speake one to another. Some tarried at home, and otherseme that went abroad, had perfumes to smell vnto to preserue them against the plague.

A great pestilence in Basil.

The common people died without number: and like as in the cold Autumne, the leaues of the trées doe fall; euen so did the youth of the citie consume and fall away. The violence of the disease was such, that ye should haue met a man merry in the street now, and within ten houres heard that hee had been buried. The number of the dead coses was such also that they lacked place to burie them in: insomuch that all the Churchyards were digged vp, and filled with dead coses, and great holes made in the parish churches, where as a great number of coses being thrust in together, they couered them ouer with earth. For which cause the fathers were to afraid, that there appeared no bloud in their faces: and specially the sudden death of Lodouicus the Protonotarie did make all men afraid, who was a strong man, and flourishing in age, and singularly learned in both lawes: whom the same enuious and raging sickneste take away in a few houres. By and by after died Lodouicus the Patriarke of Aquileia, a man of great age, and brought vp always in troubles and aduersitie, neither could he see the day of the popes election which he had long wished for: Notwithstanding hee take partly a consolation in that hee had seene Gabriel deposed before his death. This mans death was grieuous unto all the fathers, for now they said that two pillers of the councell were beraied and ouerthrowne, meaning the Protonotary and the Patriark, whether of the one by the lawe, and the other with his deeds defended the veritie of the councell.

Lodouicus the protonotary died of the plague.

About the same time also died the king of Aragons anner in Switzerland, a man of excellent learning, being bishop of Ebzon. The abbat of Vergilia died at Spyze, and Iohn the bishop of Lubeck, betweene Vienna and Buda.

These two last rehearsed, euen at the point of death, did this thing worthie of remembrance. When as they perceiued the houre of their death approch, calling vnto them certaine graue and wise men, said: That they be here present, pray to God that he will conuert such as knowledge Gabriel for high bishop, for in that state they cannot be saued: and professing themselues that they would die in the faith of the councell of Basill, they departed in the Lord. In Bohemie also departed the bishop of Constance, which was ambassadour for the councell. There was great feare and trembling throughout all the councell. There had been also in the councell, by a long time, the abbat of Dona, of the diocesse of Cumana, a man poze vnto the world, but rich vnto God, whom neither flatterings nor threatnings could turne away from his good purpose and intent, shuning rather to begge in the truth of the fathers, then to abound in riches with the false flattering aduersaries.

Whereupon, after the lords were departed, which gaue him his lining, he remaining still, was stricken with y plague and died. Likewise a great number of the registers and notaries died: and such as fell into that disease, few or none escaped. One amongst all the rest, AEneas Sylvius, being stricken with this disease, by Gods helpe escaped. This man lay three daies euen at the point of death, all men being in despaire of him: notwithstanding it pleased God to grant him longer life.

Eneas the historiographer escaped deadly sickne.

life. When as the pestilence was most feruent and hot, and that daily there died about one hundred, there was great intreatie made vnto cardinall Arelatensis, that hee would goe to some other towne or village neere hand: for these were the woods of all his friends and household: What doe you most reuerend father? At the least void this wane of the moone, and saue your selfe: who being safe, all we shall also bee safe: if you die, we all perish. If the plague oppresse you, unto whom shall we flee? Who shall rule vs? or who shall be the guide of this most faithfull flocke? The infection hath already inuaded your chamber. Your secretarie and chamberlaine are already dead. Consider the great danger, and saue both your self and vs. Neither the intreatie of his houshold, neither the cries of those which were dead could moue him, willing rather to preserue the councell with perill of his life, then to saue his life with perill of the councell: for he did know that if he should depart, few would haue tarried behind, and that deceit should haue been wrought in his absence.

The immouable constancie and fortitude of the cardinall Arelatensis.

Wherefore, like as in warres the souldiers feare no danger, when as they see their captaine in the middest of their enemies: so the fathers of the councell were ashamed to flie from this pestilence, seeing their president to remaine with them in the middest of all dangers. Which their doings did vtterlie subuert the opinion of them, which babled abroad, that the fathers tarried in Basill to seeke their owne profit and commoditie, and not the veritie of the faith: for there is no commoditie vpon the earth which men would change for their liues: for that all such as do serue the world, do preserre before all other things. But these our fathers shewing themselues an inuincible strong wall for the house of God, vanquishing all the craftie deceits which Gabriel vsed, and ouercomming all difficulties, which this most cruell and pestiferous yere brought vpon them, at the length all desires of life also being set apart, they haue ouercome all dangers, and haue not doubted with most constant minds to defend the veritie of the councell, euen vnto this present.

At the time of the decree being passed, after the deposition of Gabriel, it seemed good vnto the fathers, to proceed to the election of another bishop. And first of all they nominated those that together with the cardinals, should elect the pope. The first and principall of the Electos was the cardinall Arelatensis, a man of inuincible constancie, and incomparable wisedome: vnto whose vertue I may iustly ascribe what soeuer was done in the councell: for without him, the prelats had not persuered in their purpose, neither could the shadow of any prince haue so defended them. This man came not to the election by any fauor or denomination, but by his owne proper right. The rest of the Electours were chosen out of the Italian, French, Germaine and Spanish nations, and their cels and chambers appointed to them by lots, without respect of dignitie or person, and as the lots fell, so were they placed: Whereby it chanced a doctor to haue the highest place, and a bishop the last. Wherein the distribution of lots was very strange, or rather a diuine dispensation, reprooning the deuices of man, wherens the prelats had determined to haue the best chambers appointed for themselues, and had earnestlie contended before to haue their chambers appointed according to their dignitie.

The commendation of Arelatensis.

The councell of Darius.

The next day after, there was a Session holden, wherein Barrus a famous diuine, made an Oration vnto the Electors, wherein he reckoned vp the manifold crimes of Gabriel, which was deposed. He endeuoured to perswade the Electors to chuse such a man, which should in all points be contrarie vnto Gabriel, and eschew all his vices: that as hee, through his manifold reproches, was hurtfull vnto all men: so he which should bee chosen, should shew himselfe acceptable vnto all men, through iustice: and as Gabriel was couetous and full of rapine, so this man should shew himselfe continent.

There was so great a number of people gathered together to behold this matter, that neither in the Church, neither in the streets, any man could passe. There was present Iohn earle of Dierstein, who supplied the place of the emperours protector: also the Senators of the citie, with many other noble men, to behold the same, whereof you shall heare (if it shall willing) more largely hereafter. The citizens were without in armor, to prohibit that there should bend poze made. The Electors receiued the communion together, and afterwards they receiued their oth: and the Cardinall Arelatensis opening the booke of decrées, read the forme of the oth in the audience of all men, and first of all, he taking the oth himselfe, began in this manner.

The other Electors take their oth.

The godly oth of Arelatensis.

Most reuerend fathers, I promise, sweare and vow, before my Lord Iesus Christ (whole most blessed bodie I beleeue the truer haue receiued: vnto whom in the last iudgement I shall giue account of all my deeds) that in this businesse of election, whereunto now by the will of the councell wee are sent; I will seeke nothing else, then the only saluation of the Christian people, and the profit of the vniuersall Church. This shall be my whole care and studie, that the authoritie of the generall councels be not contemned, that the catholike faith bee not impugned, and that the fathers which remaine in the councell, bee not oppressed. This will I seeke for: this shall bee my care: unto this, with all my whole force and power, will I bend my selfe: neither will I respect any thing in this point, either for mine owne cause, or for any friend, but only God, and the profit of the Church. With this mind and intent, and with this heart will I take mine oth before the councell.

His words were liuely and fearefull. After him all the other Electors in their order, did sweare and take their oth. Then they went with great solemnitie vnto the Conclaue: where they remained seuen daies. The manner of their election was in this sort. Before the cardinals seat was set a bezle, whereupon there stood a basen of siluer: into the which basen all the Electors did cast their schedules: which the cardinall receiuing, read one by one, and foure other of the Electors wrote as hee read them.

A scrutinie is a plaine election by voices. Amedeus duke of Sauoy.

The tenor of the Schedules was in this maner: I Scotte, bishop of Aleene do chuse such a man, or such a man, for bishop of Rome, and peraduenture named one or two: euery one of the Electors subscribed his name vnto the Schedule, that he might thereby know his owne, and say nay, if it were contrarie to that which was spoken: whereby all deceit was vtterly excluded. The first scrutinie thus ended, it was found that there were many named to the papacie: yet none had sufficient voices, for that they there were xvii. of diuers nations nominate. Notwithstanding, Amedeus duke of Sauoy, a man of singular vertue, surmounted them all: for in the first scrutinie he had the voice of xvi. Electors, which iudged him worthie to gouerne the Church.

Prayer for direction and counsell.

After this, there was diligent inquisition had in the councel touching those which were named of the electors, and as euery mans opinion serued him, he did either praise or disco mmend those which were nominate. Notwithstanding there was such report made of Amedeus, that in the next scrutinie, which was holden in the Nones of Nouember, the said Amedeus had 27. voices, and likewise in the 3. and 4. scrutinie 27. voices. And forsomuch as there was none found in all the scrutinie to haue 2. parts, all the other schedules were burnt. And forsomuch as there lacked but onelie one voice to the election of the high bishop, they fell vnto prayer, desiring God that he would vouchsafe to direct their minds to an vnitie and concord, worthie to elect and chuse him which should take the charge ouer the flocke of God. Forsomuch as Amedeus seemed to be neerer vnto the papacie then all other, there was great communication had amongst them touching his life and disposition. Some said that a holy man ought not so suddenlie to be chosen for it would seeme a strange thing for a secular prince to be called vnto the bishoppicke of Rome: which would also too much derogate from the ecclesiasticall state, as though there were none therein meet or worthie for that dignitie. Other some said, that a man lately was married and had children, was vnmeet for such a charge. Otherlome againe affirmed, that the bishop of Rome ought to be a doctor of law, and an excellent learned man.

Let lying Poggius be admitted of his faithfull imitatour against Amideus.

When these words were spoken, other some rising vp, spake farre otherwise; that albeit Amedeus was no doctor, yet was he learned and wise, forsomuch as all his whole youth he had bestowen in learning and studie, and had sought not the name, but euen the ground of learning. Then said another: If ye be desirous to be instructed further of this princes life, I pray you giue eare vnto me, which doe know him thoroughly. Truly this man from his youth vpward, and euen from his young and tender yeeres, hath liued more religiously then secularly, being alwaies obedient to his parents and masters, and being alwaies indued with the feare of God, neuer giuen to any baretrie or wantonnesse: neither hath there at any time been any child of the house of Sauoy, in whom hath appeared greater wit or towardnesse; whereby all those which did behold and know his manners, iudged and foresaw some great matter in him: neither were they deceiued. For if ye desire to know his rule and gouernance, what and how noble it hath been: First know ye this, that this man hath raigned since his fathers decease, about fortie yeeres.

During those time, suffice, the table and quéene of all other vertues, hath alwaies flourished: For he hearing his subiects himself, would neuer suffer the poze to be oppressed, or the weake to be deceiued. He was the defender of the fatherlesse, the aduocate of the widowes, and protector of the poze. There was no reprine or robberie in all his territorie. The poze and rich liued all vnder one law, neither was he burthenous to his subiects, or impotune against strangers throughout all his Countrie: there were no grieuous exactions of money throughout all his dominion. He thought himselfe rich enough, if y inhabitants of his dominions did abound and were rich: knowing that it was the point of a good shepheard to cheare his shéepe, and not to deuoure them. In this also was his chiefe studie and care, that his subiects might liue in peace, and such as bordered vpon him might haue no occasion of grudge.

By which policies he did not onely quietly gouerne his fathers dominion, but also augmented the same by others, which willingly submitted themselues vnto him. Ner never made warre vpon any, but resisting against such as made warre vpon him, hee studied rather to make peace, then to seeke any reuenge, desiring rather to ouercome his enemies with benefits, then with the sword. He married onely one wife, which was thus a noble virgin, and of singular beautie and chastitie. She would haue all his family to keep their hands and eies chast, and continue it, and throughout all his house, honestie and integritie of manners was obserued. Then as his wife had changed her life, and that he perceiued his duchie to be stablished, and that it should come without any controuersie vnto his posteritie, he declared his mind, which was alwaies religious, and declare vnto God, and shewed that will and affection hee had long borne in his heart. For hee contemning the pompe and state of this world, calling vnto him his deare friends, departed and went into a wildernesse: where as building a goodly abbey he addicted himselfe wholly to the seruice of God, and taking his cradle vpon him, followed Christ. In which place hee being conuersant by the space of many yeeres, shewed forth great examples of holinesse, wearing no other garnements then such as could withstand the cold, neither tasting any kind of daintie fare, but only to resist hunger, watching and praying the most part of the night. Wherefore this prince is not meanly come vnto the Church (as some doe suppose) but being a Christian borne of progenitours, a thousand yeeres and more being Christians, doth now serue God in a monastery.

Conuersation of Amedeus pope elect.

So haue a wife is no let for a good man to be elected pope. Popes haue been married. Read the fifth epistle of Ignatius: and you shall see that the Apostles had wiues, and Baptista Mantuanus maketh mention how that Dionysius bishop of Heraclea had a wife.

But as touching that also which is spoken concerning a wife, I doe not regard it: whereas not onlie hee which hath had a wife, but hee also which hath a wife may bee elect and chosen pope. Wherefore why doe the doctors dispute, whether a married man chosen pope, ought to performe his dutie toward his wife, but only because a married man might be received and chosen? For as you know well enough, there were many popes that had wiues: and Peter also was not without a wife. But what doe we stand about this? for peraduenture it had been better that more priests had been married, for many should be saued through marriage, which are now damned through their single life. But hereof we will (saith he) speake in another place. But this seemeth vnto me, rather to be laughed at, then worthy any answer, which is obiected touching his children: for what can children (speciallie being of great age) be impediment or let vnto the father, being a bishop? Doth not the Scripture say, Woe be vnto him that is alone, for if he fall, he hath none to helpe him vp again? This cannot be imputed vnto the prince, for he hath two sonnes, both comelie and wise. Whereof the one is prince of Piemont, the other earle of the Gebennians: these men will rule the countrie of Sauoy in the absence of their father, and will helpe him, if he haue need, for they haue alreadie learned to rule ouer that people. I pray you what hurt is it for a bishop of Rome, to haue valiant children, which may helpe their father against tyrants? O most reuerend fathers, the more I doe behold the storme of this most peruerse and froward time, the more I doe consider the deuations and troubles which the Church is now tormented withall; I doe so much the more thinke it profitable, yea and necessarie, that this man should bee chosen prince and head: I will thinke that God hath shewed his mercie vpon vs, if I may see him haue the gouernance ouer this boat. I pray you consider into what straits wee are now driuen, with what perils wee are now vexed and tossed. What princes is it that is obedient vnto this councell? For some will not confesse that the councell is here, neither receiue our decrees: other some confesse it in their words, but by their deeds they declare it to be at Florence. For albeit that by their words and letters, they doe not denie that the Church is here, yet doe they procure promotions at the hands of Gabriel, which is deposed. This is the state of the Church: with these stormes and tempests the ship is shaken and broken: wicked children haue risen vp against their mother, which being vnmindfull of their mothers labours and kindnesse toward them, despise her, contemne her, and beat her. What is to be done herein? Shall we chuse a bare man, which shall rather be deuided of our princes, then had in reuerence? The dates are not now, that men haue respect onely vnto vertue: for (as the Satyricall poet writeth) vertue is praised, but is coldly followed. A poore man speaketh, and they aske what he is? Truly vertue is good: but for our purpose, it must bee marked and loked vpon, whether it bee in a rich man, or a poore man: you must chuse a gouerner, which may rule the ship not onelie by counsell, but by power also. The wind is great: Wherefore except the counsell be good, and the power strong, the ship shall be broken, and all put in danger. The memorials (as yet fresh) before our eies, that the princes do neglect the authoritie which is of no force or power. Is there not great valiantnesse shewed in this point, in that you fearing no perill or danger, either of life or goods, haue so long contended for the truth of Christ? But the most mightie and high God loketh downe from on high, and will resist this their pride. I haue often contended vnto their opinion, which said it was expedient, that the temporall dominions should be diuided from the Ecclesiasticall state: for I did thinke that the priests should thereby be made more apt to the diuine ministerie, and the secular princes more obedient to the clergie: But for so much as at this present, the Churches of the world are for so much as at this present, the Churches of the world are possessed, partly by Eugenius, and partly by other tyrants, we must prouide that we chuse such a one, which may recouer against the patrimonie of the Church, and in whom the office of Christs vicar may not bee contemned: through the shield of whose power, their contumacie may be suppressed, which contemne both vertue and reason. Whereunto no man seemeth vnto me more apt or meet, then Amadeus duke of Sauoy, which holdeth the one part of his possessions in Italie, and the other in France: Vnto whom all Christian princes are allied either by consanguinitie, or ioyned by amitie and friendship, and whose vertue, how famous it is, I haue alreadie declared. Why doe we then stay or doubt to chuse him: then whom Gabriel feareth no man more. Let him therefore perish with the sword wherewithall he hath stricken. There is no man which can more pacifie the Church then he. Doe you require deuotion in a bishop: there is no man more deuout then he. Doe you require prudence: Behold we vnderstand by his former life, what manner of man he is. If you seeke for iustice, his people are a witnes thereof: if that whether you seeke for vertue or power, al are here present before you. Wherefore doe you stay: Goe to I pray you: chuse this man. He will augment the faith, hee will reforme manners, and preserue the authoritie of the Church. Haue ye not heard these troubles of the Church to haue been afore spoken of, and that the time now present should be an end of all troubles: Haue ye not heard that about this time, there should a pope be chosen, which should comfort Sion, and set all things in peace? And tho I pray you should he bee that should fulfill these things, except we thinke this man: Beleeue me, these sayings must be fulfilled, and I trust that God will moue your mindes thereunto. Notwithstanding, doe what soeuer ye shall thinke meet good and holy.

Good it were that temporall dominions were diuided from the Church.

When he had spoken these words, the greatest number of the Electors seemed to consent vnto him, and his words tooke such effect, that in the next Scrutiny, the matter was finished and ended, and when the Scrutinie was opened, it was found that Amedeus, the most deuout duke of Sauoy, according to the decree of the councell, was chosen pope. Whereof so suddenlie there was great ioy and gladnesse amongst them, and all men highly commended their doings. Then the cardinall Arelatensis published vnto them the name of the elect bishop. After this, all the prelats in their robes, pontificalibus, and miters, and all the clergie of the citie comming vnto the concliane, the electors being likewise adorned, they brought them vnto the great Church, where as after great thanks giuen vnto God, and the election againe declared vnto the people, a Hymne being sung for ioy, the congregation was dissolued.

Amedeus Sylvius epist. 183.

Amedeus duke of Sauoy chosen pope.

This Amedeus aforesaid, was a man of reuerent age, of comelie stature, of graue and discret behauiour: also before married. Who thus being elected pope about Nouember, was called Felix the fifth, and was crowned in the citie of Basill, in the month of July. There twelue present at his coronation Lewes duke of Sauoy: Philip earle Gebennes. Lewes marques of Saluzze: The marques of Rotelen: Conrade of Winsperghey, chamberlaine of the Empire: The earle of Dierstein: The ambassadors of the cities of Strasbrough, Berne, Friburge, Solatorne, with a great multitude of other beside, to the viewe of 50000. persons. At this coronation, the popes two sons did serue and minister to their father. Lewes cardinall of Hostia did set on his head the pontificall diadem, which was esteemed at 30. thousand crownes. It were long here to recite the whole order and solemnitie of the procession, or the popes riding about the citie. First proceeded the pope in his Camahie of cloth of gold, hauing on his head a triple crowne, and blessing the people as he went. By him went the marques of Rotelen, and Conrade of Winsperge, leading his horse by the bridle. The procession finished, they went to dinner, which lasted foure full houres, being excellitely sumptuous: where the popes two sonnes were butlers to his cup: The Marques of Saluzze was the seward, &c.

The valuation of the popes crowne.

Of this Felix, thus writeth Aeneas Siluius in his third booke, that he being desired of certaine of the ambassadors, if he had any dogs or hounds to them: he willed them the next day to repaire vnto him, for he would then vnto them such as he had. When the ambassadours according to the appointment were come, hee shewed vnto them a great number of poore people and beggers sitting at his tables at meat, declaring, that those were his hounds, which he euery day vsed to feed: hunting with them (hee trusted) for the glorie of heauen to come.

And thus you haue heard the state of this councell hitherto, which councell endured a long season, the space of seuentene yeeres.

About the sixth yeere of the councell, Sigismund the emperour died, leauing but one daughter to succeed him in his kingdomes: vnto whom he had married to Albert the second duke of Austrich, which first succeeded in the kingdome of Hungarie and Boheme, being a foe aduersary to the Bohemians: and afterward was made Emperour, an. 1438. and raigned Emperour but two yeeres, leauing his wife which was Sigismund his daughter, great with child. After which Albert, succeeded his brother Frederike the third duke of Austrich, in the empire, &c. whereof more (Christ willing) hereafter.

Moreouer in one of the sessions of the said councell, the worthie cardinall Arelatensis is said thus to haue reported, that Christ was sold for thirtie pence: but I (said he) was sold much more deare. For Gabriel, otherwise called Eugenius pope, offered the same for thirtie thousand crowns, who so would take me, and present me vnto him. And they that take the said cardinall, afterward caused their fact by another colour, pretending the cause, for that the cardinals brother, what time the Armilues wasted Alsatia, had brought great damage to the inhabitants there, and therefore they thought (said they) that they might lawfully lay hands vpon a Frenchman, wheresoeuer they might take him. At length by the bishop of Strasbrough, Rupert, and the said citie, the matter was taken vp, and he released. And thus farre hauing proceded in the matters of this foresaid councell, vntil the election of Amedeus, called pope Felix the fifth, before we prosecute the rest, that remaineth thereof to be spoken, the order and course of times requireth to intermix withall the residue pertaining to the matters concluded betweene this councell and the Bohemians, declaring the whole circumstances of y ambassage, their articles, disputations, and answers, which they had first in the said councel, then in their owne countrie with the councels ambassadours: also with their petitions and answers vnto the same.

The zeale of the Bohemians flickered.

Touching the zeale of the Bohemians, how they being sent for, came vp to the councell of Basill, and how they appeared, and what was there concluded and agreed, partly before hath been expressed, pag. 604. Now as leisure serueth from other matters, to returne againe vnto the same, it remaineth to prosecute the rest that lacketh, to shew as both breuitie may be obserued, and yet the Reader not defrauded of such things, principally worthie in the same to be noted and knowne.

The Bohemians then (as is before declared) hauing alwaies the vpper hand, albeit they were accused by the new bishop Eugenius, yet it was thought good that they should be called vnto Basill, where as the councell was appointed. Whereupon cardinall Julian sent thither before, John Pulkmair doctour of the law, and John de Ragusio, a diuine. Who comming into Basill in the moneth of August, anno 1431. called by their letters vnto the councell, John, abbat of Selbrun, and John Gelhusius, monke of the same cloyster: which men for dexteritie of their wit, and experience and knowledge of countries, were very meet and necessarie for ambassages.

Within a few daies after, Julianus also came thither, as he had promised, and immediately sent out John Gelhusius, and Hannum Offenbourg, a Senatour of Basill, first vnto the emperour Sigismund being at Feldurch, and afterward vnto Frederike duke of Austrich, for the appeasing of the warres betweene him and Philip, duke of Burgonie. This done, to the intent that peace being had, not onely the ecclesiasticall prelats, but also the merchants might haue safe accesse vnto Basill, and so lying in all things necessarie for sustentation.

The Bohemians inuited to come to the councell.

They going on this ambassage, received letters from the Synode to be deliuered vnto the emperour Sigismund, whereby the Bohemians and Morauians, were called vnto the councell. These letters he by and by, caused to be carried into Boheme. But for so much as he himselfe went into Italie, to receive the Imperiall crowne of the bishop, hee left William duke of Bauaria, as his deputie, to bee protector vnto the councell. Furthermore, when as the Synode vnderstood that our men would take a peace with the Bohemians, after their most shamefull flight, they sent John Piderius a diuine, and John Gelhusius, to conduct the people which ioyned vpon Boheme, and sarnestlie to moue the Morauians and Bohemians, which were before called, to come vnto the councell.

They departing from Basill about the end of October, took their iourne toward Monacum, a towne of Bauaria: where, after they had saluted William duke of Bauaria and his brother Ernestus, and Albert the sonne of Ernestus, and had declared the communion of their ambassage, and had shewed vnto duke William, how that affaire as he should come vnto Basill, the protection of the councell should bee committed vnto him by the emperour: they exhorted Frederike, marques of Brandenberg, and John duke of Bauaria, the Senate of Noremberge, and other princes and lords, partly by letters from the councell, and partly by words of mouth, that they should by no meanes take any truce with the Bohemians, for that it might be hurtfull vnto the Church, and said they should haue aid out of hand. They desired them also in the name of the councell, that if the Bohemians would send their ambassadors vnto Basill, they would guide them, euery man though his countrie in safetie: which they promised to doe. It is incredible how all men reioyced, that the Bohemians were sent for.

The ambassadors of the Bohemians, and of the councell meet together at Egra.

After this, when as they counselled with the Senat of Noremberg, touching the sending of the councels letters vnto Boheme, it seemed best, first of all to inquire of the rulers of Egra, whether the Bohemians had made any answere to the former letters of the councell which they had sent. The rulers of Egra being aduertised by these letters, sent him which preached the councels letters into Boheme, vnto Noremberg. He reported holo reuerently the councel of the greater city of Egra, to haue read the letters, and how he was rewarded.

Whereupon they conceiued great hope of the good successe of the ambassage. Therefore the ambassadours biing the councell of the Senat of Noremberge, and diuers others, sent the messenger backe againe into Egra, with their owne private letters, and with letters of the councell: for there was no better meane to send the letters into Boheme. Much trauell was taken by them of Egra, Frederike marquesse of Brandenberge, and John duke of Bauaria, in this matter, for that they were very desirous that peace might bee had amongst all Christians. The copie of those letters, whereby the Synode did call the Bohemians into the councell, and other letters exhortatorie of the ambassadours, and the Bohemians answere vnto the same, for breuities cause wee haue here preterminted. The Bohemians not in all points trusting into the ambassadours, required by their letters, that the councels ambassadors with the other princes, would come into Egra, where as their ambassadours should also be present, to intreat vpon the safe conduct and other matters.

The Bohemians labour to come to the councell.

The day was appointed for the meeting, the sunday after Easter, which was the twentie seuen day of Aprill. Then came the ambassadours of the councell into Egra, with the noble princes, Frederike Marquesse of Brandenberge, and John duke of Bauaria, with other nobles, almost to the number of 500. horse. But none of the Bohemians were present, because the inhabitants of Pilsana, and the lord Swamberginus had not sent their safe conduct. When they vnderstood this by their letters, they brought to passe that the ambassadours of the Bohemians, Nicolaus Pumpeltzius, secretary of the greater citie of Prage, and Matthew Clumpezane, president of Pisela, should be brought forth by them of Egra, and the Glenbogenses, and so they came into Egra with nineteene horse, the eighth day of May. The next day after, Henry Toegre receiued the Bohemian ambassadours before the marquelle, with an eloquent oration, taking this part of the Gospell for his Theame. Pax vobis. i. Peace bee with you. Then they propounded what great inuries they had hitherto receiued at their hands, which was the cause of so many great slaughters on either partie, and that they were glad that yet now at the length there was some hope that they should bee heard.

After

The Bohemians require pledges.

After this, they conferred as touching the safe-conduct. The Bohemians required pledges, and that not of the common sort, but princes and nobles. Which thing, forsomuch as it did not content the ambassadors, and that the matter should so be put off, the common people of Egra began to crie out that it was long of the ecclesiasticall princes, that a concord was not made with the Bohemians: Then Frederiche marquesse of Brandenberge, and John duke of Bauaria, bound themselues of their owne good will. The like also did William duke of Bauaria, at the request of the councell. Likewise also did the councell and the emperour Sigismund. Furthermore promise was made, that all the princes and cities, should doe the like, thorough whose dominion they should come, and the citie of Basill also. The copie of which safe-conduct was afterward sent vnto Prage. This also was required by the Bohemians, that if it were possible, the emperour should be present at the councell.

Princes bound to the Bohemians.

The Bohemians require the emperour to be present at the councell.

This convention at Egra continued iij. daies. But the Bohemians, albeit they heard the councels ambassadors make great promises, yet did they not fully giue credit vnto them. Whereupon they chose out two ambassadors, Nicolas Pelgolitius, and John Zacensis, which should goe to Basill, and diligently enquire out all things. These men, Conrade bishop of Ratisbone, and Conrade Segelauer Deane of Stetin brought vnto Cattelspurge, where as the marques diuelt, being sent out by the Synode a little before, to enquire whether the Bohemian ambassadors would come or not. When they were come to Viberacke, one being ouercurious inquired of one of the Bohemian ambassadors, of what countrie he was. He answered that he was a Zacyen. There (said he) are most detestable heretickes and naughtie men, &c. Who for that slanderous word, as a breaker of the truce, was straightway carried to prison, and there should haue suffered more punishment, if the Bohemian ambassadors, and the abbat of Ebera, had not interated for him. When they came vnto Basill, they were honorably receiued with wine and fish. They tarried there fiue daies and a halfe. The tenth day of October, they came vnto the Synode, which was assembled at the Friers Augustines.

These ambassadors when as they were returned home with the charter of the Synode, and declared those things which they had seene, and that the matter was earnestly handled without fraud or deceit; there were ambassadors chosen to be sent vnto the councell, both for the kingdome of Bohemie, and the marquesdome of Moravia, which comming vnto Eulca, were brought from thence, with xxvti. horse, and diuers noble men, vnto Gambia. From thence they came to Sivenkendorph, and so vnto Norenberge, where as beside their entertainement of wine and fish, xvti. horsemen accompanied them vnto Ulmes: from thence they of Ulmes brought them vnto Viberacke, and Sulgoria: there Iames Tuches a knight receiuing them, brought them to Stockacum, and from thence the bandes of the duke of Bauaria, brought them vnto Schafhuse. There they taking ship the fourth day of Ianuarie, came vnto Basill the ninth day of the same month. What were the names of these ambassadors of the Bohemians, which were brought by with three hundred horse, and how they were received at Basill, mention is made before, pag. 604. When as they came vnto the Synode, cardinall Iulian madeas Oration, that he that euer was in any place in doubt, the same ought to be determined by the authoritie of the councell, forsomuch as all men are bound to submit themselues to the iudgement of the holy Church, which the generall councell doth represent. Which oration was not allowed of all the Bohemians.

Then Rochezanus made an Oration, requiring to haue a day appointed when they should be heard, which was appointed the xvi. day of the same month. Vpon which day, John Rochezanus hauing made his preface, began to propound the first article, touching the communion to bee ministred vnder both kinds, and disputed vpon the same by the space of three daies allwaies before mone. Then Wenceslaus the Thabozite disputed vpon the second article, touching the correction and punishing of sinne, by the space of two daies. After whom Ulbaricus priest of the Orphanes propounded and disputed vpon the third article by the space of two daies, touching the free preaching of the word of God.

The first article of the Bohemians by the first ambassadour.

The second article of the Bohemians by the second ambassadour.

The third article of the Bohemians by the third ambassadour.

Last of all, Peter Paine, an Englishman, disputed three daies vpon the fourth article, touching the ciuill dominion of the clergie, and afterward gaue copies of their disputations in writting vnto the councell, with heartie thanks that they were heard. The three last did somewhat inueigh against the councell, commending John Hus and John Wicklife for their doctrine. Whereupon John de Ragusio a diuine, rising vp, desired that he might haue leaue to answer in his owne name, to the first article of the Bohemians. The councell consented thereunto: so that by the space of viti. daies in the forenoone, he disputed thereupon. But before he began to answere, John the abbat of Sifferia made an oration vnto the Bohemians, that they should submit themselues to the determination of the holy Church, which this councell doth represent. This matter did not a little offend the Bohemians. John Ragusinus a diuine, after schollers fashion, in his answer spake often of heresies and of heretickes. Procopius could not suffer it, but rising vp with an angrie stomach, complained openly to the councell of this iniurie. This our countrie man (saith hee) doth so great iniurie, calling vs oftentimes heretikes. Then vnto Ragusinus answered: forsomuch as I am your countreyman both by tongue and nation, I do the more desire to reduce you againe vnto the Church. Hee was a Dalmatian borne, and it appeareth that the Dalmatians going into Bohemie, take their name by their country which they possessed. It came almost to this point, that through this offence, the Bohemians would depart from Basill, and could scarsse bee appeased. Certaine of the Bohemians would not heare Ragusinus finish his disputation.

The Bohemians displeased with Ragusinus.

The comming of the legates to Prage.

After him a famous diuine, one Egidius Carlerius, deane of the Church of Cambray, answered vnto the second article, by the space of foure daies. To the third article answered one Henricus, surnamed Frigidum ferrum, three daies together. Last of all, one Johannes Polomarius, master of the requests of the palace, answered vnto the fourth article likewise by the space of three daies, so that the long time which they bled in disputations, seemed tedious vnto the Bohemians. Notwithstanding this answere, the Bohemians still defended their articles, and specially the first, insomuch as John Rochezanus did strongly impugne Ragusinus answer by the space of three daies. But forsomuch as one disputation bred another, and it was not perceiued how that by this meanes any concord could be made; the prince William duke of Bauaria, protector of the councell, attempted another remedie, that all disputations being set apart, the matter should bee friendly debated.

Ex Cochleo, hist. lib. 7.

There were certaine appointed on either part to intreat vpon the concord: who comming together the eleuenth day of March, those which were appointed for the councell, were bidden to say their minds. It seemeth good, said they, if these men would be united vnto vs, and bee made one bodie with vs, that this bodie might then accord, declare and determine all manner of diuersities of opinions and sects, what is to bee beleeued or done in them.

Certaine chosen on both sides to determine the matter.

The Bohemians, when they had a while paused, said: this way seemed not apt enough, except first of all, the foure articles were exactly discussed, so that either we should agree with them, or they with vs, for otherwise it would be but a friuolous matter, if they now being united, againe disagree in the deciding of the articles. Here answere was made to the Bohemians, that if they were rightly united, and the aid of the holy Ghost called for, they should not erre in the deciding of the matter, forsomuch as euery Christian ought to beleeue that determination: which if they would doe, it should breed a most firme and strong concord and amitie on either part. But this answer satisfied them not, insomuch, that the other three rose vp, and disputed against the answers which were giuen. At this time cardinall Iulian president of the councell, made this Oration vnto the Bohemian ambassadors.

The oration of cardinall Iulian.

This sacred Synode, saith he, hath now by the space of ten daies, patiently heard the propositions of your foure articles; and afterward hee answered: you haue propounded, saith hee, foure, articles, but wee vnderstand that beside these foure, you haue many other strange doctrines, wherein ye dissent from vs. Wherefore it is necessarie, if that a perfect vnitie and fraternitie shall follow betweene vs, that all these things be declared vnto the Councell, to the end that by the grace of the holy Ghost, which is the author of peace and truth, due prouision may be made therein. For we haue not gathered these things of light coniectures, but haue heard them of credible persons, and partly here are some present, which haue seene them with their own eies in Boheme, and partly we doe gather it by your owne report: For master Nicolas, which was the second that did propound, amongst other things alleaged, that I. Wicklife was an euangelicall doctor. If we beleeue him to be a true doctor, it followeth, that you must repute his workes as authentike: If ye doe not so thinke, it is reason that it should be opened vnto vs.

Nicolas the second propounder, charged by the cardinall, for commending of Iohn Wicklife.

Wherefore we desire you, that you will certifie vs vpon these and certaine other points, that you doe beleeue, or that credite you doe giue vnto them. But we doe not require that you should now declare your reasons, but it shall satisfie vs, if you will answer vnto euery article by this word, Credimus, aut non credimus: that is, We beleeue, or beleeue not: Which if you will doe (as we trust you will) then we shall minister vnto you all things necessarie, that you desire that wee should conceiue a good estimation of you. If it be any thing, wherein you would be certified by vs, arise it boldly, and we will giue you an answere out of hand: For we are readie according to the doctrine of Saint Peter, to render account vnto euery man which shall require it, touching the faith which we hold. Hereunto the Bohemian ambassadors answered in few words, that they came only to propound these foure articles, not in their owne name, but in the name of the whole kingdome of Boheme, and speake no more. Whereupon, William the noble protector of the councell, calling vnto him foure men on either part, intreated touching the pacifying of the matter, whose aduice, the councell decreed to send a famous ambassade, with the Bohemian ambassadours vnto Prage, where as the people should assemble vpon Sunday. But they would not receiue these conditions of peace which were offered, but made haste to depart. Whereupon the foureteenth day of Aprill, there were ten chosen out of the councell, to go with the Bohemian ambassadours vnto Prage.

John Rochezanus replieth against the first article.

The ambassadours of the Bohemians returne without agreement.

It were too long here to declare what honour was done vnto these ambassadors, all the way in their iourney, and specially when they came vnto Boheme, by the citizens of Prage, when as a great number of Bohemians were assembled at Prage at the day appointed, both of the clergie, nobility and common people.

After the comming of those ambassadours, much contention began to rise betweene the parties. First began John Rochezanus: who speaking in the publike person of the communalty, laboured to commend and preferre the foure berities of the Bohemians before propounded: charging also the prelates and priests for their slanderous obtrectations, and vndeserued contumelies, wherewith they did infame the noble kingdome of Boheme, complaining also that they would not receiue those christian veritics, left and allowed by their king Wenceslaus, now departed. Wherefore he required them in the behalfe of the whole nation, that they would leaue off hereafter to oppresse them in such sort, that they would refraine to frame against their Iosephs bedsure, that is, the ornament of their god fame and name, whereof their brethren, their enemies had spoiled them, &c.

Polomar answereth to the Bohemians.

To this Polomar maketh answere againe, with a long and curious oration, exhorting them to peace and vnity of the church, which if they would embrace, all other obstacles and impediments (said he) should bee soone removed, promising also that this their bedsure of honour and fame, should be surely reposed againe: and afterward, if there were any doubtfull matters, they might and should be the better discussed.

The Bohemians reply against Polomar.

But all this pleased not the Bohemians, vnlesse they might first haue a declaration of their foure articles, which if they might obtaine, they promised then to embrace peace and concord. Which peace (said they) began first to bee broken by themselues, in that the councell of Constance by their vniust condemnation, burned John Hus, & Hierome of Prage, and also by their cruell bulls and censures, raised vp first excommunication, then warre against the whole kingdome of Boheme.

Polomar extolleth the councels. Generall councels may erre and haue erred.

Heeremto Polomar reclaiming againe, began to aduance and magnifie the honour and dignity of generall councels. To conclude, as much as the said Polomar did extoll the authority of the councels, so much did the aduocate of the Bohemians extenuate the same: saying that the latter councels which are not expressed in the law of God, haue erred, and might erre, not onely in faith, but also in maners. For that which hath chanced to the greene wood, may also chance vnto the drie: But of other, the most strong pillers of the militant church, the apostles I meane: seeme all to haue erred, and the catholicke faith to haue remained three daies sound and incorrupt onely in the virgin Mary. No christian man therefore ought to bee compelled to stand to the determination of the pope or the councell, except it be in that, which is plainely expressed in the law of God. For it is euident that all the generall councels which haue beene of long time, haue reformed very fewe things as touching the faith, peace, and maners of the church: but haue alwaies both in their life and decrees, notoriously swarued, and haue not established themselues vpon the foundation, which is Christ. Wherefore the said Bohemians protested, that they would not simplie and plainely (God being their good Lord) yeeld themselues to their doctrine, not to such rash and hastie decrees: lest through that their hastie and vncircumspect submission, they should bind their faith and life, contrary to the wholesome and sound doctrine of our Lord Christ Iesus. In sum, in no case they would enter into any agreement of peace, except their foure articles which they conceiued for euangelicall veritics, were first accepted and approued. Which being obtained (said they) if they would condescend with them in the verity of the Gospel, so would they ioyne together, and be made one with them in the Lord, &c. Ex Cochleo hist. Lib. 7.

The Bohemians reclaime against Polomar.

Ex Cochleo hist. lib. 7.

When the ambassadours saw the matter would not otherwise be brought to passe, they required to haue those articles deliuered vnto them in a certaine forme, which they sent vnto the councell by three Bohemian ambassadors.

The ambassadours of the councell and the Bohemians could not agree.

Afterward the councell sent a declaration into Boheme, to be published vnto the people, in the common assemblies of the king dome, by the ambassadours, which were commanded to repost vnto the Bohemians, in the name of the councell, that if they would receiue the declaration of those three articles, and the vnity of the church, there should be a meane found whereby the matter touching the fourth article, of the communion vnder both kinds, should be passed with peace and quietnesse.

A declaration of 3. articles promised to the Bohemians by the councell.

A prudent answere of the Bohemians to the cardinall Iulian.

They propounded in Prage, in an open assemblie of the nobles and commons, the declarations of the three articles in forme following.

A declaration of the councell to the Bohemians, concerning the first three articles.

Forsomuch as touching the doctrine of the verity, wee ought to proceed soberly and warely, that the truth may be declared, with words being so orderly conceiued and vttered, that there be no offence giuen to any man, whereby he should fall or take occasion of errour, and (to vse the words of Isidore) that nothing by obscurity be left doubtfull: whereas you haue propounded touching the inhibition and correction of sinnes in these words: All mortall sinnes, and specially open offences ought to bee rooted out, punished, and inhibited, by them whose duety it is so to doe, reasonable and according to the law of God: here is to be marked and vnderstood, that this word (whose dutie it is) is too generall, and may be an offence: and according to the meaning of the Scripture, we ought not to lay any stumbling stocke before the blind, and the ditches are to be closed vp, that our neighbours ore doe not fall therein: all occasion of offences is to be taken away. Therefore wee say that according to the meaning of the holy Scripture, and the doctrine of the holy Doctours, it is thus vniuersally to be holden: that all mortall sinnes, especially publicke offences, are to be rooted out, corrected and inhibited, as reasonable as may be, according to the law of God, and the institutions of the fathers. The power to punish these offenders, doth not pertaine onto any priuate person, but onely vnto them which haue iurisdiction of the law ouer them, the distinction of law and iustice, being orderly obserued.

The 2 proposition propounded by the Bohemians, with the declaration from the councell.

Punishing of publike offence how and by whom.

As touching the preaching of the word of God, which article you haue alledged in this forme, that the word of God should be freely and faithfully preached by the fit and apt ministers of the Lord: left by this word (freely) occasion may be taken of disordred liberty, which as you haue often said you doe not meane) the circumstance thereof is to be vnderstood: and we say, that (according to the meaning of the holy Scripture, and doctrine of the holy Fathers) it is thus vniuersally to be beleeued: that the word of God ought freely, but not euery where, but faithfully and orderly, to be preached by the priests and Rectors of the Lord, being allowed and sent by their superiors, into whom that office appertaineth, the authority of the bishop alwaies reserued, who is the prouider of all things according to the institution of the holy fathers.

The 3. article of the Bohemians with the declaration from the councell.

Liberty of preaching, how fine and to whom it extendeth.

As concerning the last article expressed vnder these words, It is not lawfull for the christian clergie, in the time of the law of grace, to haue dominion ouer temporall goods: we remember that in the solemne disputation holden in the sacred councell, he which was appointed by the councel to dispute, propounded two conclusions in this sort.

The 4. article of the Bohemians with the declaration from the councell.

Temporall possessions in the clergie mens hands.

First, that such of the clergie as were not religious, and had not bound themselues thereunto by a vow, might lawfully haue and possesse any temporall goods: as the inheritance of his father or any other, if it be left vnto him, or any other goods iustly gotten by meanes of any gift or other lawfull contract, or else some lawfull act.

The second conclusion: The church may lawfully haue and possesse temporall goods, moueable and immoueable, houses, lands, townes, and villages, castles and cities, and in them a priuate and ciuill dominion. Your ambassadour which disputed against him, granted those conclusions, saying that they did not impugne the sense of his article, being well vnderstood, forsomuch as he vnderstandeth this article, of ciuill dominion formally meant. Whereby, and also by other things, it may be vnderstood, that those words, to haue secular dominion expressed in the foresaid article, seemeth to bee referred to some speciall maner or kind of dominion. But forsomuch as the doctrine of the church is not to bee intreated vpon by any ambiguous or doubtfull words, but fully and plainely: therefore we haue thought good more plainely to expresse that, which according to the law of God, and the doctrine of the holy Doctours, is vniuersally to be beleeued: that is to say, the two aforesaid conclusions to be true. And also, that the clergie ought faithfully to distribute the goods of the church, whose administrators they are, according to the decrees of the holy fathers: and that the disrpation of the administration of the church goods, done by any other then by them, into whom the administration is canonically committed, cannot be without guilt of sacriledge.

The Bohemians stand hard for their temporall iurisdiction.

Thus the sacred councell (said they) hath diligently gone about according to the verity of the Gospell, all ambiguity set apart, to expound the true sense of the three foresaid articles. Wherefore, if there doe yet remaine any doubt according to the information which we haue receiued in the sacred councell, we are ready by Gods helpe (who is the principall verity) to declare the truth vnto you: If ye doe receiue and embrace the declaration of the said three articles, which is grounded vpon the verity of the holy Scripture, as you are bound, and will effectually haue a pure, simple, and perfect vnity, touching the libertie of the communion vnder both kinds, which you desire and require, which also you cannot lawfully haue, without the licence of holy church: wee haue authority from the generall councell, by certaine meanes, to intreate and conclude with you, trusting that you will shew your selues as you will continue.

The Bohemians take a deliberation of the fourth article.

These things thus declared, after the Bohemians had taken deliberation, they said that they would giue no answere

A declaration of the councell touching the fourth article of the communion.

Consecrat. dist. 2. quia passus.

This is to be set by the cleared sense of the Scripture.

The holy communion requireth amendment of life.

Holie things moouing prophe the wicked.

The receiuing of the sacraments.

Receiuing in both one kind, for auoiding two perils.

Great grounded vpon error.

Causes why to minister vnder one kind.

vnto the premisses, before they vnderstood what should be offered them as touching the communion. Wherefore, it shall be necessarie to declare the matter, as it was written in forme following.

In the name of God and our Sauiour Iesus Christ, vpon the Sacrament of whose most blessed last supper we shall intreate, that he which hath instituted this most blessed sacrament of vnitie and peace, will vouchsafe to worke this effect in vs, to make vs that we may be one in the said Lord Iesu our head, and that hee will subuert all the subtilties of the diuell, which through his enuious craftinesse, hath made the sacrament of peace and vnity, an occasion of warre and discord, that whilest Christians doe contend touching the maner of communicating, they be not depriued of the fruit of the communion. Whereupon saint Augustine in his sermon vpon infants, in the decrees Decons. distinct. 2. Quia passus, saith thus: So the Lord Iesu Christ certified vs and willed, that wee should appertaune vnto him, and consecrate the mysterie of our peace and vnitie vpon the table. He that receiueth the mysterie of vnitie, and doth not keepe the bond of peace, doth not receiue a mysterie for himselfe, but a testimony against himselfe. This we thought good aboue all things to bee premised, that the generall custome of the church, which your fathers and you also in times past haue obserued, hath along time had and still vseth, that they which do not consecrate, continue their order vnder the kind of bread. Which custome being lawfully brought in by the church and holy fathers, and now a long time obserued, it is not lawfull to reiect, or to change at your will and pleasure, without the authority of the church. Therefore to change the custome of the church, and to take in hand to communicate vnto the people vnder both kinds, without the authority of the church, is altogether vnlawfull. For holy church vpon reasonable occasions, may grant liberty to communicate vnto the people vnder both kinds. And euery communion, which, being attempted without the authority and licence of the church, should bee vnlawfull, when it is done with the authority of holy church, shall be lawfull; if other things let it not: because (as the apostle saith) he that eateth and drinketh vnworthily, eateth and drinketh his owne damnation.

Whereupon saint Iohn in the second distinct. vpon the consecration, writeth thus: They which line wickedly and cease not daily to communicate in the church, thinking thereby to be cleansed, let them learne that it doth nothing at all profit them to the cleansing of their sinnes. And saint Augustine in the same distinction saith. Holy things may hurt the euill, for vnto the good they are saluation, but vnto the euill, damnation. There are besides this, many other authorities. The apostle Iudas was amongst them which did first communicate, but forsomuch as hee receiued vnworthily, hauing that sinne of treason in his heart, it did profit him nothing, but the diuell by and by entred into the more power and authority ouer him. This is declared by a great reason: Which of you is it, that if you should receiue your Lord into your house, would not with all diligence and care studie to make cleane and adorne his house, that he may receiue the lord honestly? much more he that shall receiue the Lord and Sauiour into the house of his soule, ought diligently to make cleane and decke his soule, to cleanse it by the sacrament of penance, with sorrow and contrition of heart, humblie, purely, and truely confessing his sinnes, and receiuing due satisfaction and penance, to adorne and decke the same with the purple or rich array of deuotion, that the heart being so purged and adorned with feruent desire, he may come to that most holy sacrament, whereby God reconcileth all the world vnto him.

Wherefore, the most sacred Synode admonisheth, exhorteth, and commandeth, that all priests should diligently exhort and admonish the people, and that they should vse all their care and endeauour, that no man come to that most blessed sacrament, except he bee duely prepared with great reuerence and deuotion, lest that which is receiued for the saluation of the soule, redound to the condemnation, through the vnworthy receiuing thereof.

Moreouer, Doctors doe say, that the custome of communicating vnto the people, onely vnder the kind of bread, was reasonablie introduced by the church and holy fathers, for reasonable causes, specially for the auoiding of two perils: of error and vnreuerence. Of error, as to thinke that the one part of Christs body were in the bread, and the other part in the cup, which were a great error. Of vnreuerence, forsomuch as many things may happen, as wel on the one part of the minister, as on the part of the receiuer: As if is said that it happened when as a certaine priest carrying the sacrament of the cup vnto a sicke man, which he should haue ministred, he found nothing in the cup, being all spilt by the way, with many other such like chances. We haue heard moreouer, that it hath often happened, that the sacrament consecrate in the cup, hath not bin sufficient for the number of communicants, wherevpon a new consecration must bee made, which is not agreeable to the doctrine of the holy fathers, and also that oftentimes they doe minister vnto vnconsecrate for consecrate wine, which is a great perill. By this meanes then it shall be brought to passe, that if you will effectually receiue the vnity and peace of the church, in all other things besides the vse of the communion vnder both kinds, conforming your selues to the faith and order of the vniuersall church, you that haue that vse and custome, shall communicate still by the authority of the church vnder both kinds, and this article shall be discussed fully in the sacred councell, where you shall see that as touching this article, is to be holden as an vniuersall verity, is to be done for the profit and saluation of the christian people, and all things being thus throughly handled, then if you persuere in your desire, and that your ambassadours do require it, the sacred councell will graunt licence in the Lord, vnto your ministers, to communicate vnto the people vnder both kinds: that is to say, to such as be of lawfull yeeres and discretion, and shall reuerently and deuoutly require the same, this alwaies obserued, that the ministers shall say vnto those which shall communicate, that they ought stiffely to beleeue not the flesh only to be contained vnder the forme of bread, and the blood only vnder the wine, but vnder each kind to be wholie and perfect Christ.

Receiuing in both kinds permitted to the Bohemians.

The condition annex. 2.

Thus hitherto we haue declared the decree of the councell. As touching the other doubts and questions which were afterward moued by the maisters and prelats of Boheme, the ambassadours of the councell answered thus.

Doubts & questions of the Bohemians.

Answere. Permission of both kinds granted to the Bohemians, not of sufferance, but by full authority.

First they said, that it was not the meaning of the sacred councell, to suffer the communion vnder both kinds by toleration, or as the libell of disagreement was permitted to the Iewes: forsomuch as the councell intending euen to open the bowels of motherly charity, and pity, vnto the Bohemians and Bozaians, doth not meane to suffer it with such kind of sufferance, which should not exclude sinne, but so to grant it, that by the authority of our Lord Iesus Christ, and of his true spouse the church, it may bee lawfull, profitable and healthfull vnto those which worthily receiue the same. Also, as touching that which was spoken by the said Bohemians of the punishing of offences, that it is in the Scriptures, how that God oftentimes stirreth vp the hearts of priuate persons to the correcting and punishing of sinnes, and so it should seeme lawfull vnto the inferiours to correct and punish their superiours: they answered, alledging the text of saint Augustine in the 24 and 33 tirth decree: He that striketh wicked men in that they are wicked, and hath cause of death against them, is the minister of God: but he which without any publike administration or office murthereth or maimeth any wicked theefe, sacrilegious, adulterous or periured person, or any other offender, shall be iudged as an homicide, and so much the more charpely, in that he dares not to abuse and vsurpe the power not granted him of God: and truely, this city would take it much more grieuously, if any priuate man should attempt to punish an offender, and set vp a gallowes in the street, and there hang him, then if one man should kill another in brawle or quarrell. They alledged also other texts of saint Ambrose and saint Hierome agreeable to the same. They said that no man doubteth that the law of God is duly and holily appointed, and therein is simple written, Thou shalt not steale. And notwithstanding by the commandement of God the children of Israel carried away the goods of the Egyptians, which they had borrowed of them. Also in the same law it is plainely written, thou shalt do no murther. Whereupon saint Austin in his first booke De Ciuitate Dei, prooueth that it is not lawfull for any man to kill himselfe: when as he maketh example of Samplon, he answereth with these words: when as God commandeth and doth affirme himselfe to command without any doubt, who is he y will not obedience sin? or who will accuse the obedience to God?

Punishing of offences considered.

How and by whom offenders ought to be punished.

To do that God commandeth is obedience and no sin, though he be reprooued.

The Israelites did steale from the Egyptians without sinne. Samplon killed himselfe without sin.

Here in this proposition, you haue the words of saint Austin for answere. But let euery man well foresee, if God doe command, or that he do intimate the commandement without any circumstances, and let him proue the spirits whether they be of God. But in such cases there are no lawes to be giuen, neither are they much to be talked of, for thereby there should easily occasion rise to make sedition, and for the inferiours to rise against the superiours. For when any man had stollen any thing, or killed any man: he would say that hee was moued thereunto by the spirit of God: but without manifest proofe thereof he should be punished.

Of extraordinary commandements no generall lawes to be made.

Againe, they said that there were certaine cases wherein the laity had power ouer the clergie. It was answered, that there were certaine cases in the law, wherein the laity hath power ouer the clergie, and oftentimes ouer cardinals. For if the pope being dead, the cardinals would not enter the conclaue to elect a new pope, the king, prince, or other lord of secular power may compell them: but in these cases hee is now no priuate person, but vseth his iurisdiction by the authority of the law. The like is to be vnderstood of all other cases expressed in the law.

Obiection. Answer. How the laity hath power ouer the clergie, and wherein. The pope will be iudged by his owne law.

They said further, that no common law hath any right or iuriſdiction except Gods law doe allow the same.

Obiection.

It was answered that no common law hath right or iurisdiction, if it bee against the law of God, for because the law of God is the rule of all other lawes. But there is great cunning and knowledge in applying the rule to that which is made by the rule, for oftentimes it seemeth that there is diuersitie in the thing made by the rule, when there is none in deede: but the the defaut is in the applying, because their rule is not duely applied to the thing made by it.

As touching the article of preaching the word of God, it was moued, that oftentimes some prelats, through their owne enuie and malice, without any reasonable cause, doe inhibite a good and meet preacher that preacheth catholickly and well.

Answere was made, how that they vnderstood wel enough that the abuse of certain prelats, which did inordinately behaue themselues, gaue a great occasion of those troubles. Also that they neuer heard of any such complaints in those parts, but that the prelats do fauor good preachers, and stirre them by toppreach by intreaty, fauor, and promotion. In all such causes, there are remedies already prouided by the law: for when any man is so prohibited to vse his right, hee hath remedy to appeale: if he do trust his appeale to be iust, he may vse his right, all violence both of the spirituall and secular power set apart; for the end of the matter shall declare if hee had iust cause to appeale. When shall be declared that the superior hath done cuill in prohibiting, and the plaintiffe iustly in doing, and the superior for his vniust prohibition shall bee punished. But if he be iustly prohibited, and that through his temerity, he do contemne the iust commandement of his superior, he is worthie to be punished iustly condigne punishment.

Where it was moued concerning the third article, whether it were lawfull for the ecclesiasticall prelats to exercise in their proper person, the acts of secular dominion, hereunto it was answered, that if by this word, Acts of secular dominion, are vnderstood Acts which a secular lord may doe or exercise, then is to be said, that a prelate may lawfully exercise some such Acts in his proper person, as to sell, to pawne or pledge, to infeoffe by manor and forme ordained by law: but there are some Acts, which it is not lawfull for them to exercise in their proper person, but ought to haue afterward a vicegerent or proctor, to doe the same: whereupon there is prohibition made in the law in the Rubrike, Ne Clerus vel Monachus secularibus negotijs se immisceat, & in alijs rebus.

It was also moued, whether that coactiue power, which ought to be exercised by a steward, &c. bee in the hands of an ecclesiasticall prelate.

Whereupon Iohn Polomair answered, that this question presupposeth another: whereof there are diuers opinions amongst the doctors, in whose power the dominion of the church should be: and furthermore, whether the actions bee in the person of the tutors or proctors, of if they bee not in their person, notwithstanding by the constitution of any acts or proctors (whose exercising of those actions do giue authority vnto the acts or proctors) they be: with other difficulties, whereof it is not needfull to speake at this present. But forsomuch as hee was vrged to say his opinion: hee said, that to such as had either leisure or pleasure in disputation, and would argue against him, he would bee contented to giue the choice to take which part he would; but his opinion was rather that the dominion of church matters should be in the power of Christ: and the prelats, with the other clergie, are but canonicall administrators in maner of tutors: but they haue more power and administration then tutors, and by constituting a steward or vicegerent, &c. Their constitution being duely made, the steward or vicegerent hath the same coactiue power and exercise of iurisdiction.

Also as touching the fourth article, for the declaration of the first conclusion, it is agreed that these words, Iuste & equisita. i. iustly gotten, alledged therein, determine all things contained in the same:

Also as touching the second conclusion, whereas the sacred canons and holy doctors speak thus: The goods of the church, the substance of the church, and the possessions of the church, and diuers other opinions there be amongst the doctors, in whose power the rule thereof should be, as it is noted in the Glos. Cap. expedit xij. quæst. i. they do not intend to constraine any man to any of those opinions; neither to exclude any of them, but that euery man should haue liberte, probable to maintaine which of them he thinketh best.

Moreouer, the Bohemians said, that they did beleeue that the clergie are but administrators of the temporalties of the church, and not lords thereof, according to the manner of speaking of the Scriptures, holy doctors and canons. Also the Bohemians said, that in all occasions which shall hereafter rise, they would wholly stand to the determination of the iudge, agreed vpon in Egra, with one consent. In this manner did the ambaſſadours make answere vnto the Bohemians. At the last, after much communication had to and fro, a concord and vnity was concluded and confirmed by setting to their hands. The Bohemians promised to receiue the peace and vnity of the church, and the declaration of the three articles. This was done in the yeere of our Lord 1428. About the feast of saint Martine, it was afterward agreed both by the ambaſſadours of that councell, and of Boheme, that what soeuer remained, should be determined and agreed vpon, first at Ratisbona, afterward at Vsuna in the diocese of Olymutz: then at Alba in Hungary, before the emperour Sigismund: but the matter could not be ended in any place.

At the last the concord was confirmed by writing with their seales at Inglauia, a city of Bozauia, the fifth day of Iuly, in the presence of the emperor.

¶ Certaine petitions, which the Bohemians put vp last of all in the sacred councell of Basill, An. 1438. in the moneth of November.

Certaine petitions of the Bohemians put vp to the councell. Anno 1438.

VNto the most reuerend fathers in Christ, and our most gracious lords. Wee the ambaſſadours of the kingdome of Boheme, do most humbly and darely require you, that for the perpetuall preseruation of peace and concord, and for the firme preseruation of all things contained in the composition, you will vouchsafe of your clemencie, to giue and grant vnto vs all and singuler our requests, here vnder written, with effectuall execution of the same.

First and aboue all things, we desire and require you, for the extirpation of diuers dissensions and controuersies, which will vndoubtedly follow amongst our people vnder the diuersitie of the communion, and for the abolishing of infinite euils, which we are not able to expresse as wee haue conceiued them, that you will gentlie vouchsafe of your goodnesse and liberalitie, to giue, grant and commaund, vnto our kingdome of Boheme, and marquesdome of Bozauia, one vniforme order of the communion vnto all men, vnder both kinds: that is to say, vnto the archbishop of Prage, the bishop of Luth zaus, Olmutz, and other prelats of the kingdome and marquesdome, hauing charge of soules, and to their vicars, and also to their flocks and subiects, and that according to those things which are contained in the bull of the ambaſſadors, and in the compositions made in the name of the whole councell, written in the chap. Pro firmitate, where it is thus said, and all other things shal be done, which shall be meet and necessarie for the preseruation of peace and vnity. For this done by your benefit, the whole kingdome shall be comforted aboue measure, and established in brotherly loue: thereby an vniforme subiection and obedience shall be perpetually attributed vnto holy church.

The communion in both kinds to be generally graunted.

Item, we require and desire (as before) that for the auoiding of all false suspition and doubtfulnesse of many, which suppose that the sacred councell hath granted the said communion vnder both kinds vnto vs but for a time, as neither profitable nor wholesome, but as the libell of disagreement: that you will vouchsafe, according to this chapter alledged in the compositions: First they said, that it was not the intent of the sacred councell, &c. wholesomely and speedily to prouide for our safety and your grant in this behalfe, and with the buls of your letters, to confirme that chapter together with the other pertaining to the office of your ambaſſadors.

To haue a good and lawfull prince, and bishop.

Item, we beseech you (as afore) that for the confirmation of obedience, and for the discipline of all the clergie, and for the finall defence and obseruation of all things determined and agreed vpon, and for the good order in spiritualties, yee will vouchsafe effectually to prouide for vs a good and lawfull paſtor, archbishop and bishops, which shall seeme vnto vs most meet and acceptable for our kingdome, to execute those offices and duties.

Free communion vnder both kinds to be permitted to all publicke.

Item, we require you (as afore said) that your fatherly reuerences will vouchsafe, for the defence of the worthy fame of the kingdome and marquesdome, to declare and shew our innocencie, in that they haue communicated, doe, and hereafter shall communicate vnder both kinds; to giue out, ordaine and direct the letters of the sacred councell, in maner and forme most apt and meete for such declaration, vnto all princes, as well secular as spirituall, cities and communalties, according to the compositions, and as the lords the ambaſſadours are bound vnto to pay to doe.

Item, we desire you, that in the discussing of the matter for the communion vnder both kinds, and of the commandement thereof giuen vnto all faithfull, yee will not proceed otherwise then according to the concordatum agreed vpon in Egra: that is to say, according to the law of God, the order of Christ, and his apostles, the generall councels, and the minds of the holy doctours, truely grounded vpon the law of God.

The gospels and epistles to be read in the Bulgar tongue.

Item, we desire that your fatherly reuerences, considering the great affection of our people, will giue vs the desired liberty to communicate vnto the yonger sort, the Sacrament of the Supper. For if this vse of communicating should bee taken away, which our kingdome being goblyn, moued by the writings of most great and holy Doctours, and brought in by examples, hath receiued as catholicke, and exercised now a long time; verily it should raise vp an intollerable offence amongst the people, and their minds would be grieuously vexed and troubled.

The Scriptures read in the Sclauine congue also.

Item, we require you (as before) that for like causes your fatherly reuerences, would vouchsafe to permit, at the least the gospels, epistles, and creed to be sung and read in the church in our vulgar tongue, before the people, to moue them vnto deuotion: for in our Sclauon language it hath beene vsed of old in the church, and likewise in our kingdome.

Item, we require you in the name of the said kingdome, and of the famous Vniuersity of Prage, that your fatherly reue-trances would vouchsafe to shew such diligence and care toward the desired reformation of that Vniuersity, that according to the manor and forme of other Vniuersities reformed by the church, prebends and collations of certaine benefices of cathedrall and parish churches, may be annexed and incorporate vnto the said Vniuersity, that thereby it may be increased and preferred.

Prouisions to be granted to Bishops for their visitation and diocesan synod.

A request for certaine reformation and discipline.

Item, we beseech you (as before) as heartily as we may, and also, leaning authorities your fatherly reuerence) require you, and by the former composicions we most instantly admonish you, that with your whole minds and endeauours, and with all care and studie, your reuerences so ill watch and seeke for that long desired and most necessary reformation of the church and Christian religion, and effectually labour for the rooting out of all publicke euils, as well in the head, as in the members, as you haue often promised to do in our kingdome, in the compositions, and as our fourth article touching the auoiding of all publicke euils, both exact and require.

There were certaine answers prouided by the councell, to these petitions of the Bohemians, which were not deliuered vnto them but kept backe, to what purpose & intent we know not. Wherefore, because we thought them not greatly necessary for this place, and also to auoide prolixity, we haue lodged it heere at this present to omit them. Thus haue ye heard compendiously the chiefe and principall matters intreated and done in this famous councell of Basill. And here, to conclude withall) we haue though: good to declare vnto you, for the aid and helpe of the ignorant people, which iudge many things to bee of longer time and continuance, then indeed they be; and thereupon haue established a great part of their opinions) how that, toward the latter end of this councell, that is to say, in the xxxvii. Session of the same, holden the xxv. day of September, in the yeere of our Lord 1439. the feast of the conception of our Lady, was ordained to be holden & celebrate yeerely. In like sale do, was ordained to be holden & celebrate yeerely. In like sale also in the xxxv. Session of the same councell, holden the first day of July, An. 1441. was ordained the feast of the Visitation of our Lady, to be celebrate & holden yeerely in the moneth of July. We haue also thought it good, before we doe end this storp, to annex hereunto certaine decrees, profitably and wholesomely ordained in the said councell, against the inordinate gising of the ecclesiasticall benefices and liuings by the pope, with certaine other constitutions also, fruitfull for the behalfe and edification of the church.

The councell of Basill brought into the church.

The visitation of our Lady brought in.

During the time that the generall councell at Basill was so diligent and carefull about the reformation of the church, this one thing seemed good vnto them to be prosecuted and followed with an earnest care and diligence, that thereby euery church, apt and meete ministers might bee appointed, which might shine in vertue and knowledge, to the glory of Christ, and the healthfull edifying of the christian people: wherevnto the multitude of expectative graces hath beene a great impediment and let, in that they haue beene found to haue brought grieuous troubles, diuers disorders, and many dangers vpon the ecclesiasticall state. For hereby oftentimes scarcely apt or meete ministers haue beene appointed for the churches, which are neither knowne nor examined: and this expectation of void benefices (as the old lawes do witnesse) doth giue occasion to desire another mans death, which is greatly preiudicial vnto saluation: besides that, innumerable quarrels and contentions are moued and mingled the seruants of God: raine and malice nourished: the ambition and greedy desire of pluralities of benefices maintained: and the riches and substance of kingdomes and prouinces marueilously consumed. Poore men suffer innumerable vexations, by running vnto the court of Rome. They are oftentimes spoiled and robbed by the way: troubled and afflicted with diuers plagues, and hauing spent their patrimony and substance left them by their parents, they are constrained to liue in extreme poverty. Many do challenge benefices, which (without any iust title, yea such indeed as ought not to haue them) obtaine and get the same: such I say as haue most craft and subtilty to deceiue their neighbour, or haue greatest substance to contend in the law. It happeneth oftentimes that vnder the intrication of these pretogratiues antecations, and such other as doe allociate these expectative graces, much craft and deceit is found. Also oftentimes the ministery is taken away from yong men, by their ordinary giuers, whiles that by the trouble of those contentions, and diuers discourses running to and fro by meanes of those graces, they are vexed and troubled, the ecclesiasticall order is confounded, whiles that euery man his authority and iurisdiction is not preserued: and the bishops of Rome also, by challenging and taking vpon them to much the office of the inferiours, are withdrawne from more weighty and fruitfull matters, neither doe they diligently attend to the guiding and correction of the inferiours, as the publike vtility doth require. All which things do bring a great confusion vnto the clergie, and ecclesiasticall state, to the great preiudice and hinderance of Gods true worship, and publike saluation.

Expectatiue graces.

Incommodities that rise by vacation of benefices.

In the same councell also diuers other constitutions were made, not vnprofitable for reformation, and for removing of certaine abuses and disorders brought in, especially by the bishop of Rome, as touching causes not to bee brought by and

No controuersies to bee brought to Rome depend translated to the court of Rome: Wherein it was decreed, that no actions nor controuerses should bee brought from other countries, to be pleaded at Rome, which were beyond 4. daies iourney distant from the said court of Rome, a few principall matters only excepted. Also, that no frutelous appeales should be made to the pope hereafter. It was moreouer in the same councell decreed, for the number, age, and condition of the cardinals, that they should not exceed the number of 24. besides them that were already, and that they should bee freely taken out of all countries: and that they should not be of kin to the bishop of Rome, or to the cardinals, nor yet blemished with any spot or crime. Also for Annates or first fruits, or halfe fruits, it was there prouided, that no such Annates or confirmation of elections, or collation of benefices, should be paid or reserued any more to the pope, for the first yeeres voidance. All which things there agreed and concluded by them, were afterward confirmed and ratified by the French king, Charles 7. with the full consent of all his prelats, in his high court of parliament in Bitorrs, and there called Pragmatica Sanctio: Anno 1438. whereupon great vtility ensued afterward to the kingdome of France. Albeit in processe of time, diuers friers there were which wrote against the same. Ex lib. Pragm. Sanctionis.

Pragmatica Sanctio per Carolum 7.

An mighty many decrees of the said councell of Basill, in the 19. Session, there was also a decree made touching the converting of Iewes and yong nouices in religion, vnto the christian faith.

Also that all ordinaries should yeerely at appointed times, preuide certaine men well learned in the holy Scriptures, in such places where Iewes and other infidels did dwell, to declare to them the truth of the catholicke faith, that they acknowledging their errour, might forsake the same: vnto the which preaching, the said ministers should compell them to resort, and to heare, vnder paine of excluding them from occupying any more in that place: prouided that the said Minorites and preachers should behaue themselues towards them, mercifully and with all charity, whereby they might win them to Christ, not onely by the declaring of the verity, but also in exhibiting their offices of humanity.

An act made for the conuersion o the Iewes.

And to the intent their preaching might be the more fruitfull, and that the preachers might bee the better instructed in the tongues, it was also in the same councell prouided and commanded, that the constitution made before in the councell of Vienne for learning the Hebrew, Chaldey, Araby and Greek tongues should by all meanes be obserued and kept, and ordinary stipends prouided for them that should teach the same tongues.

An act for learning the Hebrue, Caldey, Arabye and Chaldey.

An other decree moreouer in the 20. Session was enacted, that whosoeuer was knowne or publikely noted to be a keeper of concubines, should be sequestred from all fruits of his benefices, for the space of 3. monethes; which fruits should be conuerted by y Ordinary, to the reparations, or some other vtility of the church: and if he did not so amend, it was by the Synode decreed that he should be clerely deposed from al his benefices.

Against priests that kept concubines.

Furthermore, the said Synode did greatly inueigh against them, which hauing the institution of the church, did not shame to take such vnpreuailes for bribes and money. Bill to continue in their filthinesse, &c.

By these decrees of the councell aboue specified, it is to be seene, what corruption had beene then frequented in the church of God, through the bishop and court of Rome. For the more expresse declaration whereof, we thought it not much impertinent here to inser the words of one Martin Meyre, writing to Aeneas Syluius, touching and noting the said corruptions: the tenour of whose epistle here ensueth.

An epistle of Martine Meyre to Æneas Syluius, translated into English, the time where of is to be seene in the former edition of this booke. Ex Orth. Gra.

Vnto the reuerend father, the lord Æneas cardinall of Seme, Martine Meyr, chancellor to the bishop of Mentz, wisheth health.

I Haue vnderstood by certaine of my friends letters, that you are created cardinall. I am glad for your part, that you haue receiued so worthie rewards for your vertues. I reioyce also for my owne part, that my friend hath attained vnto such a dignity wherin he may in time to come, both helpe me and my friends: But this is a griefe vnto me, that you haue happened vpon those daies, which seeme to bee troublesome vnto the apostolicke see. For there are many complaints made vnto my lord the archbishop vpon the pope, that he will neither keep the decrees of the councell of Constance, neither of Basil, neither yet thinketh himselfe bound to the couenants of his predecessours, and seemeth vtterly to contemne our nation, and to seeke the vtter ruine thereof. For it is euident that the election of prelats, is euery where reiected: benefices and dignities, of what sort soeuer they be, are refused for the cardinals and chiefe notaries: and you your selfe haue obtained the reseruation of three Prouinces of Germany, vnder such a forme as hath not beene accustomed or heard of. Vowsons or gifts of benefices are granted without number: yeerely stipends and halfe the reuenues are exacted without delay, and it is euident that there is more extorted then is due. The regiments of churches are not cōmitted vnto such as best deserue them, but vnto such as offer most money for them, and new pardons are granted out daily to scrape scrape and gather together money. Tithes are commanded to be exacted without the consent of our prelats, for the Turkish war, and those matters which were accustomed to be debated and determined at home, are now caried vnto the apostolike see of Rome. A thousand waies are inuented and deuised, how the see of Rome may by subtilty and craft, extort and get gold and treasure from vs, euen as it were of the Turkes or Barbarians: wherby our nation, which was sometime famous and valiant, which by their power and blood, conquered the Romain empire, and was once the lady and queene of all the world, now being brought vnto pouerty, is made a handmaid, and become tributarie, and being now in extreme miserie, hath of long time bewailed her cruell fortune and pouertie. But now our nobles being (as is were) wakened out of their sleepe, haue begun to consider and deuise with themselues, by what meanes they might withstand this calamity, and vtterly shake off this yoke and bondage, and haue determined with themselues, to challenge againe their former libertie. This will be no small losse vnto the court of Rome, if the princes of Germany bring to passe that which they haue deuised. Wherefore as much as I do reioyce of your late obtained dignity, so much also am I moued & grieued that these things happen in your daies. But peraduenture Gods determination is otherwise, and his will shall surely take place. You in the meane time be of good cheere, and deuise according to your wisedome, by what meanes the vehemency of these flouds may be stayed. Thus fare ye well.

From Hafthaffenberge the last day of August.

The authority of the councell of Basill expended.

Concerning the authority of this generall councell of Basill, what is to be esteemed, by the acts and fruits thereof may be vnderstood of all good men. Neither was it of any man doubted in the first beginning, so long as the pope agreed and consented vnto it: But after the pope began to draw backe, many other followed, especially of the richer sort of prelats, which had any thing to lose: wherof sufficiently hath been said by Arelatensis the cardinall before. In the number of those inconstant prelats, besides many other, was first cardinall Iulian, the first collector of this councell, and Vicegerent of the pope, as by his seruent and vehement letter written to pope Eugenius in defence of this councell, may well appeare: Wherin he most earnestly doth expostulate with the foresaid pope Eugenius, for seeking to dissolue the councell, and declareth in the same many causes, why hee should rather reioyce, and giue God thankes, for the godly proceedings and toptull agreement betweene the councell and the Bohemians, & so exhorteth him with manifold persuasions, to rester to the councell himselfe, and not to seeke the dissolution of the same. The copie and tenor of whose Epistle to the pope, if any be disposed to peruse the same, wee thought here good to set downe to be seene.

The epistle of cardinall Iulian to the pope, in the commendation of the councell of Basill.

The copie of an epistle, which Iulian cardinall of S. Angen, and the popes ambassador into Germany, wrote marueilous boldly and freely vnto Eugenius B. of Rome, for that he went about to dissolue the councel of Basil.

Most blessed father, after the deuout kisses of your blessed feet.

NOw shal the whole world vnderstand and know, whether that your holines haue in you the bowels of fatherly loue and charity, and the zeale of the house of God, whether you be sent to make peace or discord, to congregate or disperse, or whether you be that good shepheard, which giueth his life for his sheepe. Behold the doore beginneth now to bee opened, whereby the lost sheepe may returne againe vnto their owne fold, now is there good hope euen at hand, of the reconciliation of the Bohemians. If that your holinesse, as it is your duety, do helpe and further the same, you shall obtaine great glory, both in heauen and earth. But if peraduenture you goe about so let the same (which is not to be hoped for at your hands) all men will reproue you of impiety; heauen and earth will conspire against you, all men will forsake you. For how is he to be followed, which with one word may restore peace and quietnesse to the church, and refuseth to do it? But I conceiue a better hope in you, how that your holinesse without any excuse, will with your whole heart and mind, fauour this most sacred councel, & giue thanks vnto almighty God for his great goodnesse, that this congregation hath not departed. Behold the ambassadours of this sacred councell are returned with great ioy and gladnesse from Egra, reporting how that through the grace of the holy Ghost, they haue firmely concluded with the ambassadors of the Bohemians, that is to say, of the Prages, Orphants and Thaborites, amongst whom was also present the captaines of their enemies, and specially Procopius; That a solemne ambassade of all the estates of the realme should come vnto the councell of Basill: After that a safe-conduct is sent vnto them by the said councell in forme conditioned, which shall be done with speed, this sacred congregation is marueilous exhilarate and ioyfull. For those our ambassadours affirme, that all things there handled with such charity at Egra, and that they did see such things amongst the Bohemians, that not without cause, they doe conceiue great hope of their reconciliation.

And at the last gently imbracing one another, euen with teares of gladnesse, they departed from Egra: the Bohemians requiring our ambassadors, that the matter might bee ended with all expedition. They report also, that many things happened in that treaty, which if any man heard, and did not weepe for ioy, he might well thinke himselfe to bee but finally affectioned vnto Christ. As for three of the foure articles, they seeme not to make any great difficulty vpon. As touching the 4. that is, of the communion vnder both kinds, there is good hope that they will follow the iudgement of the councell. Who is it then that dare counsell your holinesse to perseuere any longer in the purpose of dissolution? for if the councell had not bin appointed at all, for so great hope and necessity; it ought to haue bin appointed in this place. How worthie praise & commendation should your holinesse do, if that you would leaue Italy and all other affaires, and come hither in your owne person, although you should need to bee caried in a wagon or litter? The keeping and defence of the temporall patrimony of the church, may well be disposed and done by legats and vicars. This is the true patrimony of the church, to win soules. For the church is not an heap of stones & walles. Christ hath not made you a keeper of castles and forts, but a pastor of soules. Therefore you should do that in your owne person, which is most necessarie and acceptable vnto Christ, and al other things by your substitutes. For so did the apostles, which to the intent they might the more freely attend to the preaching of the word of God, did institute 7. to serue the tables, and for the ministration of other inferior things. I heare that by the grace of God, your holines doth daily recouer and amend; and if so be, as it is said, you do visit some churches on foote, ye may also come hither on horseback, for you cannot goe vnto any thing more profitable or concordant to your office, then to goe vnto the place, where as innumerable benefits & goodnesse may spring. Let your holinesse vnderstand and consider wherein Christ whose vicar you are, and S. Peter whose successor you are, and the apostles and holy bishops, did exercise and occupie themselues; and as you do succeed them in office, so succeede them in maners. But if peraduenture your holines cannot come hither, I doe counsell you, that for so great a benefit, you would send the more part of the reuerend lords cardinals of the court of Rome, and command all other prelates to come hither. Do not let or hinder them that are willing to come, as it is reported you do, but rather allure them to come hither.

What the church is.

Eugenius reproued the church.

A strong argument against Eugenius.

Your holines may beleeue me, that onely charity moueth me to counsell you in this sort: bee yee not separate from your members, nourish your children as the hen doth her chickens vnder her wings. And if so be, that you will doe nothing else, yet speake this only word, Placet: that is to say, that it pleaseth you, that the councell of Basill should goe forward. For a few dates past, there came newes hither, for the which your holines ought altogether to cease from your dissolution. The reuerend father the archbishop of Lions, hath written vnto the councel, and vnto me also, how that the prelats of France haue assembled together in the city of Bituria, and there after long and exact examination haue concluded, that the councell is lawfully congregate in this place. And that it is necessary that it should be holden and celebrate here at this present; and how the prelats of France should come vnto it: hee also directed hither the cause which moued them so to conclude, the copie whereof I suppose is sent vnto your holines by some other. Whereupon then doth your holinesse stay? You haue gone about as much as in you lay, by your messengers, letters and diuers meanes to draw backe the prelats, and haue laboured with all your endeauor to dissolue the councell; yet notwithstanding as you do see, it is encreased day by day. And the more it is forbidden, the more are al mens minds enflamed to the cōtrary. Is not this then to resist the will of God? Why doe ye prouoke the church to anger? Why do ye stir vp the christian people? vouchsafe I pray you so to doe, that ye may get the loue and fauor of the people, and not the hatred: for all nations are greatly offended when they heare these your doings. Suffer not your holinesse to be seduced by any man, which peraduenture shall inculcate feare vnto you, whereas there is nothing at all to be doubted; or that do perswade you this to be no lawfull council. I know I should offend your holinesse if I should go about to proue the contrary; but it is better that I doe offend you a little in words, and profit you in my deeds: for a physition layeth a burning corrosiue vnto the disease, and healeth the sore: For the medicine cannot profit except it be sharpe and bitter in tast. Vnder this hope and confidence I will not feare to declare the truth: that is being knowne, your holines may the better prouide both for your selfe and the church. It dependeth vpon the councell of Constance whether this councell be lawfull or not. If that were a true councel, so is this also. No man seemeth to doubt whether that councell were lawfull, and likewise whatsoeuer was there decreed to be lawfull: for if any man will say, that the decrees of that councell are not of force, he must needs grant, that the depriuation of pope Iohn, which was done by the force of those decrees, to be of no effect. If that depriuation were not of effect; neither was the election of pope Martine of any force, which was done he being yet aliue. If Martin were no true pope, neither is your holines, which was chosen by the dcardinall that he made, wherefore it ſtandeth no man more vpon to defend the decrees of that councell, then your holines; for if any decree of that councell be called into doubt; by like meanes may all the reſt of the decrees be reuoked. And by like meanes, ſhall the decrees of any other councell bee of no force and effect: for by like reaſon, as the faith of one councell is weakened, all the reſt ſhal alſo be weakened, according to S. Auguſtines ſaying in the 9. diſtinction capitulo, Si ad ſcripturas: Then, faith be, both the faith and all other ſacraments ſhall be put in doubt, if that there be once any doubt made of the force and power of any councell lawfully congregate. There was a decree made in the councell of Conſtance, intituled Frequens. Whereby it was ordained, that the firſt councell after that, ſhould bee holden within 5. yeeres, and another within 7. yeeres after that againe. The councell of Conſtance being ended, and the 5. yeeres paſſed, the councel of Papia or Sene was holden, after which 7. yeeres being alſo run ouer, this councell is begun to bee celebrate. To what end then is it expreſſed in the bull of the diſſolution, amongſt other cauſes, that the 7. yeere is already paſt? When as of neceſſity it ought to be paſſed before the councell can be celebrate. For theſe words, from 7. yeere or 5. yeere, ſignifie according to the law, that all parts of time ſhould be paſſed, and the laſt day looked for. Wherefore it behoued that 7. yeeres to be fully complete, before this councell of Baſil ſhould begin. Like as 5. yeeres were fully expired, before that the councel of Papia did begin. But peraduenture ſome man will ſay, that it ought to haue begun the firſt day after the 7. yeer was expired. For otherwiſe the terme of the councell is paſſed. But hereunto we may anſwere, that it is not contained in the chapter Frequens, that except it were holden the firſt day, it ſhould not bee holden at all, neither can it be gathered either by the words or meaning. For it is only required that it ſhould be holden after 7. yeeres expired, but whether it be the 2. or 3. day, or the 3. or 4. moneth after the 7. yeer, it doth ſatisfie the chapter Frequens. For when the firſt day is come, then beginneth the power and liberty to celebrate the councel, but not afore, but it is not prohibited to celebrate it after; neither doth this word, Inquinquennium; that is to ſay, againſt 5. yeere, next following, which is alledged in the chapter Frequens, and ſeemeth to be repeated alſo for the 7. yeeres, for it is not vnderſtood that it is neceſſary to be holden the firſt day preciſely after the 7. yeer, but becauſe it ſhould not be vnderſtood of other 7. yeeres to come. For in ſpeaking ſimplie of 7. yeere, it is vnderſtood of 7. yeere next enſuing. Admit alſo that in the chapter Frequens, any of theſe words had bin ioyned with immediately following, as by and by, out of hand, immediately, or ſtraight waies after, or ſuch other words: yet ought they to be vnderſtood with a certaine moderation, & diſtance of time, that aſſoone as might be conuenient; as theſe words are expounded by the lawyers and doctors, for they are inlarged and reſtrained, according to the ſubiect and diuers circumſtances of the matters and affaires. For it is not by any meanes likely that it was the mind of thoſe which made the decree, that conſidering the long iourneys and hard preparation of ſuch affaires, and alſo the manifold impediments which may happen, that they would reſtraine ſo preciſe a time, euen at the firſt day, that if it were not then celebrated, it ſhould not be holden at all: for by ſuch ſubtill meanes it ſhould alſo be holden euen in the firſt moment and very inſtant after the ſame yeere.

But forſomuch as words are ciuilly to bee vnderſtood, this ſenſe or vnderſtanding is too far diſagreeable. For if any man will ſay, then it is commanded to be prorogued, that is alſo forbidden in the chapter Frequens. He that doth ſo argue, doth not vnderſtand himſelfe, nor the force of the words. It is not prorogued if it bee begunne, the ſecond or third moneth, but rather a continuation or execution of that which is in their power. For if it were a prorogation, then forſomuch as a prorogation doth fauor of the nature of the firſt delay, it could not bee begun before the time prorogued; but this happeneth not in our caſe: for albeit it were not begun in the firſt moneth, but in the ſecond and third, it is not thereby concluded that it could not be begun in the firſt: but if there had bin any prorogation made till the ſecond moneth, then it could not haue been begun in the firſt: as for example, I promiſe to giue an 100. pounds after Eaſter, afore Eaſter it cannot bee required, but by and by after Eaſter it may be required: and albeit that I beene not vrged for it, notwithſtanding I doe not ceaſe to be bound and if ſo be I be demanded it in the 2. or 3. moneth after, it is not thereby vnderſtood that there is any prorogation made: Neither doth it follow, but that it might haue beene demanded in the beginning, which could not haue beene done, if that there had bin any prorogation made. Alſo it is the nature of prorogation to be made before the firſt terme or day be paſſed. For otherwiſe it is no prorogation, but a new appointment. And albeit it may be ſaid, that then it may be long delaied; it is anſwered, that in this point, we muſt ſtand vnto the iudgement of the church, which conſidering diuers circumſtances would thinke the time meete. For the liberty of celebrating of councels was inſtituted for the profit and fauor of the church. What if it ſhould happen that when the time commeth, in the place where a councell ſhould be kept, there be a great plague, or ſome ſiege, which ſhould continue by the ſpace of 3. or 4. moneths, and the pope in the meane time doth not change the place according to the forme of the chapter Frequens, and that through ſuch impediments, the prelats did not come the firſt day vnto the place, or if any were comming and were taken by the way, which if they had not beene taken, had beene preſent at the firſt day in the place appointed: is it therfore to be ſaid that the power of the councell is paſſed or that the impediment ceaſing, and the prelats comming thither, the councell cannot be holden? that truely were greatly abſurd and too much preiudiciall to the church of God: but in this our caſe, the cauſe is probable why that the prelats did deferre to come at the beginning of the time appointed: for ſo much as when the time drew neere, pope Martine died the 20. of February. For which cauſe, the prelats might well doubt vpon ſome impediment of the councell. Alſo they taried looking that ſome ſhould come thither in the name of the pope, becauſe they would not tarie in that place in vaine without a preſident. As for the legate which was appointed for the councell, whoſe preſence all men taried for, before hee would prepare himſelfe to that iourney, he came not at the time appointed vnto the councell, but went vnto Norenberge, to perſecute the Bohemians, according to the commandement of pope Martine, which had enioyned him to goe firſt thither before he went to Baſil. The cauſe of the long delay of the prelats.

And the ſame legate being oftentimes required at Norenberge, that he ſhould goe to Baſil to hold the councell, hee anſwered, that he would not goe before he had the conſent of the new biſhop. This was the cauſe of the prelats delay, neither is it greatly to be imputed vnto the prelats, which ſuſpected that pope Martine would not haue holden the councell, and feared to bring themſelues in trouble: and good cauſe had they ſo to feare, through thoſe things which happened in the councell of Sene. For there were many things ſpoken which cauſed great ſuſpition. It was reported vnto me that many had ſaid, I came vnto Germany to diſturbe the councell. The counell of Sene.

Alſo this was pope Martines mind and intent, that albeit the councell was not begun at the beginning of March, notwithſtanding the authority of holding the councell ſhould not be voyd. For he ſaid, as the time of the councell approached, told me that I ſhould firſt go vnto Boheme, before I went vnto the councell: whereof alſo mention is made in the bull of the conſiſtory diſſolution.

But what needs we any other proofe, then by your holines letters? which by your letters dated the 2. Kalends of June, and were deliuered vnto me long after the time, by the ſpace of 3. moneths, you doe command me that my buſineſſe being done in Boheme, I ſhould take my way vnto Baſil to hold the councell, and there to foreſee vnto all things as it was enioyned me, and ordained in the councell of Conſtance. The ſame alſo yee repeate in the bull of the diſſolution brought vnto me by the lord Parentine, the words whereof are theſe. Vnto your circumſpection. Since your going into Germany no prelats haue aſſembled in Baſil for the celebrating of the councell: wee gaue you in commandement that in the meane time you ſhould be diligent about the expedition againſt the Bohemian hereticks, which is committed to your charge, and afterward you ſhould come vnto Baſil the place appointed for the councell, & there to rule in our place in the name of the church. What is more euident then this? If any thing were doubtful, by the tenor of theſe letters it were euidently taken away. If any man would ſay, that neither P. Martin nor Eugenius could confirme the councell by writing of ſuch letters, becauſe there was a prorogation which is prohibited by the chapter Frequẽs, it is anſwered, that there is no prorogation, but execution of that which is in power, or a declaration that it is not neceſſary to hold the councel preciſely euen at the beginning. Alſo it is no prorogation. For a prorogation is made before the terme is expired & not after: for after, it is rather called a new indiction or appointment. And if any man will ſay that there can bee no new indiction made, then may this be obiected: How could the councell of Bononia be newly appointed? If they wil anſwere, that the appointment of the councell of Bononia was of force, becauſe the councell at Baſil was diſſolued by your holines, then I haue my intent. For if it were diſſolued; Ergo, it was a councell before, becauſe it preſuppoſeth the habit. If it were a councell before, then, as hereafter ſhal be proued, it could not be diſſolued without the conſent of the councell: what can bee more anſwered hereunto? For the greater declaration and euidence of the matter, the abbat of Virgilia euen vpon the ſame day of the time appointed or afore, gathering together the prelats of the great church and many other prelats and notable men, made a ſolemne proteſtation, how the time was come to celebrate and hold the councell, and that he was come vnto Baſil for the ſame purpoſe, requiring them that they would conſerre and intreate together, vpon matters touching the councell, and hereupon there is a publike inſtrument or a teſtimonial.

Within a moneth after the ambaſſadors of the Vniuerſity of Paris came thither, and began to entreate of matters touching the councell, writing alſo vnto the emperor, and to the other princes of Germany, that they ſhould ſend vnto the councell; which letters I my ſelfe did ſee; neither doth the ſmall number of men let; for where as authority is, a great number is not required, according to the ſaying of Chriſt, where as 2. or 3. are gathered gathered together in my name, I am in the midſt of them. Vpon the which authority, the councels are grounded. Now therfore your holineſſe doth manifeſtly ſee the ſaid obiection to be but friuolous. For to what end ſhould any diſſolution be made, if it had not been a councel? Wherefore it is not to be doubted, but that it was a lawful councell, and canonically congregate. And peraduenture it is fcarſly found where any councell hath been confirmed by ſo many authorities as this, that is to ſay, by the two councels before paſſed, of Conſtance and of Sene, and confirmed by two biſhops of Rome.

Beſides this, I haue heard that ſome do report at Rome, that I could not call the prelats vnto the councell, becauſe that clauſe was not added in the bull of pope Martin. I greatly maruell why this ſhould be obiected, ſpecially ſeeng that not I alone haue called them, but I together with the reſt which are here aſſembled in the councell. It is a maruellous matter, pope Martin gaue me authority by the aduice of the councell to roote out hereſies, to pacifie kingdomes, to reforme the manners of euery ſtate of Chriſtendome, and yet they will ſay that I cannot cite them. Power is giuen me to iudge and to condemne, and haue I not alſo power to cite? The law doth ſay; vnto whom any power or iuriſdiction is committed, all things ſeeme to be committed vnto him, without the which he cannot exerciſe his iuriſdiction; for how could all the premiſſes be done, if the prelats or others ſhould not come hither? Alſo why is it ſaid in the chapter, Ego enim de iureiurando, I will come vnto the ſynod if I be called, if he cannot be called? By whom then is it preſuppoſed that he ſhould be called, but only by the councell, or by him which ruleth the councell? Alſo the whole eighteenth diſtinction intreateth of no other matter, but that the biſhops being called vnto the councell, if they come not, that they may bee excommunicat and ſuſpended. Let theſe men reade the booke of councels of S. Iſidore, and they ſhall finde how that in many councels, the prelats haue been called by the ſynod. Now it remaineth, that we ſhould declare, whether the diſſolution be of force or no. Wherein I doe againe feare to moue your holineſſe vnto anger. But charity forceth me thereunto; for peraduenture your holineſſe doth thinke the diſſolution to be effectuall, and therefore doe perſeuere in it; whereby, forſomuch as many offences may riſe, my conſcience doth moue me, not to hold my peace. Firſt of all the chapter Frequens, declareth, that it is not of force, for if prorogation be forbidden and prohibited, which is a ſmall matter, much more is diſſolution; which is a greater matter: for it is a greater matter to take away, then to defer; for by proroging, a thing is but deferred, and by diſſoluing, it is vtterly taken away. Alſo theſe men ſay, that the ſaid conſtitution in the chapter Frequens, may be made void, forſomuch as ſoone as the councell is begun, it may bee diſſolued without any thing done, as it is ſaid that it was done at Senes; and now they ſay alſo that your holineſſe hath been peruerſly informed touching the diſſolution. They ſay alſo, that the ſaid diſſolution doth manifeſtly tend to the ſubuerſion of faith, the ruine of the church, & the trouble of the chriſtian people. Therefore it cannot be done, neither obeied.

They ſay moreouer, that the ſaid diſſolution could not be made, by meanes of a certaine decree of the councell of Conſtance in that behalfe prouided. That in ſuch matters as appertaine vnto faith, the extirpation of ſinne, and reformation of the church in the head and in the members, that all men of what eſtate or condition ſoeuer they be, yea the pope himſelf, ſhould be bound to obey the ſtatutes, precepts, and ordinances of euerie generall councell, and except they did obey, to puniſh them. Marke how that theſe things, to haue power to determine vpon any man, to command him and puniſh him, if he be not obedient, are ſignes of ſuperiority, in thoſe matters which he doth decree, command or puniſh: and to be bound to obedience, to be ſubiect and obey the ſame, are ſignes of inferiority in the ſaid caſes. Ergo, in the foreſaid caſes, ſeeing that the pope, as they ſay, is vnder the councell, which alſo hath been: in that for one of the ſaid three caſes, the councell did depriue Iohn, and for the other Benedict, neither could the pope diſſolue the councell; in that he is inferior vnto the councell, cannot binde or compell the ſuperior: As is in the chapter Cum inferior, otherwiſe it ſhould containe in it a contradiction, that hee is bound to obey, and is not bound to obey, becauſe he may diſſolue; for how ſhould he be obedient vnto the ordinance and decree of the councell, if he may annihilate and take away the ſame ordinance and decree? This councell is congregate for the rooting out of hereſies, for the making of peace, and reformation of manners; and in the firſt ſeſſion it did ordaine, that their whole intent and reſpect ſhould be thereunto, and that he which ſhould procure to let the councell, to prorogue or alter it, ſhould be puniſhed, and haue proceſſe againſt him as againſt a common diſturber of the peace, &c. If it may be diſſolued, it is euident that they doe not obey the ſaid ordinance, whereby this alſo muſt of neceſſity be granted, that if it may be diſſolued, the decree of the councel of Conſtance is of no force.

This is alſo proued by another reaſon. No man doubteth but if any controuerſie of hereſie ſhould be moued againſt any biſhop of Rome, that he could not diſſolue the councell: For if he might diſſolue the councell, he could not be iudged, which were contrary to the chap. Si Pa. diſt. 40. Ergo, like as it is in hereſie, ſo is it in the two other caſes. For theſe three were pacified by the councell of Conſtance: for thus ſpeaketh the councell: as it is in the chapter, Si Papa in illo vno. And as I haue before ſaid, the councell of Conſtance allowed this decree, through the which they depriued Peter de Luna, for making of a ſchiſme, and pope Iohn for the deformity of his life.

And albeit there be certaine lawes that ſay, the principall ſeat cannot be iudged of any man: and againe, no man iudgeth the chiefe ſeat: and, no man ſaith vnto himſelfe, why doeſt thou ſo? There are to be vnderſtood in theſe three caſes: firſt, that there was prouiſo made for the faith in the chapter Si Papa, and in the other two points, by the decree of Conſtance. Otherwiſe it ſhould be vnderſtood, without any exception, that the firſt ſeat, &c. and then the chapter Si Papa. 40. diſtinct. and the ſaid decree of Conſtance ſhould be falſe. If the chapter Si Papa had added cauſes of hereſies, no man would haue doubted vpon theſe two caſes, touching the ſaid ſentence; ſo likewiſe no man ought to doubt of the decree of the councell, that it was made by the authority of the pope, and repreſenteth the vniuerſall church. And if any man would ſay, that in all councels the authority of the pope is excepted: I anſwer, that it is true, when as the perſon of the pope is not ſpecially included. But if he be ſpecially included, he cannot be excepted, becauſe it ſhould fauor of contradiction. Moſt bleſſed father, God is my witneſſe, that I haue ſpoken theſe things with great anguiſh and ſorrow of mind, but I am forced ſo to ſpeake, that your holineſſe may ceaſe from the ſaid diſſolution, leſt there might happen infinite euils in the church of God. If your holineſſe did ſee my pure mind, my vpright conſcience, and entire affection towards you, whereby I am moued to write thoſe things, euen for verie loue you would imbrace and kiſſeme, and without doubt loue me as your owne ſonne. I haue often ſaid, and now do ſay and proteſt before God and man, that you will be the cauſe of ſchiſme and infinite miſchiefs, if you doe not alter and change your mind and purpoſe. Almighty God preſerue your holineſſe in the proſperity of a vertuous man. Vnto whoſe feet I doe moſt humbly recommend me. From Baſil the 5. day of June.

Thus endeth the epiſtle of cardinall Iulian, written vnto pope Eugenius. Wherein, forſomuch as mention is made, how that the Bohemians had promiſed to ſend their ambaſſadors vnto the councell, and as before is partly touched in the Bohemian ſtory, their comming into Baſil, and propounding of certaine articles, wherein they diſſented from the pope, we doe not thinke it any thing differing from our purpoſe, to anner a briefe epitome, declaring the whole circumſtance of their ambaſſage, their articles, diſputations and anſwers which they had at the ſaid councell of Baſil, with their petitions and anſwers vnto the ſame. Faithfully tranſlated out of Latin by F. W.

In like maner Aeneas Syluius alſo with his owne hand and writing, not only gaue teſtimony to the authority of this councell, but alſo beſtowed his labor and trauell in ſetting forth the whole ſtory thereof. Notwithſtanding, the ſame Syluius afterward being made pope, with his new honor, did alter & change his old ſentence. The epiſtle of which Aeneas, touching the commendation of the ſaid councell, becauſe it is but ſhort, and will occupy but little rome, I thought hereunder, for the more ſatisfying of the readers mind, to inſert.

✻ An epiſtle of Aeneas Syluius, to the Rector of the Vniuerſitie of Colen.

An epiſtle of Aeneas Syluius, in defence of the councell of Baſil.

TO a chriſtian man, which will be a true chriſtian indeed, nothing ought to be more deſired, then that the ſincerity and pureneſſe of faith, giuen to vs of Chriſt by our fore-fathers, be kept of all men immaculate: and if at any time any thing be wrought or attempted againſt the true doctrine of the Goſpell, the people ought with one conſent to prouide lawfull remedy, and euery man to bring with him ſome water to quench the generall fire: neither muſt we feare how we be hated or enuied, ſo we bring the truth. We muſt reſiſt euery man to his face, whether he be Paul or Peter, if he walke not directly to the truth of the goſpell. Which thing I am glad, and ſo are we all, to heare that your Vniuerſity hath done in this councell of Baſil. For a certaine treatiſe of yours is brought hither vnto vs, wherein you reprehend the rudeneſſe, or rather the raſhneſſe of ſuch, which do deny the biſhop of Rome, and the conſiſtory of his iudgement, to be ſubiect vnto the generall councell, and that the ſupreame tribunall ſeat of iudgement, ſtandeth in the church, and in no one biſhoppe. Such men as deny this, you ſo confound with liuely reaſons and truth of the ſcriptures, that neither they are able to ſlide away like ſlippery Eeles, neither to cauill or bring any obiection againſt you. Theſe be the words of Syluius. The tribunall ſeat ſtandeth not in one biſhop.

Furthermore, as touching the authority and approbation of the foreſaid councell, this is to be noted, that during the life of Sigiſmund the emperor, no man reſiſted this councell. Alſo, continuing the time of Charles the ſeuenth, the French king, the ſaid councell of Baſil was fully and wholly receiued throwout all France. But after the death of Sigiſmund, when Eugenius was depoſed, and Felix duke of Sauoy was elected pope, great diſcords aroſe, and much practiſe was wrought. The authority of the councell of Baſil maintained by the emperor and the french king, ſo long as they liued.

The practise of pope Eugenius, to vndoe the councell of Basil.

wrought. But especially on Eugenius part, who being now excommunicate by the counsell of Basil, to make his part more strong, made eighteen new cardinals. Then he sent his Orators vnto the Germans, laboring by all perswasions to dissolue the councell of Basil. The Germans at that time were so diuided, that some of them did hold with Felix, and the councell of Basil: othersome, with Eugenius and the councell of Ferraria: and some were Neuters. After this, the French king being dead, which was Charles the seuenth, about the yeere of our Lord 1444. the pope beginneth a new practise, after the old guise of Rome, to certific (as is supposed) the Dolphin of France by force of armes, to dissipate that councell collected against him. Who leading an army of fiftene thousand men into Alsatia, did cruelly waste and spoile the country: after that, laid siege vnto Basil, to expell and driue out the prelats of the councell. But the Heluetians most stoutly meeting their enemies with a small power, did vanquish the Frenchmen, and put them to sword and flight: like as the Lacedemonians only with three hundred did suppresse, and scattered all the mighty army of Xerxes at Thermopylæ.

The pope after this vp in war.

The Dolphin beaten away by a few Swisses.

Although Basil thus by the valiantnes of the Heluetians was defended, yet notwithstanding the councell through these tumults, could not continue by reason of the princes ambassadors, which thunke alway and would not tary: So that at length Eugenius brought to passe, partly through the helpe of Frederike (being not yet emperor, but laboring for the empire) partly by his orators (in the number of whom was Eneas Sylnius aboue mentioned) that vnright the Germans) that they were content to giue ouer both the councell of Basil, and their neutrality.

The dilusion of the councell of Basil.

Fredericke of Austrich crowned emperor, great grandsire to this Ferdinando.

This Fredericke of Austrich being not yet emperor, but towards the empire, brought also to passe, that Felix, which was chosen of the councell of Basil, to be pope, was contented to renounce & resigne his papacy to Nicolas the fifth, successor to Eugenius, of the which Nicolas, the said Fredericke was consecrated at Rome to be emperor, and there crowned, anno 1451.

As these things were doing at Basil, in the meane season, pope Eugenius brought to passe in his consocation at Florence, that the emperor and the patriarke of Constantinople, with the rest of the Grecians there present, were perswaded to receiue the sentence of the church of Rome, concerning the proceeding of the holy Ghost: also to receiue the communion in vnleauened bread, to admit purgatory, and to yeeld themselues to the authority of the Romish bishop. Whereunto notwithstanding, the other churches of Grecia would in no wise assent at their comming home: Insomuch, that with a publike execration, they did condemne afterward all those legats which had consented to these articles, that none of them should be buried in christian buriall: which was, anno 1439. Ex Casp. Peucer.

The legates of the Greeke church condemned & hated by the pope at home.

The Greeke churches refuse the popes doctrine.

And thus endeth the story, both of the councell of Basil, and of the councell of Florence, also of the emperor Sigismund, and of the schisme betweene pope Eugenius, and pope Felix, and also of the Bohemians. The which Bohemians notwithstanding all these troubles and tumults aboue said, did right well, and were strong enough against all their enemies, till at length through discord, partly betweene the two preachers of the old and new citie of Prage, partly also through the discord of the messengers and captaines, taking sides one against the other, they made their enemies strong, and enfeebled themselues. Albeit afterward, in processe of time, they so defended the cause of their religion, not by sword, but by argument and disputation, that the bishop of Rome could neuer yet to this day, remooue the Thaborites and citie of Prage, from the communion of both the kinds, nor could euer cause them to keepe the conditions, which in the beginning of the councell was enioyned their priests to obserue, as Cochleus, lib. 8. hist. Hus. With whom also accordeth Antoninus, tit. 21. part. hist. saith: That the doctrine of the Bohemians, which he termeth by the name of Thania, did take so deepe rote with them, and grew so fast, that afterward, neither by fire nor sword, it could be extinct. The inconuenience of diuision.

Ex Cochleo, lib. 8 hist. Huss.

Ex Antonin. 3. part. tit. 22. c. 10.

Concerning the which Bohemians, briefly and in a generall sum, to recapitulate their whole acts and doings, here is to be noted, that they in their owne defence, and in the quarrell of Iohn Hus, and Jerome of Prage, prouoked by their catholike aduersaries to war, fighting vnder Ziska their captaine, had eleuen battels with the popes side, and euer went away victors. Ex Paral. Abb. Vrsp. in Epitaphio Ioan. Zisc. Moreouer, in the history of Peucer it is testified that pope Martine sending for the bishop of Winchester then cardinall, had leuied 3. maine armies, intending to ouerrun all the Bohemians: one army of the Saxons vnder the prince elector, the second of the Franconers, vnder the marquesse of Brandenburge, the third of Renates, Bauarians, and Suechers, vnder Otto archbishop of Treuers. With these, Sigismund also the emperor and cardinall Iulian the popes legat (who at last was slaine in war, and being spoiled of all his attire, was left naked in the field) ioyned all their force. Who ioyning together fiue times (saith the story) with fiue seuerall battels, assailed and inuaded the Bohemians: at euery which battell, fiue times the said aduersaries struchen and daunted with a sudden feare, ran away out of the field, leauing their tents with all their implements and furniture behind them, before any stroke was giuen. Ex. Casp. Peuc. lib. 5. Whereby it may appeare, the holy angels of God to fight for them which imbraced the sincere doctrine of Christs Gospell.

Mainardus feare fallen vpon the popes army.

God the holy Angels pitch their tents about them which feare him. Psal. 34.

Thus the Bohemians through the mighty protection of almighty God, continued a long time inuincible, during all the life of Ziza, and also of Procopius, till at length through discord growing betweene them and their captaines Procopius and Mainardus, they were subdued into their enemies.

And here by the way, is not to be omitted the wicked and cruell fact of Mainardus, who after the death of Procopius, thinking to purge the realme of Boheme of those theefe and principall soudiers, which had been long expert and trained vp in warre, found meanes by a proclamation made, as though he would warr against other countries of their enemies bordering about them, craftily to traine all them which were disposed to take wages, into certaine barnes or houses prepared for the same purpose, and so shutting the doores vpon them, the wicked dissembler set fire vpon them, and burnt of them diuers thousands, and so brought the rest by that meanes vnder subiection to the emperor; during his life time, which after that continued not long. Ex Aene. Syl. The which soudiers, if they had fought so much for the catholike liberties of the pope and his church, as they had fought against him, it is marueil if the pope had not dignified them all for holy martyrs. But they that kill with the sword (saith Christ) shall perish with the sword. Notwithstanding, the cruell deceit of Mainardus, is worthy of all mens detesting.

The cruell deceit and wicked fact of Mainardus against the soudiers of Boheme.

Certaine thousands of the Bohemian soudiers burnt.

During this busines among the bishops beyond the sea, in the meane time our bishops here also in England were not vnoccupied. Whether it be the nature of the country that so giueth, or whether the great liuings and wealthy promotions of the clergy doe draw with them a more insensible towardnesse in Gods religion, hard it is to say: this is manifest to all them which will reade and marke our stories from time to time, that in England is more burning & slaying for religion and for all other matters, more blood shed among vs, then in any other land or nation in Christendome besides. After the burning of Richard Houeden, of Nicolas Canon, and of Thomas Bagby priest, aboue recorded, pag. 612. whom the bishops condemned to death, anno 1431. not long after, about the yeere of our Lord, 1439. which was the eighteenth of the raigne of king Henry the fifth, they had another pore man by the backe named Richard Wiche priest, mentioned both in Robert Fabian, and also in another old English chronicle boxsized of one Perminger. What his opinions were, they doe not expresse. This they record, that this Richard Wiche first was degraded, then burned at the toiner hill for heresie. Some do affirme, that he before his death reuoked, but that slaunch by his burning not to be true.

England noted of cruelty.

Burning and slaying in England.

{Anno 1439 Richard Wiche priest burned.

Ex Regist. Heur. Chicheſtr. part. 7. Ex antiqua alia Chronico.

It is also testified of him, that before his death he spake (as prophecying) that the posterne of the tower should stinke, which also afterward came as he said to passe, wherefore many of the people he was counted for an holy man: Insomuch that (as it is affirmed) they came to the place where he was burnt, and there made their oblations & praiers, and areared a great heape of stones, and set vp a crosse there by night: so that by this meanes a great clamor ran vpon the church-men, and especially vpon such as put him to death. Then to cease the rumor, the king gaue commandement to punish such as went thither on pilgrimage. The copie whereof is here to be seene as followeth.

Richard Wiche after his death taken for a saint.

Rex vicecomitibus London. & Midd. salutem. Albeit Richard Wiche late clerke, who before long sithence heretically did hold, teach, and publikely preach certaine heresies and erroneous opinions in many places within our realme of England: And for the same many yeeres now past being iudicially conuicted, did before a Iudge in that behalfe sufficiently abiure all hereſie generally, and afterward as a dogge returning to his vomit, did presume to maintaine, teach, and publikely preach his former errors and heresies, so that he was worthily adiudged a Relapse: And againe, being impeached for the same before the reuerend father in God Robert bishoppe of London, his lawfull Ordinary, was called forth to iudgement, and being before him, did iudicially confesse his errors and heresies: for the which cause the said reuerend father, vpon mature deliberation by him in the said reuerend father first had with the aduice of the learned in the law, his assistants lawfully proceeding against the said Richard, did by his sentence definitiue, pronounce and adiudge him to be a Relapse, and did degrade him from the order and dignity of priesthood, and took from him all priestly ornaments, and depriued him of all priestly function and priuiledge (according to iustice) and last of all, turned him ouer to the secular power as the manner is: and afterwards you, by our princely commandement and warrant, did according to the law of our realme for his last punishment, consume the body of the said Richard to ashes, being a Relapse conuict, and degraded as a notorious traytour, not onely against God, but also against vs and our crowne crowne and dignity. All which notwithstanding, certaine our subiects, as we haue been sundry times informed, being pricked forward with a diabolicall spirit, practising of all likelihood not only sedition, but also idolatry within our realme, are not afraid publikely to affirme, that the said Richard was altogether innocent of hereticall prauity. Nay rather they doe most shamefully with their vaine deuices, and wickedly conceiued imaginations, blaze abroad that he was, and died, a good, iust, and an holy man, and that he doth many miracles, (whereas indeed no such miracles be done by him.) Which disordinate persons, we may well and vpon probable causes repute and deeme culpable, not only of hereticall prauity, but also of high treason, and as rebels to our person, Maiestie, and violators of the peace and dignity of our realme, as with all breakers and trespassers against the sacred canons of the church, who dare so presumptuously aduenture to worship the said Richard as a Saint, whereas it is not lawfull to worship any manner of person, be he neuer so holy, before he be canonised by the authority of the bishop of Rome. We therefore being very carefull for the good preseruation of our peace, and desirous to abolish from out al the coasts of the same all maner idolatry, do charge and command you, that in certaine places within your liberties, where you shall thinke most conuenient; you cause forthwith proclamations to be made on our behalfe, straitly charging, that no person from henceforth presume to resort to the place where the said Richard was executed vnder colour of Pilgrime, or for any other cause of deuotion whatsoeuer, nor send any offering thither, nor worship him hereafter openly or secretly, nor adiudge, esteeme, repute, name, or talke of him, as otherwise iustified or innocent, then such as the said reuerend father by his former definitiue sentence hath pronounced him to be, vpon paine and penalty to be taken and reputed for an heretike, or a fauorer of heretikes, and to receiue condigne punishment prouided for heretikes. And that you arrest all and euery person whom you shall finde to doe any thing contrary to this our proclamation, and the same so arrested, commit to our prison, there to remaine vntill we shall thinke good to send countermaund for their deliuerance. Witnesse the king at his Manor of Estampsted, the 15. day of July, in the 18. yeere of his raigne.

Per ipsum Regem.

Like writs, and to the same effect were directed to all the Sheriffes throw all the realme, bearing all one and the same date. By the vertue of which letter, the Maior and Sheriffes did bse such diligence, that shortly after, that concourse and sieing of the people was left off.

Ex Regist. Heur. Chicheſtr.

The bishops consult to abolish the law of præmunire facias.

After the burning of this man, which was about the month of June, in the same yeere about Nouember, a conuocation was called by Henry archbishop of Canturbury, wherein was propounded among the clergy, to consult with themselues that it was best to be taken, for the removing away the law of Premuniri facias; for so were the hearts then of the temporalte set against the ecclesiasticall sort, that where any vantage might be giuen them by the law, they did nothing spare, by reason whereof, the churchmen at that time were greatly molested by the said law of Premuniri, and by the kings writs, and other indictements, to their no small annoiance. By long consultation and good aduisement, at last this way was taken, that a petition or supplication should be drawne and presented to the king, for the abolishing of the foresaid law of Premuniri facias, and also for the restraining of other briefes, writs, and indictements, which seemed to lie heauy vpon the clergy. This bill or supplication being contriued and exhibited by the archbishop of Canturbury and of Yorke, vnto the king standing in need the same time, of a subsidie to be collected of the clergy: this answer was giuen to their supplication on the kings behalfe: That forsomuch as the time of Christmas then drew neere, whereby he had as yet no sufficient leasure to aduise vpon the matter, he would take therein a farther pause. In this meane time, as one tendering their quiet, he would send to all his officers and ministers within his realme, that no such briefe of Premuniri, should passe against them or any of them, from the said time of Christmas, till the next parliament, anno 1439. Ex Regist. Cant.

The kings answere to the bill of the clergy, touching the law of Præmunire.

In my former edition of Acts and Monuments, (so haskily rashed by at that present, in such shortnesse of time, as in the said booke thou maiest see gentle reader) declared and signified: among many other matters therein contained, there is a short note made of one Eleanor Cobham, duchesse of Glocester, and of sir Roger Onley knight (priest, if I should haue been partiall,) which two persons, about the yeere of our Lord 1440. or the next yeere following, were condemned, the one to death, the other to perpetuall prison. Of this little short matter, maister Cope the popes scout, lying in priuy wait to spie faults in all mens workes, wheresoeuer any may appeare, taketh pepper in the nose, and falleth againe into his old barking against me, for placing these foresaid persons in my booke of Martyrs; but especially he thinketh to haue great vantage against me, for that in the same story, I doe ioyne withall one Margaret Iourdeman, the witch of Eye, condemned also with the thirtie same time, and burned for practising the kings death by an image of wax, &c. To answere hereunto, first I say (as I before said) that I professe no such title to write of Martyrs, but in generall to write of acts and monuments passed in the church and realme of England. Wherein, why should I be restrained from the free walke of a story writer, more then other that haue gone before me?

These foresaid persons in the same booke.

Secondly touching my commendation of sir Roger Onley, and the lady Cleanor, if master Alane be therewith offended: I answere, that I commended them for labouring and fauoring of the truth of Gods doctrine: For the fact, if any such were in them, I do not commend them. And although I did commend them, yet neither did I it with any long carrying vpon it, nor yet altogether vpon mine owne head, without some sufficient warrant of authority. For why may not I as well beleeue John Bale, as M. Alane beleeue M. Fabian: especially seeing I doe know, and was priuy, that the said John in recognising his centuries, followed altogether the history of Leland. De Catalogo virorum illustrium; which booke being bestowed of master Cheeke, I my selfe did see in the hands of the foresaid John Bale, that time we were both together, dwelling in the house of the noble lady duchesse of Richmond. Wherefore if he thinke me so leude to speake without mine authors, he is deceiued. And if he thinke mine authors not to be beleeued, then let this Nomotheta, or lolly Dictator, come forth and prescribe vs a law, what authors he would haue vs to take, and what to refuse. For else why is it not as free for me to credit John Bale, and Leland, as for him to credit Robert Fabian, and Edward Hall, especially seeing they had seene his bookes and works left behind him, whereupon they might better iudge, and so did neuer these?

To the first obiection.

Briefly, for the name of Roger Onley; if Cope deny that there was any such name in stories mentioned, but that there was one called Roger Wolingbroke, &c. hereby it may appeare, that either his prompter out of England deceiued him, or else that he going no further but to Fabian and Hall, lacketh no good will in him, but only a little matter to make a perfect sycophant. And admit the said name of Onley could not be found in those writers, yet were it not vnpossible for a man to haue two names, especially if he were a religious man, to beare the name of the towne where he was borne, beside his owne proper surname. But now what if I (master Cope) can auouch and bring forth to you the name of Roger Onley out of sufficient record, which you seeme not to haue yet read? Haue ye not then done well, and properly (thinke you) so bitterly to flie in my face, and to backe so eagerly all this while at meware shine in the water, hauing no more cause almost against me, then against the man in the moone? And now lest you should thinke me so much vnprouided of all authority for my defence, as if see you vnprouided of modesty and patience: write you to your prompter or suborner (where soeuer hee lurketh here in England) to send you ouer vnto Louaine the booke of Iohn Harding a chronicler, more ancient then either Fabian or Hall, printed in the house of Richard Graston, anno 1543. where turne to the fol. 223. fac. b. lin. 19. and there shall you finde and reade these words:

To the second obiection.

Againe, the Church and the king cursedly,
By helpe of one maister Roger Onley, &c.

Why the which words, ye must necessarily confesse Roger Onley to be the name of the man, either else must ye needs deny the author. For otherwise, that maister Roger Wolingbroke was the onely helper to the duchesse in that fact, by no wise it can stand with the story of these authors, which say, that foure other besides him were condemned for the same crime, &c. And moreouer, though the said sir Roger Onley was no knight (as I haue said in my former edition) yet this ye cannot deny, by the testimony of them that haue seene his works, but that he was a priest, which you will grant to be a knights fellow. And thus much for the name and condition of maister Roger Onley.

Ex Vnd. Censur. 8. Baleo. 4.

To the third obiection.

Fourthly, as concerning Margaret Iourdeman, whom ye call the witch of Eye, ye offer me herein great wrong, to say that I make her a martyr, which was a witch: whereas I here professe, confesse, and ascertaine both you, and all English men, both present, and all posterity hereafter to come, that this Margaret Iourdeman I neuer spake of, neuer thought of, neuer dreamed of, nor did euer heare of, before you named her in your booke your selfe. So far is it off, that I either with my will, or against my will, made any martyr of her.

Ex Copend. lets warrant a cause.

Furthermore, I professe and denounce in like maner, that neither haue you any will or congrue occasion in my booke so to iudge, much lesse to raile of me. For where in expresse words I doe speake of the mother of the lady Young, what occasion haue you therby to hinder me and my booke with Margaret Iourdeman: which Margaret, whether the was a witch or not, I leaue her to the Lord. As for me, neither did I know of her then, nor did I meane of her now. But because I couple her in the same story, you say. To this I say, because thee was the mother of a lady, I thought to ioyne her with another lady in the same story, as in one pew together, although in one cause I will not say. And yet notwithstanding I doe so couple the said mother with the duchesse, in such distinct difference of yeres, that you maister Cope might easily ha ue vnderstood, or belike you, no man else would haue thought thought the contrary, but that Margaret Jourdeman was neither here in my booke, nor yet in my memento. For the words of my story are plaine, where as the condemnation of the lady Eleanor, and of the mother of lady Young, being referred to the yeere of our Lord, 1441. I doe also in the same story, though the occasion of that lady inferre mention of the mother of the lady Young, declaring in expresse words, that she followed certaine yeeres after, and in the end of that chapter, doe name also the yeere of her burning to be 1490. which was fifty yeeres after the death of Onley, and Margaret Jourdeman: by the computation of which yeeres it is plaine, that no other woman could be noted in that place, but only the lady Youngs mother.

See the former edition, pag. 371.

But M. Cope continuing still in his wrangling mode, obiecteth against, for that in my Calendar the said lady Youngs mother hath the next day in the Catalogue next after the death of Roger Onley, which day pertaineth properly to Margaret Jourdeman, which was burned the same day in Smithfield, and not to the ladies mother, &c.

What other was taken in placing the names and dates, what is that to me? The which had the disposing of the Catalogue, dis place them so in moneths, as he saw them coyned in chapters, not perusing peraduenture nor aduising the chapters, that doth nothing preiudice the truth of my story, which sufficiently doth cleere it selfe in distinguishing them rightly in names and also in yeeres, as is afore declared.

The fifth obiection.

Fifthly and lastly, hauing thus sufficiently answered to your circumstances of persons, names, and times (M. Cope) I will now enter to encounter with you concerning the fact and crime obiected to the lady Duchesse, and to the rest with this protestation before premised vnto the reader, that if the fact be true, and so done as is reported in the histories of Fabian, Hall, and Harding, I desire the reader then so to take me, as though I did not here deale withall, nor speake of the matter, but vtterly to haue pretermitted, and dispunged the same. But forsomuch as the deed and offence laid and giuen forth against these parties, may be a matter made, and of euill will compacted, rather then true indeed: therefore I doe but only moue a question by way of historie, not as defending, nor commending, nor condemning the fact, if it be true, but only moouing the question, whether it is to be iudged true, or suspected rather to be false and forged, and so hauing briefly propounded certaine coniecturall suspicions or suppofals concerning that matter, to passe it ouer, neither medling on the one side nor on the other.

The story of the first Duke of Glocester and Roger Onley his chiefe counsellor.

A question whether Eleanor the Dutchesse was culpable of treason against the king.

Certaine coniectures of the crime not to be true.

1. Coniecture.

The first coniecture, why it may be possible that this act of treason laid to the charge of the Duchesse, and Roger Onley, against the king, may be untrue, is this: that the said Onley (otherwise named Bolingbroke) toke it vpon his death, that they neuer intended any such thing as they were condemned for.

2. Coniecture.

The second coniecture: for that the lady Eleanor, and Onley seemed then to fauor and fauor of that religion set forth by Wickliffe, and therefore like enough that they were hated of the clergy. Furthermore, what hatred and practise of papists can doe, it is not vnknowne.

3. Coniecture.

The third coniecture: for that the said master Roger Onley falsly noted and accused of Necromancy, wrote a booke in purgation of himselfe, entituled, de Innocentia sua. Also another booke entituled, Contra vulgi superstitiones, recorded in Cenu. 8. Bal. cap. 4. Whereupon it is not credible, that he which wrote professedly against the superstitions of the people, was ouertaken with that filth of Necromancy himselfe.

4. Coniecture.

The fourth coniecture: because this accusation against the Duchesse of Glocester, duke Humfreies wife, began not before, but after the grudge kindled betweene the cardinall of Winchester, and duke Humfrey her husband.

5. Coniecture.

Another coniecture may be hereof, for that, if the duchesse had intended any such hainous treason against the kings life, as by burning of a wax candle to consume him, it is not like (neither was there any such need) that she would haue made so many priuy to such a pernicious counsell, as the witch of Eye, master Roger Bolingbroke, master Thomas Southwel, and John Hume.

6. Coniecture.

Sixthly, it is not to be supposed, if any such hie treason had been wrought or pretended against the kings person by these, that either the duchesse should so escape with bearing a taper and punishment, or that John Hume should be pardoned his life, the fact being so hainous, that neither any durst aske his pardon, nor if it had been asked, it had not been like to bee granted.

7. Coniecture.

To these we may also adde another suppofall, rising vpon the words & forme of their accusation, as it standeth in Harding, Polydor, Fabian, and other mo, wherein they were accused to working sorcery and inchantments against the church and the king. Now what sorcery can be wrought against the church, that is, the whole multitude of christians, let the reader iudge, and by the truth of this consider also the truth of the other, which was against the king. Furthermore, if by this church is ment the cardinall of Winchester, as like it is, then it may be coniectured, that all this matter rose of that cardinall, who was then a mortall enemy to the house of Glocester, &c.

8. Coniecture.

Eighthly: and that all this was done and wrought by the said cardinall of Winchester, the witch concerning Eye, maketh the matter the more suspicious, seeing that towne of Eye, as Fabian witnesseth, was neere beside Winchester, and see of that bishop.

9 Coniecture.

Moreouer, for so much as Polydore Virgil, among other story authors, being a man as may be supposed, rather fauouring the cardinals part then the dukes, made no mention at all touching this treason, his silence thereof may minister matter not only to muse, but also to coniecture, that he had found nothing which made him to mistrust the matter. Otherwise it is to bee thought he would haue so moued vp the matter, and passed it ouer without some mention.

10. Coniecture.

Finally and briefly: the frequent practises and examples of other times, may make this also more doubtfull, considering how many subtill pretences, after the like sort haue bin fought, and wrongfull accusations brought against many innocent persons. For (not to repeate the like forgeries against the lord Cobham, and Sir Roger Acton, &c.) why may not this accusation of the duchesse and Onley, be as false as that in the time of king Edward the fifth, which was laid to the charge of the queene and Shores wife by the protector, for enchanting & bewitching of his withered arme: which to be false, all the world doth know, and but a quarrell made, only to oppresse the life of the lord Hastings, and the lord Stanley, &c. And thus maieft thou see, gentle reader, according to the Sibilline mans saying: Nihil nouum esse sub sole: Nihilque dictum, quod non sit dictum prius, &c.

Although these with many mo coniectures, may be alledged in some part of defence of this duchesse, and of her chaplaines and priests, yet because it may not be impossible against the matter laid against them to be true, I leaue it therefore at large as I finde it: saying as I laid before, that if it be true which the stories say in this matter, thinke I beseech thee gentle reader, that I haue said nothing hereof. Only, because y matter may be disputable, and not impossible to be false, I haue but moued thereof a question, and brought my coniectures, leauing the determination and iudgement hereof to thy discreet and free arbitrement. And if M. Cope be so highly offended with me, because in my first edition of Acts and Monuments, I durst name the lady Eleanor, Cobham, and Roger Onley: let him take this for a short answer, because my leasure serueth not to make long brawles with him, that if I had thought no imperfections to haue pafled in my former edition before, I would neuer haue taken in hand the recognition thereof now the second time, thereby to sponge away such motes, as I thought would seeme great stumbling blocks in such mens walks, which walke with no charity to offe, but with malice to carpe and reprehend neither admonishing that they see amisse in others, neither tarying while other men reforme themselues, and finally finding quarrels where no great cause is iustly giuen. And here an end with M. Cope for this time.

Abseles answer to matter Copes cauillations, concerning duke Dunmeres wife.

Forsomuch as in the processe before, mention was touched concerning the grudge betweene the cardinall, called the rich cardinall of Winchester, and the good duke Humfrey duke of Glocester, the kings vncle, and protector of the realme, order of story now requireth to open some part of that matter more at large. Wherein this first is to be vnderstood, that long before great flames of grudge and discord did burst out betweene these two. For as the noble heart of the duke could not abide the proud doings of the cardinall, so much against the cardinall in like manner sore enuied and disdained at the rule of the duke of Glocester. Notwithstanding, by the means of the duke of Bedford, the bralling out betweene them was before appeased and cured: yet not so, but that vnder vnperfect amity, priuy hatred, as sparkes vnder the imbers, did still remaine. So that the cardinall, ioyning with the archbishop of Yorke, attempted many things of their owne presumption, contrary to the consent, not only of the king (being then vnder age) but also of the protector and gouernor of the realme. Wherevnto the duke (like a true hearted prince) being not without iust cause offended, declared in writing to the king certaine complaints contained in 21. articles, wherein the cardinall and archbishop had transgressed, both against the king and his lawes. The tenor whereof more at large is in other stories expressed, the briefe abstract thereof followeth in a short summary here to be seene.

The contention between the cardinall of Winchester and duke Humfrey, lord protector. ∫Anno 1440∫

Ex Polychron.

¶ Certaine points or articles obiected by duke Humfrey, against the cardinall of Winchester.

Winchester presumeth to be cardinall against the minde of his king.

FIrst, complained to his soueraigne prince his right redoubted lord duke Humfrey, his vncle & protector of the realme, that the bishop of Winchester, in the daies of his father king Henry the fifth, toke vpon him the state of a cardinall, being denied by the king, saying, that see had as liefe set his olme crowne beside him, as to see him weare a cardinals hat: and that in parliaments, he not being contented with the place of a bishop among the spirituall persons, presumed aboue his order; which the said duke desired to be redressed.

Winchester incurreth the pain of præmunire.

2. Item, whereas he being made a cardinall, was voided of his bishoppricke of Winchester, hee procured from Rome the popes bull, vnknowing to the king, whereby he take against his bishoppricke, contrary to the common law of this realme, incurring thereby the case of præmunire, and forfeiting all his goods to the king, by the law of premuniri facias.

Winchester incurreth himselfe to be the kings gouernor.

3. Item, hee complained that the said cardinall, with the archbishop of Yorke, intruded themselues to haue the gouernance of the king, and the doing vnder the king of temporall matters, excluding the kings vncle, and other temporall lords of the kings kinne, from hauing knowledge of any great matter.

The Cardinall defeasible by the kings iewels.

4. Item, whereas the king had bozowed of the cardinall foure thousand pounds, vpon certaine iewels, and afterward had his money ready at the day to quit his iewels: the cardinall caused the treasure to conuert that money to the paiment of another army, to keepe the iewels still to his owne vse and gaine.

The Cardinall deliuereth the King of Scots vpon his owne authoritie.

5. Item, he being then bishop of Winchester, and chancellor of England, deliuered the king of Scots vpon his owne authority, contrary to the act of parliament, wedding his niece afterward to the said king. Also, where the said king of Scots should haue paid to the king forty thousand pounds, the cardinall procured ten thousand marks thereof to be remitted, and yet the rest very slenderly paid.

The Cardinall played the marchant.

6. Item the said cardinall, for lending notable sums to the king, had the profit of the port of Hampton, where he, setting his seruants to be the customers, woll and other marchandise was, vnder that cloke, exported, not so much to his singular bantage, being the chiefe merchant, as to the great preiudice of the king, and detriment to his subiects.

7. Item, the cardinall in lending out great sums to the king, yet so deferred and delated the loane thereof, that comming out of season, the same did the king little pleasure, but rather hinderance.

The Cardinall a defeader of the king.

8. Item, where iewels and plate were pzised at eleuen thousand pounds in weight, of the said cardinall forfeited to the king: the cardinall for loane of a little pèce, gat him a restorement thereof, to the kings great dammage, who better might haue spared the commons, if the summe had remained to him cleere.

9. Item, where the kings father had giuen Elizabeth Bewchamp three hundred marks of lineloode, with this condition, if thee wedded within a yeere, the cardinall, notwithstanding the was married two or three yeeres after, yet gaue her the same, to the kings great hurt, and diminishing of his inheritance.

The Cardinall taketh vpon him like a king.

10. Item, the cardinall hauing no authority nor interest to the crowne, presumed notwithstanding to call before him, like a king to the kings high derogation.

11. Item, that the cardinall sued a pardon from Rome, to be freed from all dimes, due to the king by the church of Winchester, giuing thereby example to the clergy, to withdraw their dimes likewise, and lay all the charge only vpon the temporalitie and poze commons.

12. 13. Item, by the procuring of the said Cardinall & Archbishop of Yorke, great goods of the kings were lost and dispended vpon needles Ambassades, first to Arras, then to Calice.

14. Item, it was laid to the charge of the said Cardinall and Archbishop, that by their meanes, going to Calice, the two enemies of the king, the Duke of Orleance, and Duke of Burgoyne, were dedriced together in accord and alliance, who being at warre before betweene themselues, and now confederate together, ioined both together against the kinges townes and countreys ouer the sea, to the great danger of Normandy, and destruction of the kings people.

The Cardinall traitor to the crowne.

15. Item, by the Archbishop of Yorke, and the Cardinall, persuasions were moued openly in the kings psence, with allurements and inducements, that the king should leaue his right, his title, and honour of his crowne, in nominating him king of France, owing certaine yeares, and that hee should vtterly abstaine, and bee content onely in writing, with Rex Angliæ, to the great note and infamy of the king, and all his progenitours.

16. 17. Item, though the sleight and subtlety of the said Cardinall and his mate, a new conuention was intended betweene the king, and certaine aduerfaries of France, alfo the deliuerance of the Duke of Orleance was appointed in such sort, as thereby great dissworship and inconuenience was like to fall, rather of the kings side, then of the other.

The Cardinall a purchaser of the kings lands

18. Item, that the Cardinall had purchased great lands and tenements of the king, the Duke being on the other side the sea occupied in warres, which redounded little to the worship and profite of the king: and moreouer had the king bound, to make him as sure estate of all those lands by Easter next, as could be deuised by any learned counsell, or else the said Cardinall to haue and enioy to him and his heyres for euer, the lands of the Duchie of Lancaster in Northfolke to the value of 7. 0 3 8. hundred markes by the yeare.

Vntruste counsell of the Cardinall.

19. Item, where the Duke the kings vncle, had often offered his seruice for the defence of the Realme of France, and the Duchie of Normandie, the Cardinall euer laboured to the contrary, in preferring other, after this singular affection: whereby a great part of Normandy hath been lost,

20. Item, seeing the Cardinall was risen to such riches and treasure, which could grow to him, neither by his Church, nor by inheritance (which he then had) it was of necessitie to be thought, that it came by his great deceites, in deceiuing both the King, and his subiects, in selling offices, preferments, liuelodes, captainryships; both here, and in the realme of France and in Normandy, so that what hath bene there lost, he hath bene the greatest cause thereof.

The Cardinall of Winchester, a pardon and his remnant.

21. Furthermore, when the said Cardinall had forfeited all his goods by the statute of præmunire, he hauing the rule of the king, and of other matters of the realme, purchased from the Pope a charper of pardon, not only to the defeating of the lawes of the Realme, but also to the defrauding of the king, who otherwise might and should haue had wherewith to sustaine his warres, without any tallag of his poze people, &c.

Partage betweene the Duke and the Cardinall.

When the king heard these accusations, he committed the hearing thereof to his Counsell, whereof the most part were spirituall persons. So, what for feare, and what for fauour, the matter was twitched at, and nothing said, and nothing laid thereunto, and a faire countenance was made to the Duke, as though no displeasure had bene taken, nor matter borne in these spirituall stomaches. But shortly after, the smoke hereof not able to keepe in any longer within the spirituall hells of these charitable churchmen, hast out in flames of mischiefe: For vpon the necke of this matter, as witnesseth Fabian, Polychronicon, and Hall which followeth Polychronicon, first ensued the condemnation of Lady Eleanor the Duches and her Chaplaines, as ye haue heard before. Where by it may appeare, the said Duches more of malice then any iust cause, thus to haue bene troubled. Also within few yeares after, followed the lamentable destruction of the Duke himselfe, as hereafter more is to be declared.

Matter hard but cleare.

∫Anno 1445∫ The death of Henry Chichesley Archbishop of Canterbury.

And after the condemnation of Lady Eleanor the Duches aforesaid, within few yeares, An. 1445. followed the death of Henry Chichesley Archbishop of Cant. by whome the was condemned in S. Stephens chappell at Westminster, for penance to beare a taper through cheapside three sundry times, and afterward outlawed to the Ile of Man, vnder the custody of Sir John Stanley knight. This Henry Chichesley builded in his time, two Colledges in the vniuersitie of Oxford, the one called Allsoule Colledge, the other named Bernard Colledge.

The building of Allsoule Colledge and Bernard Colledge in Oxford.

Proceeding now to the yeare, wherein suffered Humfrey that good Duke of Gloucester, which was y yeare of our Lord 1447. first we will begin in few words to intreate of his life and conuersation: then of the manner and cause of his death. As touching the offspring and descent of this Duke: first, hee was the sonne of Henry the fourth, brother to king Henry the fift, and vncle to king Henry the sixt, assigned to be the gouernour and protector of his person. Of matters he seemed meete and gentle, louing the common wealth, a fauourer of the poze commons, of wit and wisdome discreet and studious, well affect to religion, and a friend to veritie, and no lesse enemie to pride and ambition, especially in haughty Prelates, which was his vndoing in this present euill world: And which is seldome and rare in such princes of that calling, he was both learned himselfe, and no lesse giuen to studie, as also a singular fauourer and patrone to them which were studious and learned. And that my commendation of him may haue the more credit, I will produce the testimonie of learned writers, who liuing in his time, not onely doe commend his fauous knowledge, and ripenes of learning in him, but also commit and submit their workes to his iudgement to be examined. Of which writers, one is Petrus de Monte, writing De virtutum & vitiorum differentia: who in his Epistle dedicatory beginning with the singular commendation of this Duke, & afterward speaking De optimarum artium, liberaliumque scientiarum peritia, saith thus: Cuicu quidem omni conatui omni ingenio, atque studio incumbis: adeo & nihil tibi sine librorum lectione, iucundum, gratum aut certe delectabile videatur, &c. And in further procelle of his worke, thus hee further declareth, saying: Delectaris autem non vna tantum arte, aut scientia, quanquam & id quidem esset satis: verumtamen omnibus, earumque codices magna quadam auiditate legisti, &c. Besides this Petrus de Monte, let vs heare also the iudgement of another writer of the same age, named Lapis Castellius, who likewise dedicating to the said Duke Humfrey, his booke intituled Comparatio studiorum & rei militaris. Among st diuers other workes commendatory, hath these as follow: Ad te potissimum mitto quod horum te optimum, & sapientissimum iudicem fore existimo, qui vt ex integerrim, o patre domino Zenone Baiocensi episcopo, homine tuæ laudis cupidissimo, accepi: ita in his humanitatis studiis inuigilares, vt nullus toto terrarum orbe princeps, nec doctrina, nec eloquentia, nec humanitate tecum comparandus sit, &c. Many other arguments and places may bee brought to declare that is to bee esteemed of the learning and studious wit of this noble Prince.

Furthermore, as the learning of this Prince was rare and memorable, so was the discreete wisedome and singular prudence in him no lesse to be considered: as for the more manifest fell proffe thereof, I thought here good amongst many other his godly doings, to recite one example reported as well by the pen of M. Thomas Moore, as also by M. William Tindall, the true Apostle of these our latter daies, to the intent to see and note, not only the crafty working of false miracles in the clergy, but also that the prudent discretion of this high and mighty prince, the foresaid duke Humfrey, may giue us the better to vnderstand what man he was. The story lieth thus.

In the young daies of this king Henry the fifth, being yet vnder the gouernance of this duke Humfrey his protector, there came to S. Albons a certaine beggar with his wife, and there was walking about the towne begging, fiue or six daies before the kings comming thither, saying that he was borne blinde, & neuer saw in his life, and was warned in his dreame, that he should come out of Warwicke, where he said he had euer dwelled, to seeke saint Albon, and that he had been at his shrine, and had not been holpen, and therefore he would goe and seeke him at some other place: for he had heard some say, since he came, that S. Albons body should be at Colen, and in deed such a contention hath there been. But of truth as I am surely informed he lieth here at S. Albons, sauing some reliques of him, which they there shew shrined. Barre ye vpon forth my tale, when the king was come, and the towne full, suddenly this blind man at S. Albons shrine had his sight againe, and a miracle solemnly rung, and Te Deum sung, so that nothing was talked of in all the towne, but this miracle. So hapned it then, that duke Humfrey of Glocester, a man no lesse wise then also well learned, hauing great ioy to see such a miracle, called the poore man vnto him, and first shewing himselfe ioyous of Gods glory, so shewed in the getting of his sight, and exhorting him to meekenesse, and to no ascribing of any part of the worship to himselfe, nor to be proud of the peoples praise, which would call him a god and godly man thereby: at last, he looked well vpon his eyne, and asked whether he could see nothing at all in all his life before. And when as well his wife as himselfe affirmed fastly no, then he looked additely vpon his eyne again, and said: I beleeue you very well, for me thinketh ye cannot see well yet. Yes sir, quoth he, I thanke God and his holy martyr, I can see now as well as any man. Yea can (quoth the duke) what colour is my gowne? Then anon the begger told him. What colour (quoth he) is this mans gowne? He told him also, and so forth without any sticking, he told him the names of all the colours that could be shewed him. And when the duke saw that, he bad him walke traitor, and made him to be set openly in the stockes: for though he could haue seene suddenly by miracle the difference betweene diuers colours, yet could he not by the sight so suddenly tell the names of all these colours, except he had knowne them before, no more then the names of all the men that he should suddenly see.

A false miracle wrought.

Dissimulation is ill punished.

By this may it be seene how duke Humfrey had not only an head to discerne and discusse truth from forged and fained hypocrisie, but freely also and diligence likewise was in him, to reforme that which was amisse.

Commendation of duke Humfrey.

And thus much hitherto for the noble prowesse and vertues, ioyned with the like ornaments of knowledge, and literature shining in this princely duke. For the which, as he was both loued of the poore commons, and well spoken of all men, and no lesse deseruing the same, being called the good duke of Glocester, so neither yet wanted he his enemies and pitty enuiers, whether it was through the fatall and vnfortunate lucke of the name of that house, which is but a vaine and friuolous obiection of Polydor and all which followeth him, bringing in mention of Polydor and all which followeth him, bringing in the crauyles of Hugh Spenser, of Thomas of Woodstocke, sonne of king Edward the third, of this duke Humfrey, and after of king Richard the third, duke likewise of Glocester: or whether it was that the nature of true vertue commonly is such, that as the flame euer beareth his smoke, and the bodie his shadow, so the brightnesse of vertue neuer blazeth, but hath some disdaine or enuy waiting vpon it: or else whether it was rather for some vnwoonesse from his wife, or for some other vice or trespasse done (as seemeth most like truth) which God as well in dukes houses correcteth, as in other inferior persons, especially where hee loueth. But howsoeuer the cause is to vs vnknowne, this good duke of Glocester, albeit being both the kings sole vncle, and hauing so many kinsmen throwen the whole realme, yet lacked not his foemen, lacked not his secret maligners. Of whom, specially was Henry Beuford cardinall, bishop of Winchester, and chancellor of England, who of long time disdaining and enuying the rule & authority of this duke, first had disposed and appointed himselfe, to remoue the kings person from Sthan vnto Windsor out of the dukes hands, and there to put in such gouernors as him liked. After that, intending the dukes death, he set men of armes and archers at the end of London bridge, and fore-barring the high way with a draw-chaine, set men in chambers, cellers and windowes with bowes and arrowes and other weapons, to the purposed destruction both of the duke and his retinue, if God had not so disposed to turne his tourney another way. Besides other manifold iniuries and molestations, the ambitious Cardinall seeking by all meanes to be pope, procured such trouble against him, that great diuision was thereby in the whole realme: insomuch that all the shops within the city of London were shut in, for feare of the fauourers of these two great personages, for each part had assembled no small number of people. For the pacifying whereof, the archbishop of Canturbury, & the duke of Quinbrer, called the prince of Portingale, rode 7. times in one day betweene those two aduersaries. Such were then the troubles of this tumultuous diuision within the realme, and all by the excitation of this vnquiet cardinall.

The enemies of the duke of Glocester.

The malicious workings of the cardinall against the duke of Glocester.

Duer and beside this cardinall afore mentioned, an other capitall enemy to the said duke, was William de la Pole, first earle, then marquesse, at last duke of Suffolke, a man very ill reported of in stories, to be not only the organ and instrument of this good mans death, but also to be the nourance of the common wealth, and ruine of the realme. For by him and his onely deuice, was first concluded the vnprofitable and vnhonorable mariage betweene the king and lady Margaret daughter of the duke of Angeow: where as the king had concluded and contracted a mariage before with the daughter of the earle of Arminis, vpon conditions so much more profitable and honorable, as more conuenient it is for a prince to marrie a wife with riches and friends, then to take a maid with nothing, and disherit himselfe, and his realme of old rights, and ancient inheritance, which so came to passe. And all this the good duke did well foresee, and declared no lesse, but his counsell would not be taken. Wherupon followed first the giuing away the duchy of Angeow, and the city of Paine, with the whole countrey of Paine, to Reiner duke of Angeow and father of the damsell, called then king of Sicile, and of Jerusalem, hauing therof no peny profit, but only a vaine name to play withall.

Queene Margaret mortall enemy to the duke of Glocester.

Another great enemy and mortall plague to this duke, was the queene her selfe, latelie before married to the king: Who being of haucie stomacke, and all set vpon glorie, of wit and willes lacking nothing, and perceiuing hir husband to be simple of wit, and easie to be ruled, tooke vpon her to rule and gouerne both the king and kingdome. And because the aduice and counsell of Humfrey duke of Glocester, was somewhat a stay that her authority and regiment could not so fully proceed, and partly because the said duke before did disagree from that mariage, this manly woman and couragious queene ceased not by all imaginations and practises possible, to set forward his destruction, hauing also for her helper herein the duke of Buckingham, &c.

Gods punishment vpon the Quenes of Suffolke.

The malice of a woman.

These being his principall enemies and mortall foes, fearing lest some commotion might arise, if such a prince so neere the kings blood, and so deare to the people, and of all men so beloued, should be openly executed and put to death, deuised how to trap him, and circumuent him vnknowing and vnprouided. For the more speedy furtherance whereof, a parliament was summoned to be kept at Bury, Anno 1447. farre from the citizens of London, as William Tindall in his booke of practise writeth, where resorted all the peeres of the realme, and amongst them the duke of Glocester, thinking no harme to any man, and lesse to himselfe. Who on the second day of the Session, was by the lord Beamond high constable then of England, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham and other, arrested, apprehended, and put in ward, and vpon the same all his seruants discharged and put from him, of whom 32. of the principall being also vnder arrest, were dispersed into diuers prisons, to the great murmuring and grieuance of the people. After this arrest thus done, and the duke put into ward, the night after (saith Hall) fiue nights after (saith Fabian and Polychron) hee was found dead in his bed the 24. of Februarie, and his body shewed to the lords and commons, as though he had beene taken naturally with some sudden disease. And although no wound in his body could be seene, yet to all indifferent persons it might well be iudged, that he died of no naturall pang, but of some violent hand. Some suspected him to be strangled, some that a whole spit was priuily forced into his body; some affirme that he was stifled betweene two featherbeds. After the death of this duke, and his body fered interred at saint Albones, after hee had politickly by the space of 15. yeeres gouerned this realme, fine of his household, to wit, one knight, 2. esquires, and a yeoman, were arraigned, and conuict to be hanged, drawne and quartered. Who being hanged and cut downe halfe aliue, the marques of Suffolke there present shewed the charter of the kings pardon, and so they were deliuered. Notwithstanding, all this could not appease the grudge of the people, saying that the saying of the seruants, was no amends for the murthering of the master.

In this cruell fact of these persons, which did to conspire and consent to the death of this noble man, and which thought thereby to worke their owne safety, the marueilous works of Gods iudgement, appeareth herein to be noted, who as in all other like cruell policies of man, so in this also turned all their policies cleane contrary. So that where the queene thought most to preserue her husband in honor, and her selfe in state, thereby both the lost her husband, her husband lost his realme, the realme lost Angeow, Normandy, the duchy of Aquitane, with all her parts beyond the sea, Calice onely except, as in the sequell of the matter, who so will reade the stories, shall right well vnderstand.

Gods punishment vpon the Quenes of Suffolke.

The false glose of mans heart fayning himselfe in sorrow. The commons discontent. The duke of Suffolke accused by the commons.

The queene, albeit she tenderly loued the duke, yet to appease the exclamation of the commons, was forced to commit him to the Tower; where he, with as much pleasure and liberty as could be, remained for a moneth, which being expired, hee was deliuered and restored againe vnto his old place, and former fauour with the king: whereat the people more grudged then before. It happened by the occasion of a commotion then beginning amongst the rude people, by one whom they called Blewbeard, that the parliament was for that time adiourned to Leicester, thinking to the queene, by force and vigor of late to represse there the malice and euill will conceiued against the duke. But at that place few of the nobility would appeare. Wherefore it was againe retourned vnto London, and kept at Westminster, where was a whole companie, and a full appearance with the king and queene, and with them the duke of Suffolke, as chiefe counsellor. The commons not forgetting their old grudge, renewed againe their former articles and accusations against the said duke, against the bishop of Salisburie, and sir Iames Finies, lord Say, and other. When the king perceiued that no glosing nor dissimulation would serue to appease the continuall clamour of the importunate commons, to make some quiet pacification, first hee sequestred from him the lord Say, treasurer of England, and other the dukes adherents from their offices. Then hee put in exile the duke of Suffolke, for the terme of fiue yeeres, supposing by that space the furious rage of the people would assuage. But the hand of God would not suffer the guiltlesse blood of Humfrey duke of Glocester, to bee vnreuenged, or that flagitious person further to continue. For when he shipped in Suffolke, intending to be transported into France; he was encountred with a ship of war belonging to the Tower: whereby he was taken, and brought into Douer rode, and there on the side of a ship boate, one strake off his head: which was about the yeere of our Lord. 1450.

And thus haue ye heard the sully stop and discourse of duke Humfrey, and of all his aduersaries; also of Gods condigne punishment vpon them for their bloodie cruelty. But before I remoue from the said storie of the foresaid duke, and of the proud cardinall his enemie, I will here by the way, annex a certaine instrument by the king and aduice of his counsell, made against the said cardinall, taking vpon him to enter into this realme, as legate from the pope, contrary to the old lawes and customes of this realme, as by the words of the said instrument here in Latine may well appeare.

An instrument by the king against the admitting the popes legate.

The sum and effect whereof in English is this, that in the yeere of our Lord 1428. as the king with duke Humfrey lord protector, and the rest of the councell, were in the dukes house in the parish of S. Bennets by Pauls wharfe, one Richard Canday procurator, in the kings name and behalfe did protest and denounce by this publike instrument, that whereas the king and all his progenitors, kings before him of this realme of England haue beene heretofore possessed time out of mind, with speciall priuiledge and custome vsed and obserued in this realme from time to time, that no legate from the apostolike see should enter into this land or any of the kings dominions, without the calling, petition, request, inuitement or desire of the king, and forsomuch as Henry bishop of Wint. and cardinall of S. Eusebius, hath presumed so to enter as legate from the pope, being neither called, sent for, required, or desired by the king: therefore the said Richard Candray in the kings name doth protest by this instrument, that it standeth not with the kings mind or intent, by the aduice of his councell, to admit, approue, or ratifie the comming of the said legate in any wise, in derogation of the rights, customes and lawes of this his realme: or to recognise, or assent to any exercise of this his authority legantine, or to any acts, attempts, or hereafter by him to be attempted in this respect contrary to the foresaid lawes, rightes, customes, and liberties of this realme, by these presents, &c.

And thus much as an appendix, annexed to the story of D. Humfrey, and the cardinall of Winchester extract out of an old written volume, remaining in the hands of master William Bowyer.

The benefit and inuention of printing.

§ Anno § 1450 § Time of printing inuented.

In following the course, and order of yeeres, wee find this foresaid yeere of our Lord 1450. to be famous and memorable, for the diuine and miraculous inuention of printing. Naucclerus, and Wimfelingus following him, referre the inuention thereof to the yeere 1440. In paralip. Abbatis Vrsp. it is recorded this faculte to be found, An. 1446. Auentinus and Zieglerus doe say, Anno 1450. The first inuenter thereof (as most agree) is thought to be a Germane, dwelling first in Argentine, afterward in Mens, named Iohn Faustus, a Goldsmith. The occasion of this inuention first was by engreauing the letters of the Alphabet in metall: who then layng blacke inke vpon the metall, gaue the fourme of letters in paper. The man being industrious and actiue, perceiuing that, thought to proceed further, and to proue whether it would frame as well in words, and in whole sentences, as it did in letters. Which when he perceiued to come well to passe, hee made certaine other of his counsell, one Iohn Guttenbergo and Peter Schaffard, binding them by their oth, to keepe silence for a season. After ten yeeres, Iohn Guttenbergo compartner with Faustus, began then first to broch the matter at Strausbourgh. The art being yet but rude, in processe of time, was set forward by inuentiue wits, adding more and more to the perfection thereof. In the number of whom, Iohn Mentell, Iohn Pius, Adolphus Ruschius, were great helpers. Ulricus Han, in Latine called Gallus, first brought it to Rome. Whereof the epigram was made:

Carmen Ant. Caspard.

Anser Tarpeij custos, vigilando quòd alis
Constreperes, Gallus decidit, victor adest
Viricus Gallus, ne quem poscantur in vsum,
Edocuit pennis nil opus esse tuis.

Notwithstanding, what man seeuer was the instrument, without all doubt God himselfe was the ordainer and disposer thereof, no otherwise, then he was of the gift of tongues, and that for a singular purpose. And well may this gift of printing be resembled to the gift of tongues: for like as God then spake with many tongues, and yet all that would not turne the Iewes: so now, when the holy Ghost speaketh to the auncients in innumerable sorts of bookes, yet they will not be conuerted, nor turne to the Gospell.

Painting came of God.

Painting likened to the gifts of tongues.

Now to consider to what end and purpose the Lord hath giuen this gift of printing to the earth, and to what great brutlty and necessity it serueth, it is not hard to iudge, who so wisely perpendeth both the time of the sending, and the sequell which thereof ensueth.

The time conteined when printing was found.

And first, touching the time of this faculty giuen to the vse of man, this is to be marked: that when as the bishop of Rome with all the whole and full content of the cardinals, patriarkes, archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, fatipeers, doctors, prouosts, deanes, archdeacons, assembled together in the councell of Constance, had condemned poore Iohn Hus, and Hierome of Prage to death for heresie, notwithstanding they were no heretickes, and after they had subdued the Bohemians, and all the whole world vnder the supreme authority of the Romish see: and had made all christian people obedientiaries and bondslaues vnto the same, hauing (as one would say) all the world at their will, so that the matter now was past not onely the power of all men, but the hope also of any man to be recouered: in this very time so dangerous and desperate, where mans power could doe no more, there the blessed wisedome and omnipotent power of the Lord began to worke for his church, not with sword and target to subdue his cruell aduersary, but with printing, writing, and reading to conuince darkenes by light, errour by truth, ignorance by learning. So that by this meanes of printing, the secret operation of God hath heaped vpon that proud kingdome a double confusion.

Double confusion vpon the pope by printing.

For whereas the bishop of Rome had burned Iohn Hus before, and Hierome of Prage, who neither denied his transubstantiation, nor his supremacie, nor yet his popish masse, but said masse, and heard masse themselues, neither spake against his purgatorie, nor any other great matter of his popish doctrine, but onely exclaimed against his exesse and pompe, pride, his vnchristian or rather antichristian abominacion of life: thus while he could not abide his wickednesse onely of life to be touched, but made it heresie, or at least matter of death, whatsoeuer was spoken against his detestable conuersation and maners. God of his secret iudgement, seeing time to helpe his church, hath found a way by this faculty of printing, not only to confound his life and conuersation, which before he could not abide to be touched, but also to cast downe the foundation of his standing, that is, to examine, confute, and detect his doctrine also, & institution, and not detestable in such sort, that though his life were neuer so peruerse, his doctrine standing as it doth, no man is so blind but may see, that either the pope is Antichrist, or else that Antichrist is nere come to the pope. And all this doth, and will hereafter more and more appeare by printing.

The fruit and profit of printing.

The cause whereof is this: for that hereby tongues are knowne, knowledge groweth, iudgement encreaseth, bookes are dispersed, the Scripture is seene, the doctours be read, stories be opened, times compared, truth discerned, falshood detected, and with finger pointed, and all (as I said) through the benefit of printing. Wherefore I suppose, that either the pope must abolish printing, or he must seeke a new hauen to refuge vnto: for else, as this world standeth, printing doubtlesse will abolish him. But the pope, and all his colledge of cardinals, must this vnderstand, that through the light of printing, the world beginneth now to haue eyes to see, and heads to iudge: he cannot walke so inuisible in a net, but he will be spied. And although through might he stopped the mouth of Iohn Hus before, and of Hierome, that they might not preach, thinking to make his kingdome sure: yet in stead of Iohn Hus and other, God hath opened the presse to preach, whose voice the pope is neuer able to stop with all the prelature of his triple crowne. By this printing, as by the gift of tongues, and as by the singular organe of the holy Ghost, the doctrine of the Gospell soundeth to all nations and countries vnder heauen: and what God reuealeth to one man, is dispersed to many, and that is knowne in one nation, is opened to all.

The first and best vse for the bishop of Rome, by the benefit of printing, to learne and know the truth. If hee will not, let him well vnderstand, that printing is not set vp for nought. To striue against the streame, it auaileth not. What the pope hath lost since printing and the presse began to preach, let him call his counters. First, when Erasmus wrote, and Frobenius printed, what a blow thereby was giuen to all friers and monkes in the world! And who seeth not, that the pen of Luther following after Erasmus and set forward by printing, hath set the triple crowne so awry on the popes head, that it is like neuer to be set straight againe?

So preached the diuel of Croydon in king Henry the 8. Daies.

Briefly, if there were no demonstration to leade, yet by this one argument of printing, the bishop of Rome might vnderstand the counsell and purpose of the Lord to worke against him, hauing prouided such a way in earth, that almost how many printing presses there be in the world, so many blockehouses there be against the high castle of saint Angell: So that either the pope must abolish knowledge and printing, or printing at length will roote him out. For if a man wisely consider the pold and slanting of the pope, thus hee may reputt with himselfe, that as nothing made the pope strong in time past, but lacke of knowledge and ignorance of simple christians: so contrariwise, now nothing doth debilitate and shake the high spire of his papacie so much as reading, preaching, knowledge and iudgement, that is to say, the fruit of printing: Whereof some experience we see already, and more is like (the Lord before) to follow. For although, through outward force and violent cruelty, tongues are not speake, yet the hearts of men daily (no doubt) bee inflamed through this benefit of printing. And though the pope hold now by cruelty, and in times past by ignorance, had all vnder his possession: yet neither must he thinke, that violence will alwaies continue, neither must he hope for, that now, which he had then: forsomuch as in those former daies, bookes then were scarce and also of such excessiue price, that few could attaine to the buying, fewer to the reading and studying thereof: which bookes now by the meanes of this art, are made easie vnto all men. We heard before, pag. 611. how Nicolas Belward, bought a new Testament in those daies for foure markes and fortepence, where as now the same price will serue well fortie persons with so many bookes.

The tyranny of the Turke toward his owne men.

Moreouer, in the pag. 379. col. 1. it was noted and declared by the testimony of Armachanus, how for defect of bookes and good authours, both Vniuersities were decayed and good wits kept in ignorance, while begging friers scraping all the wealth from other priests, heaped vp all bookes that could be gotten, into their owne Libraries: where either they did not diligently apply them, or else did not rightly vse them, or at least kept them from such as more fruitfully would haue perused them.

The towardnes of Duke Iustinian.

In this then so great rarity, and also dearth of good bookes, when neither they which could haue bookes, would well vse them, nor they that would, could haue them to vse, that marueil if the greedinesse of a few prelates did amate the blindnes of those daies, to the aduancement of themselues? Wherefore almighty God of his mercifull prouidence, seeing both what lacked in the church, and how also to remedie the same, for the aduancement of his glory, gaue the vnderstanding of this excellent art or science of printing, whereby three singular commodities at one time came to the world. First, the price of all bookes diminished. Secondly, the speedy helpe of reading more furthered. And thirdly, the plentie of all good authors enlarged: according as Aputinus, both truely report:

Imprimit ille die, quantum non scribitur anno. i.
The presse in one day will doe in printing,
That none in one yeere can doe in writing.

When Sunnes were first inuented.

By reason whereof, as printing of bookes minished matter of reading: so reading brought learning, learning shewed light, by the brightnesse whereof blind ignorance was suppressed, errour detected, and finally Gods glory, with truth of his word aduanced. This faculty of printing was after the inuention of Guns, the space of 130. yeares: which inuention was also found in Germany an. 1380. And thus much for the worthie commendation of printing.

The lamentable losing of Constantinople.

The losing of Constantinople

Anno 1453. Constantinus Paleologus, being Emperour of Constantinople, the 29. day of the moneth of May, the great citie of Constantinople was taken by the Turke Mahometes, after the siege of 54. daies, which siege began in the beginning of April. Within the citie, besides the citizens were but onelie 6000. refuses of the Greekes. And 2000. of the Venetianes and Genues. Against these, Mahometes brought an armie of 400. thousand, collected out of the countries and places adioyning neere about, as out of Grecia, Illyrica, Wallachia, Dardanis, Triballis, Bulgaris, out of Bithynia, Galatia, Lydia, Cecilia, and such other: which places had the name yet of christians. Thus one neighbor for lucre sake, helped to destroy another.

The citie was compassed of the Turkes, both by the Sea and land. Mahometes the Turke diuided his armie into three sundrie parts, which in three parts of the citie, so beat the walls and brake them downe, that they attempted by the breaches thereof to enter the citie. But the valiantnesse of the christians therein was much commendation, whose duke was called Iohn Iustinianus, of Genua. But for so much as the assaults were great, and the number of the christian souldiors battle decreased, fighting both at the walles and at the hauen, against such a multitude of the Turkes, they were not able long to hold out. Beside, the armies which late battering at the walles, the Turke had vpon the sea his nauie of 200. and 50. saile, lying vpon the hauen of the citie, reaching from the one side of the hauens mouth vnto the other, as if a bridge should be made from the one banke to the other. Which hauen by the citizens was barred with yron chaines, whereby the Turkes were kept out a certaine space. Against which nauie 7. ships there were of Genua, within the hauen, and three of Creta, vnder cuerne of Venice, which stood against them. Also the souldiors shining out of the citie, as occasion would serue, did manfullie gainstand them, and with wilde fire, set their shippes on fire, that a certaine space they could serue to no vse. At length the chaines being braft, and a waie made, the Turkes nauie entred the hauen, and assaulted the citie, whereby the Turke began to conceiue great hope, and was in forwardnesse to obtaine the citie. The assault and skirmish then waxing more hot, Mahometes the tyrant stood vp vpon an hil, with his warriours about him, crying and hooling out vnto them to scale the walles and enter the fowne; otherwise, if any recule, he threatened to kill them, and so he did. Wherefore a great number of his souldiers in their repulse and retire, were slaine by the Turkes owne, being sent by his commandement to slay them: and so they were inflie serued, and well payed their hire.

Although this was some comfort to the Christians, to see and behold out of the citie, the Turkes retinue so confirmed, yet that hope lasted not long. Shortly after by rage of warre, it happened Iustinian the Duke aboue named, to be hurt, who notwithstanding that he was earnestlie desired by Paleologus the emperour, not to leaue his tower which he had to keep, seeing his wound was not deadly dangerous; yet could hee not be intreated to tarrie, but left his standing, and his foe dis-furnished, setting none in his place to awarde the same. And so this doughtie duke, hurt more with his false heart, then with force of weapon, gaue ouer and fledde to Chius, where shortly after for sorrow, rather then for sorenes of his wound, he died. Many of his souldiers seeing their Captaine flie, followed after, leauing their port vtterly destitute without defence. The Turkes vnderstanding that bantage, some hault into the citie. The emperor Paleologus seeing no other way but to flie, making toward the gate, either was slaine, or else troden downe with the multitude. In the which gate eight hundred dead mens bodies were found and taken vp.

Constantinople won of the Turkes.

The citie of Constantinople thus being got, the Turkes sacking and ranging about the streetes, houses, and corners, did put to the sword most vnmercifullie, whomsoeuer they found, both aged and young: matrons, virgins, children and infants: sparing none, the noble matrons and virgins were horrible rauished: the gods of the citie, the treasuries in houses, the ornaments in Churches were all sackt and spoyled, the pictures of Christ opprobriously handled, in hatred of Christ. The spoyle and hauocke of the citie lasted three daies together, while the barbarous souldiers murdered and rifeled what them listed.

The horrible tyranny of the Turks.

These things thus being done, and the tumult ceased, after three daies, Mahometes the Turke, entreth into the citie, and first calling for the heads and ancients of the citie: such as he found to be left aliue, he commanded them to be mangled and cut in peeces. It is also (saith my author) reported, that in the streets of the Turkes, honest matrons and virgins, and such as were of the kings stocke, after other contumelies, were hewen and cut in peeces for their disport.

And this was the end of that princelie and famous citie of Constantinople, beginning first by Constantinus, and ending also with Constantinus: which for the princely royaltie thereof, was named and euer honoured, from the time of the first Constantine, equally with the citie of Rome, and called also by the name thereof new Rome, and so continued the space of 1120. yeares. I pray God that old Rome may learne of new Rome, to take heed and beware betime.

Constantinople called new Rome.

This terrible destruction of the citie of Constantinople, the Queene of cities, I thought here to describe, not so much to set forth the barbarous cruelte of these filthie rakehelles and mercilesse murderers: as specially for this, that we being admonished by the dolefull ruine and miserie of these our eiuer christened, may call to minde the plagues and miseries deserued, which seeme to hang no lesse ouer our owne heads, and thereby may learne betime to inuocate and call more earnestlie vpon the name of our terrible and mercifull God, that hee for his sonnes sake will keepe vs, and preserue his Church among vs, and mitigate those plagues and sorowes, which we no lesse haue deserued, then these aboue minded, before vs. Christ grant it. Amen. Ex Hist. Wittenbergica Peucer.

A warning to all Christendom by Constantinople.

The historie of Reynold Pecocke bishop of Chichester, afflicted and imprisoned for the Gospell of Christ.

The story of Reinold Pecocke.

After the death of Henry Chichesley before mentioned, an. 1447. next succeeded Iohn Stafford, anno 1445. who continued eight yeares. After him came Iohn Kempe, anno 1453. who sate but three yeares. Then succeeded Thomas Barscher. In the time of which archbishop, fell the trouble of Reynold Pecocke, bishop of Chichester, affliated by the popes prelats for his faith and profession of the Gospell. Of this bishop, Hall also in his Chronologie toucheth a little mention, declaring that an ouerthwart iudgement (as he termeth it) was giuen by the fathers of the spirituall state against him. This man (saith he) began to moue questions not pertinent, but appertile in the Vniuersities, concerning the Annates, Peterpence, and other iurisdictions and authorities pertaining to the see of Rome, and not onlie put forth the questions, but declared his mind and opinion in the same: wherefore he was for this cause abiured at Pauls crosse: Thus much of him writeth Hall. Of whom also recordeth Polychronicon, but in few words. This bishop, first of saint Asaph, then of Chichester, so long as he was suffered liue (by whom he was promoted and much made of) was quiet and safe, and also bold to dispute and to write his mind, and wrote (as Leland recordeth) diuers bookes and treatises. But after that good Duke was thus (as ye haue heard) made away, this good man lacking his backestaie, was open to his enemies, and matter soone found against him. Whereupon he being complained of, and accused by priuie and malignant promoters vnto the archbishop, letters first were directed downe from the archbishop, to cite all men to appeare that could say any thing against him, the fourme of which citation here ensueth.

The citation of the archb. Tho. Bourchier, alias Bouchier.

The Copie of the citation sent by the Archbishop.

THomas by the permission of God, archb. of Canturburie, primate of all England, and Legate of the Apostolicke see, to all and singuler, parsons, vicars, chaplaines, curates, and not curates, clerkes and learned men, whatsoeuer they be, constitute and ordained in any place throughout our prouince of Canturbury, health, grace, and benediction.

We haue receiued a greeuous complaint of our reuerend fellow brother, Reinold Pecocke bishop of Chichester, conteining in it, that albeit our said reuerend fellow brother, the bishop, deliuered vnto vs certaine bookes written by him in the English tongue, by vs and our authoritie to be examined, corrected, reformed and allowed: notwithstanding many (the examination and reformation of the saide bookes depending and remaining before vs vndiscussed) haue openly preached and raught at Pauls crosse in London, and in diuers other places of our prouince of Canturburie, that our said fellow brother the bishop, hath propounded, made and written, and resused to be written in the said bookes, certaine conclusions repugnant to the true faith, and that he doth obstinately hold and defend the same. By the pretence of which preaching & teaching, the state and good name and fame of the said Lord Reynold the bishop, are greeuously offended and hurt, and he and his opinion marueilously burdened. Wherfore we charge you all together, and seuerally apart do command you, firmely enioyning you, that openly and generally you do warn or cause to be warned, all and singuler such persons, which will obiect any thing contrary & against the conclusions of our said reuerend fellow brother the bishop, had or conteined in his books or writings: that the 20. day after such monition or warning had, they do freely of their own accord appeare before vs & our commissaries in this behalfe appointed, wherefore we shall then be in our city, dioces, or prouince of Canturburie, to speake, propound, alledge, & affirme fully & sufficientlie in writing, whatsoeuer heretical or erroneous matter they will speake, propound, or obiect against the said conclusions contained in the said fayd books: and both to satisfie and receiue, whatsoeuer shal seeme meete and right in this behalfe by the holy institutions and ordinances.

And forsomuch as this matter depending yet vndetermined and vndiscussed, nothing ought to be attempted or renewed: we charge you that by this our authoritie, you inhibit and forbid all and euery one so to preach and teach hereafter. Vnto whom also we by the tenour of these presents, do likewise forbid, that during the examination of the conclusions & books aforesaide, depending before vs and our Commissaries vndiscussed, they doe not presume by any meanes, without good aduice and iudgement, to preach, iudge, and affirme any thing to the preiudice or offence of the said Lord Reynold the bishop: and if so be you doe finde any in this behalfe, gainesaying or not obeying this our inhibition, that you doe cite or cause them peremptorilie to be cited, to appeare before vs or our Commissaries, in this behalfe appointed, the tenth day after their citation, if it be a court day, or else the next court day following, wheresoeuer we shall then be, in our citie, dioces, or prouince of Canturbury, to make further declaration by forme of lawe of the cause of their disobedience, and to receiue such punishment as iustice and equitie shall determine in that behalfe: and that by your letters you doe dulie certifie vs or our Commissaries, what you haue done in the premisses at the day and place aforesaide: or that he which hath so executed our commandement, doe so certifie vs by his letters. Dated at our Manour of Lambeth the xxii. day of October, an. 1457. and in the fourth yeare of our translation.

Pecock appeareth at Lambeth before the archb.

This citation being directed, the bishop vpon the summon thereof, was brought, or rather came before the iudges and bishops, vnto Lambeth, where the foresaid Thomas the archbishop, with his doctors and lawyers, were gathered together in the archbishops court. In which conuention also the duke of Buckingham was present, accompanied with the bishops of Worcester, and of Lincolne. What were the opinions and articles against him obiected, after in his reuocation shall be specified. In his answering for himselfe in such a companie of the popes friends, albeit he could not preuaile: notwithstanding he stoutlie defending himselfe declared many things worthy great commendation of learning, if learning against power could haue preuailed.

Great labour to reduce Pecock from his opinions.

But they on the contrarie part, with all labour and trauell, ettended themselues, either to reuoke him, or els to confound him. As here lacked no blustering words of terrour and threatning, so also manie faire flattering words and gentle persuasions, were amist withall. Briefle, to make a short narration of a long and busie trauerse, here was no stone left vnturned, no waies vnpassed, either by faire meanes or by treate him, or by terrible menaces to terrifie his minde, till at the length, hee being vanquished and ouercome by the bishops, began to faint and gaue ouer. Whereupon, by and by a recantation was put vnto him by the Bishops, which hee should declare before the people. The copy of which his recantation here followeth.

The forme and manner of the retractation of Reynold Pecocke.

The retractation of Bishop Pecocke.

IN the name of God, Amen. Before you the most reuerend Father in Christ and Lord, the Lord Thomas, by the grace of God, archbishop of Canturbury, primate of England and Legate of the Apostolicke see, I Reynold Pecocke, vnworthy Bishop of Chichester, doe purely, willingly, simply, and absolutely confesse and acknowledge, that I in times past, that is to say, by the space of these twentie yeares last past and more, haue otherwise conceiued, holden, taught and written, as touching the sacraments and the articles of the faith, then the holy church of Rome and vniuersall Church: & also that I haue made, written, published and set forth many and diuers pernitious doctrines, books, workes, writings, heresies, contrary and against the true catholicke and apostolicke faith, containing in them errours contrary to the Catholicke faith, and especially these errours and heresies here vnder written.

His articles.

1 First of all, that we are not bound by the necessitie of faith, to beleeue that our Lord Jesus Christ after his death descended into hell.

2 Item, that it is not necessarie to saluation to beleeue in the holy catholicke church.

3 Item, that it is not necessarie to saluation, to beleeue the communion of saints.

4 Item, that it is not necessary to saluation, to affirme the body materially in the sacrament.

5 Item, that the vniuersall church may erre in matters which pertcine vnto faith.

6 Item, that it is not necessarie vnto saluation, to beleeue, that which euery generall councell doth vniuersallie ordeine, approue, or determine, should necessarilie, for the helpe of our faith, and the saluation of soules, be approoued and holden of all faithfull Christians.

Wherefore I Reynold Pecocke wretched sinner which haue long walked in darknesse, and now by the mercifull dispositi-on and ordinance of God, am reduced and brought againe into the light and way of truth, and restored vnto the vnity of our holy mother the church, renounce and forsake all errours and heresies aforesaid.

Notwithstanding (godly reader) it is not to be beleeued that Pecocke did so giue ouer these opinions, howsoeuer the words of the recantation pretend. For it is a policie and play of the bishops, that when they doe subdue or ouercome any man, they carrie him whither they list, as it were a yong steere by the nose, and frame out his words for him before hand, as it were for a Parat, that he should speake vnto the people not according to his owne will, but after their lust and fantasie. Neither is it to be doubted, but that this bishop repented him afterward of his recantation: which may easilie bee iudged hereby, because he was committed again to prison, and deteined captiue, whereas it is vncertaine, whether he was appressed with priuie and secret tyrannie, and there obtained the crowne of martyrdome, or no.

The Dictionarie of Thomas Gascoigne, I haue not in my hands presently. But if credit be to be giuen to such as haue to vs alledged the booke, this we may finde in the 8. Centurie of Iohn Bale, chapter 79. that the said Thomas Gascoigne in his third part of his said Dictionarie, inuiting of Reynold Pecocke, maketh declaration of his articles contending in them matter of soze herelie. First (saith he) Reynold Pecock at Pauls crosse preached openlie, that the office of a christian prelate, chiefly aboue all other things is, to preach the word of God. That mans reason is not to be preferred before the Scriptures of the old and new Testament. That the vse of Sacraments, as they be now handled, is woze then the vse of the law of nature. That bishops which buy their admissions of the bishop of Rome, do sinne. That no man is bound to beleeue and obey the determination of the church of Rome. Also that the riches of bishops, by inheritage, are the goods of the poze. Item, that the Apostles themselues personallie were not the makers of the Creed: and that in the same Creed, one was not the article he went downe to hell. Item, that of the foure senses of the Scripture, none is to be taken, but the verie first and proper sense. Also, that he gaue little estimation in some points, to the authozitie of the olde Doctors. Item, that hee condemned the wilfull begging of the Friers, as a thing idle and needlesse. This out of Thomas Gascoigne. Leland also adding this moreouer, saith: that he, not contented to follow the catholicke sentence of the church, in interpreting of the Scripture, did not thinke soundlie (as he iudged it) of the holy Eucharist.

The articles of Reynold Pecocke mentioned by Thomas Gascoigne. Ex Ioan. Gasneig. lib. de Dictionar. Theolog. cap. 3.

At length, for these and such other articles, the said Reynold Pecocke, was condemned for an heretike, by the archbishops and bishops of Yoke, Lincolne, and Winchester, with other Diuines moe. Whereupon he being driuen to his recantation, was notwithstanding deteined still in prison. Where some saie, that he was priuilie made away by death.

B. Pecocke deteined in prison.

Hall addeth, that some say, his opinions to be, that spirituall persons by Gods law, ought to haue no temporall possessions. Other write, that he said, that personall tithes were not due by Gods law. But whatsoeuer the cause was, he was caused at Pauls crosse to abiure, and all his bokes burnt, and hee himselfe kept in his owne house, during his naturall life. I marruell that Polydore, of his extremitie of the bishops handling, and of his articles in his historie, maketh no memzyall.

Polydor curteth.

Belike it made but little for the honestie of his great maister the Pope.

From persecution and burning in England, now out of the way, to digresse a little, to speake of soraine matters of the church of Rome: you remember before, in the latter ende of the councell of Basil, how Sagenius was deposed. Of whose conditions and martiall affaires, how he made warre against Sforzia a famous captaine of Italie, and what other warres he raised beside, not onelie in Italie, but also in Germanie, against the citie and councell of Basil, I shall not need to make any long rehearsall. After his deposition, ye heard also how Foelix duke of Sauoy was elected Pope. Whereupon another great schisme followed in the church, during all the life of Eugenius.

Sagenius warred against Sforzia and diuers others.

Pope Foelix.

After his death, his next successor was pope Nicolas the fift, who (as you before haue heard) brought to to passe with the Emperour Frederike the third, that Foelix was contented to renounce and resigne his papacie to Nicolas, and was therefore of him afterward receiued to the roome of a cardinall. For his submission: & Frederike for his working was confirmed at Rome to be the Emperor, & there crowned, an. 1451. For emperors before they be confirmed and crowned by the pope, are no Emperors, but only called kings of Romaines.

N. Nicolas 5.

Emperors are but kings of Romaine before they be crowned by the Pope.

This pope Nicolas here mentioned, for to get and gather great summs of money, appointed a Jubile in the yeare of our Lord 1450. at which time there resorted a greater number of people vnto Rome, then hath at any time before been seene. At which time, we reade in the storie of Platina to haue happened, that I thought here not vnworthie to be noted for the example of the thing. As there was a great concourse of people repairing vp to the mount Auentine to behold the image of our Sauior, which there they had to shew to pilgrimes, the people being thick going to and fro betweene the mount & the citie, by chance a certaine Pole of the Cardinals of Saint Sparke, came by the way, by reason whereof the people not being able to auoide the way, one or two falling vpon the mule, there was such a preasse and throng vpon that occasion on the bridge, that to the number of two hundred bodies of men, and thus horses, were there strangled, and on each side of the bridge many besides fell ouer into the water and were drowned.

The fruit of Idolatrie.

By meanes of which occasion, the pope afterward caused the small houses to be plucked downe, to make the way broder. And this is the fruit that commeth by idolatrie. Ex Platin.

In the time of this pope, one Mat. Palmerius wrote a boke De Angelis, in defending whereof, he was condemned by the pope, and burned at Coana, An. 1448. Ex Tritemio.

Mat. Palmerius, a Florentine martyr.

After him succeded Calixtus the third, who amongst diuers other things ordained, both at noone and at euening, the bell to tole the Aues, as it was vsed in the popish time, to helpe the soulders that fought against the Turkes: for the which cause also he ordained the feast of the transfiguration of the Lord, solemnising it with like pardons and indulgences, as was Corpus Christi day.

Tolling of Aues.

S. Edmund of Canturbury canonised.

Also this pope proceeding contrary to the councels of Constance and Basill, decreed that no man should appeale from the pope to any councell. By whom also saint Edmund of Canturbury with diuers other, were made saints.

Pope Pius 2.

Next after this Calixtus, succeeded Pius secundus, otherwise called Æneas Syluius, who wrote the two bokes of Commentaries vpon the councell of Basill before mentioned. His Æneas, at the time of the writing of those his bokes, seemed to be a man of an indifferent and tollerable iugement and doctrine, from the which hee afterward being pope, seemed to decline and swarue, seeking by all meanes possible, how to deface and abolish the bookes which heretofore he had written.

Sentences attributed vnto this Pius.

The diuersity of Pius.

THe diuine nature of God may rather be comprehended by faith, then by disputation.

Christian faith is to bee considered, not by what reason it is proued, but from whom it proceedeth.

Neither can a couetous man be satisfied with money, nor a learned man with knowledge.

Learning ought to be in poore men, in stead of siluer, to noble men in stead of gold, and to princes in stead of precious stones.

An artificiall oration moueth soules, but not wise men.

Suters in the law, be as birds, the court is the baite, the iudges be the nets, and the lawyers be the fowlers.

Men are to be giuen to dignities, and not dignities to men.

The office of a bishop is heauie, but it is blessed to him that doth well beare it.

A bishop without learning may be likened to an Asse.

An euill physition destroyeth bodies, but an vnlearned priest destroyeth soules.

Marriage of priests allowed by Æneas Siluius.

Marriage was taken from priests, not without great reason, but with much greater reason it ought to bee restored again.

Like sentence to this he vttereth in his second booke of the councell of Basil before specified, saying, Peraduenture it were not the worse, that the most part of priests had their wiues: for many should be saued in priestly marriage, which now in vnmaried priesthood are damned. The same Pius also, as Celius reporteth, dissolued certaine orders of nunnes, of the order of saint Bridget and saint Clare, bidding them to depart out, that they should burne no more, nor couer a harlot vnder the vesture of religion.

This Pius, if he had brought so much piety and godlines, as he brought learning into his popedome, had excelled many popes that went before him.

It shall not be impertinent here to touch, what the said Æneas, called Pius, the pope, writeth touching the peace of the church, vnto Casper Schlick, the emperors Chancellor, in his 54. Epistle.

Ex epist. 54. Æneæ Syluii ad Gaspar. Schlick.

All men do abhor and detest schisme. The way to remedy this euill Charles the French king hath shewed vs both safe and briefe, which is, that Princes or their Orators should conuent and assemble together in some common place, where they may conclude vpon matters amongst themselues. To bring this to passe, it were needfull, writings to bee sent againe to all Kings and Princes, to send their Oratours to Strawesborow, or to Constance, with their full authoritie, there to entreate of matters appertaining to the peace of the church. Neither would it require so great expenses: For as much as wee see the yeere before 1400. gildens to be sufficient. Constance the emperour bestowed not much more in the congregation of the councell of Nice. And this way could not be stopped: neither could the pope or the councell withstand it, or make excuse: as though this might not easily bee done without them. For why? the secular princes may conuent and assemble together, will they, nill they: and yet notwithstanding, vnity may there bee concluded: For hee shall bee an vndoubted pope, whom all princes would obey. Neither doe I see any of the clergie so constant to death, which will suffer marrydome either for the one part or the other. All we lightly hold that faith which our princes hold; which if they would woorship Idols, we would also do the same, and not only denie the pope, but God also, if the secular power straine vs thereunto, for charity is waxed cold, and all faith is gone. How soeuer it be, let vs all desire and seeke for peace; the which peace, whether it come by a councell, or by assemblie of princes, call it what you will, I care not, for we stand not vpon the terme, but vpon the matter. Call bread, if you will, a stone, so you giue it me to asswage my hunger. Whether you call it a councell or a conuenticle, or an assemblie, or a congregation, or a synagogue, that is no matter, so that schisme may be excluded & peace established. Thus much out of the Epistle of Pius.

The way to resolue schisme, is conceiued of princes.

The popes clergy but not able for the flesh, either for princes or pope.

By this it may appeare, of what sentence and mind this Pius was in the time of the councell of Basill, before he was made pope. But as our common prouerbe saith, Honors change maners; so it happened with this Pius, who after he came once to be pope, was much altered from that he was before. For when as before hee preferred generall councels before the pope, now being pope, hee did decree that no man should appeale from the high bishop of Rome, to any generall councell.

The death of this pestilent Arte corrupted at that time, whatsoeuer they were before.

And likewise for priests marriage, whereas before he thought it best to haue their wiues refused, yet afterward hee altered his mind otherwise: Insomuch that in his booke intreating of Germany, and there speaking of the noble city of August, by occasion he inueyed against a certaine epistle of Huldericke once bishop of the said city, written against the constitution of the single life of priests. Whereby it appeareth, how the mind of this Pius was altered from that it was before. This epistle of Huldericke, is before expressed at large in the pag. 124.

Æneas Syluius now puft vp with worldly pompe and glorie, impugneth the same which he did before both know and professe.

Here also might I touch something concerning the discord betwixt this Æneas Sylvius and Diotherus, archbishop of Mentz, and what discord was stirred vp in Germany vpon the same betweene Frederike the Palatine, and the duke of Wittenberge, with others, by the occasion whereof, besides the slaughter of many, the city of Mentz, which was free before, lost their freedome and became seruile.

Discord betweene pope Pius and the archbishop of Mentz.

The causes of the discord betwixt pope Pius and Diotherus were these:

First, because that Diotherus would not consent vnto him in the imposition of certaine tallages and taxes, within his countrey.

Secondly, for that Diotherus would not bee bound vnto him, requiring that the said Diotherus being prince Elector, should not call the other electors together, without his licence, that is, without the licence of the bishop of Rome.

And thirdly, because Diotherus would not permit to the popes Legats, to connocate his clergie together after their owne list. This pope Pius began his see, about the yeere of our Lord 1458.

§ Anno § 1458 § Pauli 2. Ex Stanislao Ruthen. vide Cent. 8. Bal.

After this Pius secundus, succeded Paulus secundus, a pope wholly set vpon his belly and ambition, and not so much void of all learning, as the hater of all learned men. This Paulus had a daughter begotten in fornication, which because he saw her to be had in reproch, for that she was gotten in fornication, began (as the stories report) to repent him of the law of the single life of priests, and went about to reforme the same, had not death preuented him. Ex Stanislao Rutheno.

After this Paulus, came Sixtus the fourth, which builded vp in Rome a stewes of both kindes, getting thereby no small reuenewes and rents vnto the church of Rome. This pope amongst his other acts, reduced the yeere of Iubily from the fiftie vnto the twentie fiue. Hee also instituted the feast of the conception, and of the presentation of Mary and of Anna her mother, and Ioseph. Also he canonised Bonauenture and saint Francis for saints.

The feast of the conception and presentation of our Ladie.

Beades brought in.

By this Sixtus also, beads were brought in, and instituted to make our Ladies psalter, through the occasion of one Alanus and his order, whom Baptista maketh mention of in this verse: Hi filo insertis numerant sua murmura baccis: That is, These men putting their beades vpon a string number their praiers. This Sixtus the pope made two and thirtie cardinals in his time, of whom Petrus Ruerius was the first, who for that time that he was cardinall, which was but two yeeres, spent in luxurious riot, wasted and consumed two hundred thousand florences, and was left 60000. in debt. Wesellus Groningensis, in a certaine treatise of his de indulgentijs papalibus, writing of this pope Sixtus, reporteth this, that at the request of the foresaid Peter cardinall, and of Hieronie his brother, the said pope Sixtus permitted and granted vnto the whole familie of the cardinall of saint Lucie, in the time of the solemnities of Summer, Iune, July, and August, (a horrible thing to be spoken) free leaue and libertie to vse Sodomitrie, with this clause, Fiat vt petitur: That is, Be it as it is asked.

Wesselus Groningensis.

The pope testifieth the whole family of a certaine cardinall, to play the Sodomites there amongst the priests.

Next after this Sixtus, came Innocentius the eight, as rude and as farre from all learning, as his predecessour was before him. Amongst the noble facts of this pope, this was one, that in the towne of Polus apud AEquicolos, he caused 8. men and five women, with the lord of the place to bee appended prebended and taken, and iudged for heretickes, because they said that none of them was the vicar of Christ which came after Peter, but they which followed onely the pouerty of Christ. Also he condemned of hereste, George the king of Boheme, and deprined him of his dignity, and also of his kingdome, and procured his whole flocke to be vtterly reiected and put downe, giuing his kingdome to Matthias king of Pannnia.

Now from the popes to defend to other estates, it remaineth likewise somewhat to write of the emperours incident to this time, with matters and grieuances of the Germaines, as also of other princes, first beginning with our troubles and mutations here at home, pertaining to the ouerthrow of this king Henry and his seate, now following to bee shewed. And briefly to contract long processe of much tumult and businesse, into a short narration, here is to bee remembred, which partly before was signified, how after the death of the duke of Glocester, mischiefes came in by heapes vpon the king and his realme. For after the giuing away of Angeow and Maine, to the Frenchmen, by the vnfortunate marriage of queene Margaret about mentioned, the said Frenchmen, perceiuing now by the death of the duke of Glocester, the stay and pillar of this common-wealth to be decayed, and seeing moreouer the hearts of the nobility, among themselues to bee diuided, forslacked no time, hauing such an open way into Normandie, that in short time they recouered the same, and also gat Gascoine, so that no more now remained to England, of all the parts beyond the sea but only Calis. Neither yet did all the calamity of the realme onely rest in this: For the king now hauing lost his friendly vncle, as the stay and staffe of his age, which had brought him vp so faithfully from his youth, was now thereby the more open to his enemies, and they more emboldened, to set vpon him: As appeared first by Iacke Cade the Kentish captaine, who encamping first at Blackheath, afterward afsayed to London, and had the spoile thereof, the king being driuen into Warwickshire. After the suppressing of Cade, ensued not long after the duke of Yorke, who being accompanied with these earles, set vpon the king here to saint Albones, where the king was taken in the field captiue, and the duke of Yorke was by parliament declared protector, which was in the yere of our Lord, 1453. After this followed long diuision and mortall warre betweene the two houses of Lancaster and Yorke, continuing many yeres. At length about the yer of our Lord, 1459. the duke of Yorke was slaine in battell by the queene neare to the towne of Wakefield, and with him also his sonne earle of Rutland. 159 the which queene also shortly after, in the same yere, were discomfited the earle of Warwicke, and duke of Northfolke, to whom the keeping of the king was committed by the duke of Yorke, and so the queene againe deliuered her husband.

The D. of Yorke against king Henry.

Anno 1459

After this victorie obtained, the northren men aduanced not a little in pride and courage, began to take vpon them great attempts, not onely to spoile and robbe churches, and religious houses, and villages, but also were fully intended partly by themselues, partly by the inducement of their lords and captaines, to sacke, waste, and vtterly to subuert the citie of London, and to take the spoile thereof: and no doubt (saith my historie) would haue proceded in their conceiued greedie intent, had not the opportune fauour of God prouided a speedy remedie. For as these mischiefes were in hatching, suddenly commeth the noble prince Edward into London, with a mightie army, the 27. day of February, who was the same and heire to the duke of Yorke aboue mentioned, accompanied with the earle of Warwicke, and diuers mo. King Henry in the meane time, with his victorie, went vp to Yorke: vpon as Edward being at London, caused there to be proclaimed certaine articles concerning his title to the crowne of England, which was the second day of March.

The Northren men aduanced the subuersion of London. Ex Hist. cuiusdam Monachi Ebor. de rebus suis temporibus, Scala mundi.

London refuse to the prince Edward.

Anno 1461

Wherevpon the next day following, the lords both temporall and spirituall being assembled together, the said articles were propounded, and also well approued. The fourth day of the said month of March, after a solemne generall procession (according to the blind superstition of those dares the bishop of Exeter made a sermon at Pauls crosse, wherein he commended and proued by manifold euidences, the title of prince Edward to be iust and lawfull, answering in the same, to all obiections which might be made to the contrarie.

The title of Edward to the crowne proued at Paules crosse.

This matter being thus discussed, prince Edward accompanied with the lords spirituall and temporall, and with much concourse of people, rode the same day to Westminster hall, and there by the full consent, as well of the lords, as also by the voice of all the commons, tooke his possession of the crowne, and was called king Edward the fourth.

King Edward elected by the full consent of the estates.

These things thus accomplished at London, as to such a matter appertained, and preparation of money sufficiently being minister of the people and commons, with most readie and willing minds, for the necessarie furniture of his warres: he with the duke of Northfolke, and earle of Warwicke, and lord Fauconbridge, in all speede wise, take his iourney toward king Henry: who being now at Yorke, and forsaken of the Lanceners, had all his refuge onely reposed in the Northern men.

When king Edward with his army had passed ouer the riuer of Trent and was come nere to Ferebridge, where also the host of king Henry was not far off, vpon palme sunday betweene Ferebridge and Tadcaster, both the armies of the Southern and Northern men ioyned together in battell. And although at the first beginning, diuers footemen of king Edwards side, turned their backes, and holded the king of carriage and victuals: yet the contagious paine, with his captaines little discouraged therewith, fiercely and manfully set on their aduersaries. The which battell on both sides was so cruelly fought, that in the same conflict were slaine to the number, as is reported, beside men of name, of 20000. of the poore commons. Notwithstanding, the conquest fell on king Edwards part, so that king Henry hauing lost all, was forced to flie into Scotland, where also he gaue vp to the Scots the town of Warwicke, after he had reigned 38. yeres and a halfe.

The claime and title of the duke of Yorke, and after him of Edward his son, put vp to the lords and commons, wherevp they challenged the crowne to the house of Yorke, is thus in the story of Scala mundi, word for word, as hereunder is conteined.

The title of the house of Yorke to the crowne of England.

The title of the house of Yorke.

EDward the third right K. of England, had issue first prince Edward the 2. W. Hatfield. 3. Lionell, 4. John of Gaunt, &c. Prince Edward had Richard the second, which died without issue, W. Hatfield died without issue. Lionel duke of Clarence, had issue lawfully begot, Philip his only daughter and heire: the which was lawfully coupled to Edmund Mortimer, earle of March, and had issue lawfully begot, Roger Mortimer earle of March and heire: Which Roger had issue Edmund earle of March, Roger, Anne, and Alienor; Edmund and Alienor died without issue, and the said Anne by lawfull matrimony was coupled vnto Richard earle of Cambridge, the son of Edmund of Langley, who had issue and law fully bare Richard Plantagenet now duke of Yorke; John of Gaunt gate Henry, which vnrightfully entreated king Richard: then being alsse Edmund Mortimer earle of March, son of the said Philip, daughter to Lionell. To the which Richard duke of Yorke and son to Anne, daughter to Roger Mortimer earle of March, son and heire to the said Philip, daughter and heire to the said Lionell, the third son of king Edward the third, the right & dignity of the crown appertaining and belonged, after any iffe of the said Iohn of Gaunt. Notwithstanding the said title of dignity of the said Richard of Yorke, the said Richard defiring the wealth, rest, and prosperity of England, agreeth and consenteth that king Henry the sixth, should be had and taken for king of England during his naturall life, from this time without hurt of his title.

Richard Plantagenet.

Wherefore the king vnderstanding the said title of the said duke to be iust, lawfull, true and sufficient, by the aduice and assent of the lords spirituall and temporall, and the commons in the parliament, and by the authority of the same parliament declareth, approueth, ratifieth, confirmeth, accepteth the said title for iust, good, lawfull and true, and thereto giueth his assent and agreement of his free will and liberte. And ouer that, by the said aduice and authority, declareth, calleth, stablisheth affirmeth, and repeteth the said Richard of Yorke very true and rightfull heire to the crowne of England and France: and that all other statutes & acts made by any of the Henries late, contrarie to this aduice, bee annulled, repelled, damned, cancelled, voide, and of no force or effect. The king agreed and consented, that the said duke and his heires shall after his naturall life enioy the crowne, &c. Also, that all sayings and doings against the duke of Yorke shall be high treason, and all acts of parliaments contrary to this principall act be voide and of none effect, &c. Ex Scala mundi.

And thus much for the reigne of king Henry the sixth. Who now lacked his vncle and protector, duke of Glocester, about him. But commonly the lacke of such friends, is neuer felt before they be missed.

In the reigne of this Henry the 6. it is not to be passed ouer in silence which we find noted in the parliament rolles, how that Lewis archbishop of Rhoen, after the death of the late bishop of Sis, had granted vnto him by the popes bulls, during his life, all the profits of the said bishoprike, by the name of the administration of the said bishoprike. Lewis the aforesaid archb. therwith his bulls to the king, who vtterly refused his bulls. Notwithstanding for his seruice done in France, the K. granted to him the administration aforesaid the which to all intents at the petition of the said Lewis should be affirmed to be of as great force as though he were bishop, touching profits, liberties and habilitie. The K. refuseth the popes bulles.

And as he went his way, it happened him to come by the same place where he had done that cursed deed; and women of the same parish came out with stones and cancll dung, and there made an end of him in the high street, so that he went no further: notwithstanding the Constables and other men also which had him vnder gouernance to conduct him forward: for there was a great company of them, so that they were not able to withstand them.

KIng Edward, after his conquest and victory atchieued against king Henry, returned againe to London, where, vpon the Vigil of S. Anno 1463 King Henry the sixth againe repulsed in the battell of Exham.

The yere following, king Henry issuing out of Scotland with a sufficient power of Scots and Frenchmen, came into the North country to recouer the crowne, vnto whom the lord Radulph Percie, 3 lord Radulph Gray hping from king Edward, did adioyne themselues: but the Lord so disposing, king Henry with his power was repulsed in the battell of Exham by the lord Mountacute, hauing then the rule of the North: where the duke of Somerset, lord Hungerford, lord Rose, with certaine other were taken. The lord Radulph Percie was slaine, the residue fled. Albeit the history of Scal. mundi, referreth this battell to the yere 1464. the fifteenth day of May. In the which month of May, were beheaded the duke of Somerset, lord Hungerford, lord Rose, lord Philip Wentworth, lord Thomas Hully, lord Thomas Fiudern, beside twenty one other belonging to the retinue and houshold of king Henry the sixth. And not long after, the next yere, an. 1465. on the day of Saint Peter and Paul, king Henry being found and knowne in a wood by one Cantlow (as they say) was arrested by the earle of Warwicke, and at last, of a king made prisoner in the tower of London.

King Henry 6. taken, arrested, and committed to the tower.

Anno 1465

In this meane time, king Edward (after the motion of marriage for him being made; and first the lady Margaret sister to Iames the 4. king of Scots thought vpon, but that motion taking no effect, afterward a lady Elizabeth sister to Henry king of Castile, being intended; but the being vnder age, the earle of Warwicke turning then his legation and voyage to the French king Lewes the eleuenth, to obtaine lady Bona, daughter of the duke of Sauoy, and sister to Carlot the French queene, and obtaining the same) had cast fauor vnto one Elizabeth Grey, widow of sir John Grey knight, slaine before in the battell of S. Albons, daughter to the duchesse of Bedford, and lord Riuers, and first went about to haue her to his concubine: But she, as being vnworthy (as she said) to be the wife of such an high personage, so thinking her selfe to be too good to be his concubine, in such sort won the kings heart, that incontinent before the returne of the earle of Warwicke, he married her: at the which marriage, were no mo then onely the duchesse of Bedford, two gentlewomen, the priest and clerke. Vpon this so hasty and vnlucky marriage, ensued no little trouble to the king, much bloudshed to the realme, vndoing almost to all her kindred, and finally confusion to king Edwards two sonnes, which both were declared afterward to be bastards, and also depriued of their liues. For the earle of Warwicke, who had been the faithfull friend and chiefe maintainer before of the king, at the hearing of this marriage, was therewith so greeuously moued and chafed in his mind, that he neuer after sought any thing more, then how to worke displeasure to the king, and to put him beside his cushion. And although for a time he dissembled his wrathfull mode, till he might spie a time conuenient, and a wealth to set forward his purpose, at last finding occasion somewhat serning to his mind, he beareth his hart to his two brethren; to wit, the marquesse Mountacute, and the archbishop of Yorke, conspiring with them how to bring his purpose about. Then thought he also to proue a farre off, the mind of the duke of Clarence, king Edwards brother, and likewise obtained him, giuing also to him his daughter in marriage.

This matter being thus prepared against the king, the first flame of this conspiracy began to appeare in the North country. Where the Northerne men in their place gathering themselues in an open rebellion, and finding captaines of their wicked purpose, came downe from Yorke toward London. Against whom was appointed by the king, Wi. lord Herbert earle of Penbroke, with the lord Stafford, and certaine other captaines to encounter. The Welshmen giuing the ouerthrow first to the lord Stafford, then to the earle of Penbroke and his company of Welchmen at Banbery field, at last ioyning together with the army of the earle of Warwicke, and duke of Clarence, in the dead of the night, secretly stealing on the kings field at Wolney by Warwick, killed the watch, and take the king prisoner, who first being in the castell of Warwicke, then was conueied by night to Middleham castell in Yorkshire, vnder the custody of the archbishop of Yorke, where he hauing lesse keeping, and liberty to goe on hunting, meeting with sir William Standley, sir Thomas of Borough, and other his friends, was to good for his keepers, and escaped the hands of his enemies, and so came to Yorke, where he was well receiued: from thence to Lancaster, where he met with the lord Hastings his chamberlaine, well accompanied, by whose helpe he came safe to London.

The inconstant lustes of the people of England.

After this tumult, when reconciliation could not come to a perfit peace and vnity, although much labor was made by the nobility, the earle of Warwicke raiseth vp a new war in Lincolnshire, the captaine therof was sir Robert Welis knight, who shortly after being taken in battell with his father, and sir Thomas Dimocke, were beheaded; the residue calling away their coates, ran away and fled, giuing the name of the field, called Losecoat field. The earle of Warwicke after this put out of countenance and hope to preuaile at home, fled out of England, an. 1470. first to Calice, then to Lewes the French king, accompanied with the duke of Clarence. The fame of the earle of Warwicke and of his famous acts, was at that time in great admiration about measure, and so highly fauored, that both in England and France, all men were glad to behold his personage. Wherefore the comming of this earle and of the duke of Clarence, was not a little gratefull to the French king, and no lesse opportune to queene Margaret, king Henries wife, and prince Edward her sonne, who also came to the French court to mete and conferre together touching their affaires: where a league betweene them was concluded, and moreouer a marriage betweene Edward prince of Wales, and Anne the second daughter of the earle of Warwicke was wrought. Thus all things falling luckily vpon the earles part, beside the large offers and great promises made by the French king, on the best manner to set forward their purpose, the earle hauing also intelligence by letters, that the hearts almost of all men went with him, and longed sore for his presence, so that before he lacked now but onely haste with all speed possible to returne; hee with the duke of Clarence well fortified with the French nauy, set forward toward England: so as was it betweene them before decreed, that they two should proue the first venture, and then queene Margaret with prince Edward her sonne, should follow after. The arriuall of the earle was not so soone heard of at Dartmouth in Deuonshire, but great concourse of people by thousands went to him from all quarters to receiue and woe come him: who immediately made proclamation in the name of king Henry the sixth, charging all men able to beare armor, to prepare themselues to fight against Edward duke of Yorke, vsurper of the crowne. Here lacked no friends, strength of men, furniture, nor politic conuenient for such a matter.

The earle of Warwicke and the duke of Clarence returne into England.

The receiuing of the earle of Warwicke into England.

King Henry againe proclaimed king.

When king Edward (who before not passing for the matter, nor seeking how either to haue stopped his landing, or else straightwaies to haue encountred with him, before the gathering of his friends, but passing forth the time in hunting, in hawking, in all pleasure and dalliance) had knowledge what great resort of multitudes incessantly repaired more and more daily about the earle and the duke, began now to prouide for remedy, when it was too late. Who trusting too much to his friends and fortune before, did now right well perceiue that a variable and inconstant thing the people is, and especially here of England, whose nature is neuer to be content long with the present state, but alwaies delighting in newes, seeketh new variety of changes, either enuying that which standeth, or else pitying that which is fallen. Which inconstant mutability of the light people, changing with the wind, waauering with the reed, did well appeare in the course of this kings story. For hee, through the fauor of the people when he was borne, was crabbed: now being exalted of all princes, that as there is nothing in this mutable world firme and stable: so there is no trust nor assurance to be made, but only in the fauor of God, and in the promises of his word, only in Christ his sonne, whose only only king dome shall neuer haue end, nor is subiect to any mutation.

The constant loue and truth of the Lord Hastings.

These things thus passing on in England on the earles side against king Edward, he accompanied with the duke of Glocester his brother, and the lord Hastings, who had married the earle of Warwicks sister, and yet was neuer untrue to the king his master: and the lord Scales, brother to the queene, went abroad to all his true truthy friends for furniture of able souldiers for defence of his person to withstand his enemies. Then little resteue and sew in effect would come, the king himselfe so destitute, departed to Lincolnshire, where he perceiuing his enemies daily to increase vpon him, and all the countries about to be in a roare, making fires and singing songs, crying, King Henry, king Henry, a Warwicke, a Warwicke, and hearing moreouer his enemies the Lancastrians to be within halfe a daies iourny of him, was aduised by his friends to flie ouer the sea to the duke of Burgoyne, which not long before had married king Edwards sister.

King Edward forsaken of his people in his need.

The vnrake of Queene king Edward.

¶ Here might be thought, by the common iudgement and policie of man, peraduenture that king Edward, as he had in his hands the life of king Henry, of his Queene and Prince: so if he had dispatched them out of the way, when as he might, hee had not fallen into this misery: but because he tooke not the vantage, which time rather then godly reason gaue him, therefore that sparing pity of his turned now to his confusion and ruine. And certes, I suppose no lesse, but if the same case had fallen in these our pitifelle daies, in which charity now waxeth bitterly cold, and humanity is almost forgotten, the occasion of such a time should not be so neglected. But let vs here note and learne, how godly simplicitie alwaies in the end of things gaineth more then mans policie, forsomuch as man worketh with the one, but God worketh with the other.

Whether godly simplicitie, or mans policy be the better.

And so farre is it off, that euent and successe of things be gouerned by mans aduised policie, or vnaduised affection in this world, that that is iudged to be weaker that flourisheth in men, then that which is cast downe in the Lord: as in the double case of both these kings may well appeare. And first let vs consider the case of king Edward, who being so beset and compassed with euils and distresses on euery side, first was compelled to take the Seas betweene Lincolneshire and Lynne (which was no lesse dangerous to his life, then it was vnseemly for his estate.) Being come to Lynne, in what perill was he there, through the doubtfull mutability of the townes men, if he had been knowne to his enemies? And how could hee be but knowne, if he had tarried any space? But though men and friends forsake him, yet the mercy of God, not forsaking the life of him which shewed mercy vnto other, so prouided, that at the same present there was an English ship, and two hulks of Holland ready to their tourny. Thus king Edward without preuiall in, without bagge or baggage, without clothcloke or maile, without store of money, without raiment, saue only apparell for warre, also without all friends, except only his brother duke of Glocester, the lord Scales, and lord Hastings, with a few other trusty friends, to the number of seuen or eight hundred persons, take shipping toward Holland: at which time he was in no lesse ieopardy almost on the sea, then hee was on the land. For certaine Easterlings hauing many ships of warre, which lay rouing the same time on the sea, and had done much damage the yere before, as well to the English merchants, as to the French nation, spying the kings ship, with seuen or eight gallant ships, made saile after the king and his company. The kings ship was good of saile, and gat some ground, albeit not much, of the Easterlings, that they came to the coast of Holland before Aquemare, and there cast anker: for otherwise, being an ebbing water, they could not enter the hauen. The Easterlings with their great ships approched as neere as they could possibly come for the low water, purposing at the flood to obtaine their pray, and so were like to doe, if the Lord had not there a prouided Mounsieur de Groonsure, gouernor for duke Charles in Holland, at that season to be personally present in the towne of Aquemare, who hearing of the ieopardy of the king, being there at anker, prohibited the Easterlings on paine of death, not to meddle with any Englishmen which were the dukes friends and allies.

The gentle and faire words of king Edward.

Now thus king Edward well chastised of God for his wantonnesse both by sea and land, but not vtterly giuen ouer from his protection, escaping so many hard chances, was set on land with his company, who there well refreshed, and newly apparelled, were conducted to Hage.

Duke Charles at the hearing of the vnprosperous case and condition of king Edward his brother in law, was greatly amazed and ouerpressed in himselfe, much casting and doubting what hee should doe. For being then in warre with the French king, he could not well prouoke the English nation against him, without his manifest greuance and reap: neither yet could he in that great shame and obloquie, leaue the king his brother in that necessitie. Notwithstanding, so he demeaned himselfe in rough farre speech, pretending to the English men to ioyne part with the house of Lancaster, being himselfe partly defended of the same saintly by his grandmothers side: that he both was his owne friend openly, and the kings friend couertly, pretending that he did not, and doing that he pretended not.

When tidings was spread in England of king Edwards flying, innumerable people of all bands resorted to the earle of Warwicke, to take his part against king Edward, a few onely except of his constant friends which take sanctuarie. Among whom was also Elizabeth his wife, who deliuered a maine of all comfort, tooke also sanctuary at Westminster, where she in great penury forsaken, was deliuered of a faire sonne called Edward, which without all pompe was baptised like another poore womans child, the godfathers being the abbat and prior of Westminster, the godmother was lady Scrope.

Queene Elizabeth taketh sanctuary. Prince Edward borne in sanctuary.

To make the story short, the earle of Warwicke hauing now brought all things to his appetite, vpon the twelfth day of October rode to the Tower, which was then deliuered to him, and there take king Henry out of the ward, and placed him in the kings lodging. The 25. day of the same month, the duke of Clarence accompanied with the earls of Warwicke, Shrewsburp, and the lord Standley, with a great company, brought him in a long gowne of blew velues through the high streets of London, first to Pauls church to offer, then to the bishops palace of London, and there he resumed against the crowne royall, an. 1471. which he did not long inioy.

After this followed a parliament, in the which king Edward with all his partakers were iudged traitors. Queene Margaret with her sonne prince Edward, all this while was tarrying for a faire wind, thinking long belike till she came to an euill bargaine, as it proued after. For king Edward within six months after his departure out of England vnto the duke of Burgoyne, whether by letters from his friends sollicitate, or whether by his aduenturous courage incited, made instant sute to duke Charles his brother, for reliefe him with such power as he would bestow vpon him, for he was fully resolued to deffer the matter and to protract the time no longer.

The duke damped in double feare, in such a dangerous case, notwithstanding ouercome by nature and affinity, secretly caused to be deliuered to him 50000. Florence, and further caused foure great ships to be appointed for him in a hauen in Zeland, where it was free for all men to come. Also the same duke had for him hired fourteene ships of the Easterlings well appointed, taking band of them to serue him truly till hee were landed in England, and fifteene daies after.

Thus king Edward being furnished but onely with two thousand men of warre, with more lucke then hope to speed, sped his voyage into England, and landed at Rauenspur in the coast of Yorkshire. Although there was no way for the king with such a small company of souldiers to doe any good, yet to the policie, where strength did lacke, first he sent forth certaine light-horsemen to proue the country on euery side, with persuasions, to see whether the vplandish people would be stirred to take king Edwards part. Perceiuing that it would not be, king Edward sleeth to his thifts, dissembling his purpose to be, not to claime the crowne and king dome, but only to claime the duchy of Yorke, which was his owne title, and caused the same to be published. This being notified to the people, that he desired no more, but only his full patrimony and lineall inheritance, they began to be moued with mercy and compassion toward him, either to fauor him or not to resist him: and so iourneying toward Yorke, he came to Beuerly. The marquesse Montacute, brother to the earle of Warwicke, was then at Pomfret, to whom the earle had sent streit charge, with all expedition to set vpon him, or else to stop his passage: and likewise to the citizens of Yorke and all Yorkshire, to shut their gates and take armor against him. King Edward being in these straits, proceded notwithstanding here to Yorke without resistance, where he required of the citizens to be admitted into their city. But so stood the case then, that they durst not grant vnto him, but contrary sent him word to approch no nerer, as he loued his owne safegard. The desolate king was here driuen to a narrow strait, wherein neither could retire backe, for the opinion of the country and losse of his cause; neither could goe further, for the present danger of the city. Wherefore vsing the same policie as before, with lowly words and gentle speech he desired the messengers to declare vnto the citizens, that his comming was not to demand the realme of England, or the title of the same, but only the duchy of Yorke, his old inheritance, and therefore determined to set forward, neither with armie nor weapon. The messengers were not so soone within the gates, but he was at the gates in a manner as soone as they.

The citizens hearing his courteous answer, and that he intended nothing to the preiudice of the king, nor of the realme, were something mitigated toward him, and began to communne with him from the walles, willing him to withdraw his power to some other place, and they would be the more ready to aid him, at least he should haue no damage by them.

Now this hauing he againe vsed such louely language, and desired so faire speech with them, intreating them so courteously, and saluting the Aldermen by their names, requiring at at their hands no more, but onely his owne towne whereof hee had the name and title, that at length the citizens, after long talke, and debating vpon the matter, partly also incited with faire and large promises, fell to this conuention, that if hee would sweare to be true to king Henry, and gentle in entertaining his citizens, they would receiue him into the citie.

Two conditions put to king Edward.

This being concluded, the next morning, at the entring of the gate, a priest was readie to say masse, in the which after receiuing of the Sacrament, the king receiued a solemne oth, to obserue the two articles afore agreed. By reason of which oth so rashly made, and as shortly broken, and not long after punished (as it may well be thought) in his posteritie, hee obtained the citie of Yorke. Where hee, in short time forgetting his oth, to make all sure, set in garrisons of armed souldiers. Furthermore, perceiuing all things to bee quiet, and no feare to bee made against him, hee thought to foreslacke no opportunitie of time, and so made forward toward London, leauing by the way the Marques Montacute, which lay then with his armie at Pomfret, on the right hand, not fully foure miles distant from his campe: and so returning to the high way againe, went forward without any stirring to the towne of Notingham: where came to him, sir William Parre, sir Thomas of Borough, sir Thomas Sompgomerie, and diuers else of his assured friends, with their aides, which caused him by proclamation, to claim to his owne title of king Edward the fourth, saying that they would serue no man, but a king. At the same hereof being blowne abrode, as the citizens of Yorke were not a little offended (and that worthilie) so from other townes and cities, lords and noble men began to fall vnto him, thinking with themselues, that the Marquesse Mountacute either fauoured his cause, or was afraide to encounter with the man. Holdefaest it was, king Edward being now more fully furnished at all points, came to the towne of Leicester, and there hearing that the earle of Warwicke accompanied with the earle of Oxford, were together at Warwicke, with a great power, minding to set vpon the earle, he remoued from thence his armie, hoping to ioine him battell. The duke of Clarence in the meane time about London had leuied a great host comming toward the earle of Warwicke as he was by the earle appointed. But when the earle saw the duke to linger the time, hee began to suspect (as it fell out indeed) that hee was altered to his brethrens part. The king aduancing forward his host, came to Warwicke, where hee found all the people departed. From thence he moued toward Couentrie, where the earle was: vnto whom the next day after, he boldlie offered battell. But the earle expecting the duke of Clarence his comming, kept him within the walles. All this made for the king, for hee hearing that his brother, duke of Clarence, was not farre off, comming toward him with a great armie, raised his campe, and made toward him, either to intreate, or else to encounter with his brother. Whereby each host was in sight of the other, Richard duke of Glocester, brother to them both, as arbitrour betweene them, first rode to the one, then to the other. Whether all this was for a face of a matter made, it is vncertaine. But hereby both the brethren, laying all armie and weapon aside, first louingly and familiarly commoned: after that, brotherlie and naturallie ioyned together. And that fraternall amitie, by proclamation also was ratified, and put out of all suspition.

King Edward forsaketh his people.

King Edward commeth to London.

Londoners take part with king Edward.

Then was it agreed betweene the three brethren to attempt the earle of Warwicke, if he litlewise would be reconciled: but hee trying out shame vpon the duke of Clarence, fled at vtter defiance. From thence king Edward is to Yorke lie furnished, and daily increasing, taketh his way to London. Where, after it was knowne that the duke of Clarence was come to his brethren, much feare fell vpon the Londoners, casting with themselues what was best to doe. The suddennesse of time permitted no long consultation. There was at London the same time, the archbishop of Yorke, brother to the earle of Warwicke, and the duke of Somerset, with other of king Henries counsell, to whom the earle had sent in commandement a little before, knowing the weakenesse of the citie, that they should keep the citie from their enemies two or three daies, and he would follow with all possible speed, with a puissant armie. Who, according to their commandement, defended the citie with all their power, but yet to little purpose: For the citizens consulting with themselues for their owne best indemnitie, hauing no walles to defend them, thought best to take that way, which seemed to them most sure and safe, and therefore concluded to take part with king Edward. This was not so some knowne abroad, but the communaltie ranne out by heapes to meete king Edward, and to salute him as their king. Whereupon the duke of Somerset, with other of king Henries counsell, hearing thereof, and wondering at the sudden change of the world, to thift for themselues, fled away and left there king Henrie alone: Who the same day being caused by the archbishop of Yorke, to ride about London like a king, was before night made captiue, and reduced againe to the Tower.

It was not long after these things thus done at London, but the comming of the earle of Warwicke was heard of, who thinking to preuent mischiefes with making speed, came a little too late and missed of his purpose. In the earles armie were John duke of Exceter, Edmund earle of Somerset, John earle of Oxford, and Marques Mountacute the earles brother. The earle had now passed a great part of his iourny, when hee hearing newes of the world so changed, and of the captiuitie of king Henry, was not a little thereat appalled in his mind: wherefore he stated with his armie at S. Albons, to see what way further to take. And forsomuch as there was no other remedie, but either hee must yeeld, or one conflict must finish the matter; hee remoued to Barnet ten miles from S. Albons.

The earle of Warwicke commeth to Barnet.

Against him set forth king Edward, well appointed with a strong armie of picked and able persons, with artillerie, ingines and instruments meete for the purpose: bringing with him also king Henry. On Easter euen hee came to Barnet, and there he embattelled himself. In the morning vpon Easter day the battell began, and fiercely continued almost till none, with murder on eche side much doubtfull, till both parts were almost weary with fighting and murdering. King Edward then desirous to see an end, ofr or on, with a great crew of new fresh souldiers, set vpon his wearied enemies, whereby the earles men, although encouraged with words of their captain, stoutly fought, but they sore wounded and wearied, could not long hold out. The earle rushing into the middest of his enemies, ventured so farre, that hee could not be rescued: where he was stricken downe and slaine, and there lay he. Marques Montacute thinking to succour his brother, whom hee saw to be in great ieopardie, was likewise ouerthrowne and slaine.

The battell at Barnet.

After that Richard Neuill, earle of Warwicke, and his brother were gone, the rest fled, and many were taken. The number of them which were in this field slaine, are iudged about tenne thousand, as Polydore Virgil reciteth. Fabian numbreth of them that were slaine, but fiftene hundred. The duke of Somerset and earle of Oxford thinking to flie to Scotland, returned to Taiper earle of Pembroke in Wales. The duke of Exceter hardly escaped to Westminster, and there tooke sanctuarie. For the death of the earle of Warwick the king was not so glad, as hee was sorie for the Marques Mountacute, whom he tooke to be his friend. The corps of these two were brought to the Church of Pauls, where they lay open in two coffins two daies, and then were interred. Ex Polyd. & alijs.

The earle of Warwicke and his brother slaine.

¶ In the narration of this historie, Polydore Virgil, whom Hall followeth word for word, both some deale differ from Robert Fabian. Neither doe I doubt, but both they had their authors, by whom they were directed. Notwithstanding this I maruell, that Polydore hauing of so many things which he neuer saw, doth not vouchsafe to cite vnto us those writers of whom he borrowed. And more doe I maruell, or rather lament, if it be true that I haue heard, that he not only nameth no author vnto vs, but also burned and heape of our English stories vnknowne, after the finishing of his, in the dayes of king Henry the 8. But now to our text againe.

Difference betweene Polydore and Fabian.

Hall followeth Polydore.

Polydore is said to haue burned a number of our English writers.

All this while yet Queene Margaret with young Prince Edward her sonne, was scarce come ouer, being long let with contrary windes, who at length in the moneth of Aprill arriuing at Weimouth in Dorsetshire, and hearing the forerehill tidinges of these things lately happened to her husband, and to the earle of Warwicke and his brother, and of the prosperous successe of king Edward: was so dismayed, disquieted, and pierced with sorrow, seeing all things contrarie to her expectation, so to frame against her, that she feared and took on with her selfe, lamenting her husband, bewayling her sonne, curling her comming, and crying out of Fortune, as though blinde Fortune were the that gouerneth times and tides, rewarding iust punishments to vniust deseruings of men, and not the secret power and terrible iustice of almighty God. Such was then the impatience of that Queene, being not able to beare the vehemencie of her passion (who rather should haue sorowed the dolorous death of duke Humfrey, whom before she neglected, but now she lacked) that her senses failed her, her spirits were taken, her breath decaied, and life almost gone, she fell to the ground as one that would rather be then liue. In this desolate case, Queene Margaret leaning now to vnfold her friends from her foes, when it was too late, fraught full of beautifelle, without solace, or hope of remedie, she with her sonne and her companie departed for the next refuge, to a Monasterie of Monkes called Beaulie in Hamphire, there to take sanctuarie, and priuiledge of the house.

Queene Margaret taketh sanctuarie.

Ex Polyd. Lib. 24.

Queene Margaret moued by her friends to leme warres against king Edward.

Yet all hearts were not found nor subdued in England, especiallie Edmund duke of Somerset, with Lord John his brother, Thomas Courtney, earle of Deuonshire, Jasper earle of Pembroke, Lord Wenlocke, John Longbrother, being Prior of the knights of Rhodes in Saint Johns. These hearing of the queenes returne, with speede resorted to her; by whom the being somewhat quickned in her spirites, and animated to warre, began to take some heart, and to follow their counsell: which was, in all the hote haste, to renew warre against king Edward, being now vnpounded, by reason his armie was now dispersed, and chiefest of his leadours slaine.

here great hope of victorie was shewed, great promises made. Although the queens mind was, being more carefull for the yong prince, then for her selfe, to send him ouer into France, before some proofe or triall made: yet following the contrarie counsell of them, and partly cast off by the hastinesse of time, which required haste, she began with all expedition to gather power. Likewise Iasper earle of Pembroke, posted into Wales to do the same.

K. Edward hearing of their intent, commeth with speed to meet them.

King Edward hauing intelligence of all these doings, first suddenly our certaine light horsemen, to chase aboute through the West parts, what wanes his enemies do take. In the meane time, he bing all celeritie to meete them before they came to London, gathered a power, such as hee could make about London, and first commeth to Abingdon, from thence to Marlebridge, hearing that the queene was at Bathe, thinking to encounter with them, before they diuerted into Wales to the earle of Pembroke, whither he thought (as they indeed intended) that they would take. But the queene vnderstanding the king to be so nigh, remoueth from Bathe to Bristow, sending word in the meane while to the citizens of Glocester, that they would grant her leaue safely to passe by their citie. Which when it could not bee obtained, with her armie she departed from Bristow to Tewkesburie: where the duke of Somerset knowing king Edward to be at hand at his verie backe, willed the queene there to stay, and in no wise to fice backward for certaine doubts that might bee cast. Although this counsell was against the consent of many other captaines, who thought it best rather to draw aside, while the earle of Pembroke with his armie were with them associate: yet the mind of the duke preuailed. The place was prefired, the field pitched, the time of battell came, the king was looked for: who being within one mile of Tewkesburie, with like industrie and policie, as his enemies had done, disposed his armie likewise in their array. The celeritie of the king taking the time, was to him great aduantage: who otherwise if hee had deferred, till they had comyoyned with the earle of Pembroke, had put the matter in great hazard. Such a matter it is to take a thing in time.

The battell of Tewkesburie.

A great matter to take a thing in time.

Of the battell I will thus repeateth, adding more then Polydore, that the duke of Somerset, although hee was strongly incamped, yet thorough the occasion or policie of the duke of Glocester, which had the foreward, the kings part, a little recoiling backe, followed the chase, supposing that the Lord Wenlocke, who had the middle ward, would haue followed hard at his backe. The duke of Glocester, whether for shame rather then of policie, espying his aduantage, suddenly turned face to his enemies. Wherevpon the contrarie part was ekcloses of feare, and so much the more, because they were separated from their companie. The duke of Somerset not a little agreeued at the vnlookt for mate, returneth to the middle ward, where he seeing the lord Wenlocke abiding still, reuiled him, and called him traytor, and with his axe strikerh the braines out of his head.

Thus much addeth Hall besides Polydor; but the weth not his author where he had it. Polydor writing of this conflict, writeth no more but this, that the queenes armie being ouerset with the number and multitude of their enemies, and the hauing no freshe souldiers to furnish the field, was at last ouermatched, and for the most part slaine or taken. In which battell there named to bee slaine, the earle of Deuonshire, the lord Wenlocke, lord John duke of Somerset his brother, besides other. Among them that were taken, was queene Margaret found in her chariot almost dead for sorowe, prince Edward, Edmund duke of Somerset, John Prior of Saint Johns, with twentie other knights: all which were beheaded within two dates after, the queene onlie and the yong prince excepted. Which prince Edward being then brought to the kings presence, was demanded of him, how he durst be so bold to stand in battell against him. To this Edward Hall addeth more, and saith that after the field was finished, the king made proclamation, that whosoeuer would bring prince Edward to him, should haue annuitie of an hundred pound during his life, and the princes life to be saued. Wherevpon sir Richard Crofts not mistrusting the kings promise, brought forth his prisoner, &c. And so the king demanding of the prince (as is said) how he durst so presumptuouslie enter this realme with his banner displaied against him, he answered, saying: that hee came to recouer his fathers kingdome and inheritance, from his grandfather and father to him descending: whereat (the Lord Wolrdon) the king with his hand disdainfullie thrust him from him. Other say that the king stroke him on the face with his gauntlet.

Queene Margaret being brought as prisoner to London, was afterward ransomed of her father duke of Angeow, for a great summe of money which hee borrowed of the French king, and for the payment thereof, was faine to yeeld vnto him the title of the kingdome of Sicile, and Naples, &c. King Edward for these prosperous warres, yeelded to God his heartie thankes, and caused publikelie through his realme, solemne processions to be kept that dates together. And thus much, and too much, touching the warres of king Edward the fourth, which was done anno 1471. Ex Polyd. & alijs.

The death of king Henry 6.

The same yeere, and about the same time, vpon the ascension euen, king Henrie being prisoner in the tower, departed, after he had raigned in all xxxvii yeres, and vj. moneths. Polydor and Hall following him, affirme that he was slaine with a dagger by Richard duke of Glocester, the kings brother, for the more quiet and safegard of the king his brother. In the historie intituled Scala mundi, I finde these words: Quodin turri, in vigilia ascensionis Dominicæ ibidem feliciter moriens, per Thamesiam nauicula vectus ad Abbatiam de Chertesey deductus, ibi sepultus est: That is, that king Henrie being in the tower vpon the ascension euen, there happilie, or quietly departing, was brought by Thames in a boate, to the abbey of Chertesey, and there buried.

King Henry buried at Chertesey.

Polydore, after he hath described the vertues of this king, recordeth that king Henrie the seuenth did afterward translate the corps of him from Chertesey to Windsore; and addeth moreouer, that by him certaine miracles were wrought. For the which cause the said king Henry the seuenth (saith he) laboured with pope Julius, to haue him canonized for a Saint; but the death of the king was the let, why that matter proceeded not. Edward Hall writing of this matter, addeth more, declaring the cause, why king Henries fainting went not forward, to be this: for that the fees of canonizing of a king, wherof so great a quantitie at Rome (more then of another, bishop or prelate) that the said king thought it better to keepe the monie in his chests, then with the emporerthing of the realme to buy the same, and pay so much for a new bole day of S. John Goose sir English, so as much as John Hus in the Bohemian tongue.

Which if it be true, it might bee replied then to pope Julius, that if popes be higher then kings in the earth, and especiallie in heauen, why then is a pope Saint so cheape in the market place of Rome, and a king Saint so deare? Againe, if the dalnation of things in all markets and burses, bee according to the price and dignity of the thing that is bought, what reason is it, seeing the sainting of a king beareth a bigger sale then the sainting of any pope in heauen, but that kings should be aboue popes also vpon the earth? Sed extra locum, as I doe not doubt, but that king Henry was a good and a iust prince, if hee had not otherwise been abused by some: so touching the ruins of his house, I thinke not contrarie, but it came not without the iust appointment of the Lord, either for that the Henries of Lancasters house were such enemies to Gods people, and for the burning of the lord Cobham and many other: or else for the vniust displacing of king Richard 2. or else thirdly for the cruell slaughter of Humfrey the good duke of Glocester his vncle: wherof sufficiencie hath been said before.

The cause examined of the fall of Lancaster house.

Example of Gods iust iudgement of correction.

¶ During the time of these doings, being about the yeare of our Lord 1465. there was here in England a certaine frier Carmelite, who about the feeste of Michael the archangell preached at Pauls in London, that our Lord Iesus Christ, being here in this present world, was in pouertie, and did beg: To whose opinion and doctrine, the prouincial of that order seemed also to incline, defending the same both in his reading and preaching, with other Doctours mo. and brethren of the same order: vnto whom also adioyned certaine of the Iacobites, and diuerse did take their parts. On the contrary side, many doctors and also lawyers, both in their publike lectures and preaching, to the vttermost of their cunning, did withstand their assertion, as being a thing most pestiferous in the church to be heard. Such a bitter contention was among them, that the defendant part was driuen for a while to keepe silence. Such like to those times I might well resemble these our dayes now present, with our tumultuous contention of coymes and fashions of garments. But I put my selfe here in Pythagoras schole, and keepe silence with these Friers. In the route moreouer it followeth, that this beggerly question of the begging friers, whether Christ did begge, or no, went so farre, that at length it came to the popes eares Paulus 2. who was no begger ye may be sure. After that the fame of his doctrine, mounting ouer the Alpes, came flying to the court of Rome, which was about the assumption of the virgin Mary, the yeare next following, ann. 1465. it brought with it such an euill smell to the fine noses there, that it was no need to bid them to sticke: for begging to them was worse then hie heresie. Therefore the holy father pope Paulus the 2. to repeelle the sparkles of this doctrine, which otherwise perhaps might haue set his whole kitchin on fire, taketh the matter in hand, and eftsoones diretcth down his Bull into England, intituating to the prelates here, Hæresim illam pestiferè asserentem, quod Christus publicè mendicauit, esse antiquitus à Romanis Pontificibus, cum suis Concilijs damnatam, & eam pro damnata, vadique declarandam, & conculcandam, &c. That is, that this heresie, which pestiferously doth affirme that Christ did openly begge, was condemned of old time by the Bishops of Rome, and his Councels, and that the same ought to be declared in all places for a damned doctrine, and worthy to be troden downe vnder all mens feete, &c. This was in the same yeare when prince Edward, king Edwards sonne

The burning of Iohn Goose.

The vnworthy death of the duke of Clarence.

The second thing herein to be noted, is the death of George duke of Clarence, the kings second brother: of whom relation was made before, how he assisted king Edward his brother, against the earle of Warwicke at Barnet field, and helped him to the crowne, and now after all these benefits, was at length thus requited, that (for what cause it is vncertaine) he was apprehended and cast into the tower, where he being adiudged for a traitor, was priuilie drowned in a butte of Malmsey. What the true cause was of his death, it cannot certainly bee affirmed. Diuers coniectures and imaginations there be diuerslie put forth. Some partlie imputed to the Quenes displeasure. Other suppose it came for taking part in the cause of his seruant, which was accused and condemned for poisoning, sorcery, or inchantment. Another taine there is, which surmiseth the cause hereof to rise vpon the vaine feare of a foolish prophecie, comming no doubt (if it were true) by the crafty operation of Sathan, as it doth many times else happen among Infidels and Gentiles, where Christ is not knowne: where among high princes and in noble houses, much mischiefe groweth, first murther and parricide, and thereby ruine of ancient families, and alteration of kingdomes. The effect of this prophecie (as the fame goeth) was this, that after king Edward, should one raigne, whose name should begin with G. And because the name of the duke of Clarence, being George, began with a G. therefore he began to be feared, and afterward priuily (as is aforesaid) was made away.

The mischiefes that follow worke by false prophecies.

The prophecie of G.

¶ By these experiments and mischeuous ends of such prophecies, and also by the nature of them, it is easie to bee seene from what fountaine or author they proceed: that is, (no doubt) from Sathan, the ancient enemy of mankind, and prince of this world: against whose deceitfull delusions, christian men must be well instructed, neither to marueil greatly at them, though they seeme strange, nor yet to beleeue them, though they happen true. For Sathan being the prince of this world, in such worldly things can foresee what will follow, and can lay truth for a mischeuous end, and yet for all that is but a Sathan. So the dreame of Abygeles, seeing a time to grow out of his daughter, which should couer all Asia, and seeing thereby that by his nephew he should lose his kingdome, prooued true in the sequell thereof, and yet notwithstanding of Sathan it came, and caused cruell murther to follow, first of the shepheards childe, then of the same of Harpagus, whom he fet before his owne father to eate. Ex Iust. lib. 1. Like wise Cæsus was prophetically admonished by his dreame, to take him for his guide, whom he first met the next morrow. In that also his dreame fell true, and yet was not of God. In the same number are to be put all the blinde Oracles of the Idolatrous Gentiles, which although they proceed of a lying spirit, yet sometime they hit the truth to a mischeuous purpose. The like iudgement also is to be giuen of Merlines prophecies. The sorceresse mentioned 1. Reg. 28. raising by Samuel, told Saul the truth, yet was it not of God. In the fifteenth chapter of the Acts, there was a damsell hauing the spirit of Pythō, who also told truth of Paul and Silas, calling them the messengers of the high God, and yet it was a wrong spirit. The vncleane spirites in giuing testimony of Christ, said the truth, yet because their testimony came not of God, Christ did not allow it.

Ex Paulo Diac.

Paulus Diaconus recordeth of Valence the emperor: that he also had a blinde prophecie, not much vnlike to this of king Edward, which was, that one should succeed him in the empire whose name should begin with F. and S. Whereupon one Theodosius, trusting vpon the prophecie, began rebellioully to hope for the crowne, and for his labor felt the paines of a traitor. Notwithstanding, the effect of the prophecie followed: For after Valence, succeded Theodosius. Wherefore christian princes and noble men, and all Gods faithfull people must beware and learne.

1. First, that no man be inquisitiue or curious in searching to know what things be to come, or what shall happen, beside those things onely which are promised, and expressed in the word.

2. Secondly, to vnderstand what difference there is, and how to discerne the voice of God from the voice of father.

3. Thirdly, how to resist and auoid the danger of false and diuelish prophecies.

Three things to be noted concerning false prophecies.

Pompey there be, which being not contented with things present, curiously occupy their wits to search what is to come, and not giuing thanks to God for their life which they haue, will also know what shall bechance them, how and when their end shall come, how long princes shall raigne, and who after shall succeed them, and for the same, get vnto them soothsayers, astrologers, sorcerers, conuerers, or familiars. And these are not so much inquisitiue to search as apte, but the diuell is as ready to answer them, who either falsly doubleth with them to delude them, or else telleth them truth, to worke them perpetuall care and sorrow. Thus was pope Siluester the sorcerer circumuented by the diuell, who told him that he should be at Jerusalem before he died, and so it fell out. For as hee was saying his masse at a chapell in Rome, called Jerusalem, there he fell sicke, and within three daies after died: vide sup. pag. 151. Do king Henry the fourth also it seemeth it was prophecied, that he should not die before he went to Jerusalem, who being brought to the abbats chamber of Westminster, and hearing of the name of the chamber to be called Jerusalem, knew his time to be come, and died: pag. 513.

The ſecond thing to be conſidered in prophecies.

growth to the life of man, either ceaſing them falſly to truſt where they ſhould not, or elſe wickedly to perpetrate that they would not: as may appeare both by this king, and alſo diuers mo. So was Pompeius, Craſſus, and Ceſar, (as writeth Cicero) deceiued by the falſe Chaldeis, in declaring to them that they ſhould not die but in their beds, and with wealth, and in their old age. Of ſuch a falſe truſt, riſing vpon falſe prophecies, S. Ambroſe in his booke of Sameron writeth, ſpeaking of fame, which being in thoſe parts greatly deſired, was promiſed and prophecied of one certaine to fall vpon ſuch a boy, which was at the changing of the new moone: but ſaith S. Ambroſe) there fell no ſuch faine at all, till at the praiers of the church, the ſame was obtained: giuing vs to vnderſtand, that fame commeth not by the words of man, nor by the beginnings of the moone, but by the prouidence and mercy of our Creator. Ex Ambroſio in Examer.

Ioan. Picus earle of Mirandola, in his excellent bookes written againſt theſe vaine ſtar-tellers and Aſtrologers, lib. 2. writeth of one Ondeſaphus a prince, to whom it was prognoſticated by a famous cunning man in that ſcience, called Hieronymus Manfredus, that he ſhould inioy long continuance of health, and proſperous life; who notwithſtanding the ſelfeſame yeare, and in the firſt yeere of his marriage, deceaſed: and after diuers other examples added moreouer vpon the ſame, he inferreth alſo mention, and the name of a certaine rich matron in Rome, named Conſtantia, who in like maner departed the ſame yeere, in which ſhe received great promiſes by theſe Southſaiers and Aſtrologers, of a long and happy life, ſaying to her husband theſe words: Behold (ſaith ſhe) how true be the prognoſtications of theſe South-tellers: If it were not for noting of them which now are gone, and whole names I would in no caſe to be blemiſhed with any ſpot, otherwiſe I could recite the names of certaine, eſpecially one, which taking his iourney, in a certaine place, after diligent calculation and forecaſting of the ſucceſſe and good ſpeed of his iourney, was notwithſtanding in the ſame iourney, appoynted and brought where he would not, after that, neuer inioying good day, in ſhort time he departed. In Baſill this I my ſelfe heard of one which knew and was conuerſant with the parte, who hauing a curious delight in theſe ſpeculations of chances and euents to come, by his calculation noted a certaine day, which he miſtruſted ſhould be fatall vnto him, by ſomething which at that day ſhould befall vpon him. Whereupon he determined with himſelfe, all that day to keepe him ſure and ſafe within his chamber, where he reaching vp his hand to take downe a boke, the boke falling downe vpon his head, gaue him his deaths wound, and ſhortly after hee died vpon the ſame. Of theſe and ſuch like examples the world is full, and yet the curiouſneſſe of mans head will not refraine, ſtill to plucke the apple of this vnlucky and forbidden tree.

Beſide all this, what murther and parricide commeth by the feare of theſe prophecies, in great bloods and noble houſes, I referre it vnto them which reade and well aduiſe the ſtories, as well of our kings here in England, as in other kingdomes mo, both Chriſtened and Turkiſh, whereof another place ſhall ſerue as well (Chriſt willing) more largely to intreat, and particularly to diſcourſe. To this pertaineth alſo the great inconuenience and hinderance that groweth by the feare of ſuch prophecies in the vocation of men, ſo manuch as many there be, which fearing, ſome one danger, ſome another, leaue their vocations vndone, and follow vnordinate waies. As if one hauing a blind prophecy, that his deſtruction ſhould be on the day, would wake and doe all his buſineſſe by night and candle light: and ſo forth in other ſeuerall caſes of men and women, as euery one in his owne conſcience knoweth his owne caſe beſt.

The ſecond thing to bee conſidered in theſe prophecies, is rightly to diſcerne and vnderſtand, as neere as wee can, the difference betweene the prophecies proceeding from God, and the falſe prophecies counterfeited by Sathan. For Sathan ſometime plaieth Gods Ape, and tranſformeth himſelfe into an Angell of light; bearing ſuch a reſemblance and colour of truth and Religion, that vnleſſe a wiſe man is able to diſcerne the one from the other, and the moſt part is beguiled. Concerning prophecies therefore, to know which bee of God, which bee not, three things are to bee obſerued.

1. Firſt, whether they goe ſimply and plainly, or whether they be doubtfull and ambiguous: whereof the one ſeemeth to taſte of Gods ſpirit, ſuch as be the prophecies of the ſcripture: the other to come otherwiſe, hauing a double or doubtfull interpretation. Although the time of Gods prophecies, as alſo of miracles is commonly and ordinarily expired: yet if the Lord in theſe daies, notwithſtanding doe ſhew any prophecie, by the ſimpleneſſe and plainneſſe thereof, partly it may be diſcerned.

2. Secondly, this is to be expended, whether they be priuate, tending to his family or ſtate, or publike. For as the Scriptures, ſo commonly the prophecies of God haue no priuat interpretation, but generall: forſomuch as the care of Gods holy ſpirit is not reſtrained partially to one perſon more then to another, but generally and indifferently reſpecteth the whole church of his elect in Chriſt Jeſus his Sonne. Therefore ſuch prophecies as priuatly are touching the ſtates of houſes or names of men, riſing or falling of priuat and particular families, are worthily to be ſuſpected.

3. The third note and ſpeciall argument to deſcry the true prophecies of God, from the falſe prophecies of ſatan and his falſe prophets, is this, to conſider the matter and the end thereof, that is, whether they be worldly, or whether they be ſpirituall, or whether they tend to any glory or ſtate of this preſent world, or whether they tend to the ſpirituall inſtruction, admonition, or comfort of the publike church.

Now remaineth thirdly, after we know what prophecies be of God, and what not, that we be inſtructed next how to eſchewe the feare and perill of all diuelliſh prophecies which make againſt vs. Wherein two ſpeciall remedies are to be marked of euery chriſtian man, whereby he may be ſafe and ſure againſt all danger of the enemy. The firſt is, that we ſet the name of Chriſt Jeſus the Sonne of God againſt them, through a true faith in him: knowing this, that the Son of God hath appeared, to diſſolue the workes of the diuell. And againe, this is the ſentence (ſaith the ſcripture) that ouercommeth the world, euen our faith. Whatſoeuer then ſatan worketh, or can worke againſt vs, be it neuer ſo forcible, faith in Chriſt will vanquiſh it. Such a mateſly is in our faith, beleeuing in the name of the Sonne of God.

The other remedy is faithfull praier, which obtaineth in the name of Chriſt, all things with the Lord. So that wicked fiend, which had killed before ſeuen husbands of Tobias wife could not hurt him, entring his matrimony with earneſt praier: ſo no more ſhall any ſinniſter prophecie preuaile, where praier out of a faithfull heart, doth ſtriue againſt it. Neither am I ignorant, that againſt ſuch temporall euils and puniſhments to this life inflicted, a great remedy lieth alſo in this, when Sathan findeth nothing, wherein greatly to accuſe our conſcience. But becauſe ſuch a conſcience is hard to be found, the next refuge is to flie to repentance, with amendement of life. For many times where ſinne doth raigne in our mortall bodies, there alſo the operation of Sathan is ſtrong againſt vs, to afflict our outward bodies here; but as touching our eternall ſaluation, neither worke nor merit hath any place, but onely our faith in Chriſt. And thus much briefly touching the two ſpeciall remedies, whereby the operation of all diuelliſh prophecies may bee auoided and deſeated.

Now many there be, which leauing theſe remedies aforeſaid, and the ſafe protection which the Lord hath ſet vp in Chriſt, take other waies of their owne, ſeeking by their owne policie, how to withſtand and eſcape ſuch prophecies, either in eſchewing the place and time ſubtilly, or elſe cruelly by killing the party whom they feare: whereof commeth iniury, murther, and parricide, with other miſchiefes in commonwealths vnſpeakeable. To whom commonly it commeth ſo to paſſe, that whereby they thinke moſt to ſaue themſelues, by the ſame meanes they fall moſt into the ſnare, being ſubuerted and confounded in their owne policie, for that they truſting to their owne deuice, and not vnto the Lord, which onely can diſſolue the operation of Sathan, the Lord ſo iuſtly their ſeruice into a trap, thereby to take them, wherby they thinke moſt ſurely to eſcape. Examples whereof wee ſee not onley in Aſtyages, king of the Medes aforeſaid, and Cyrus; but in infinite other like euents, which the trade of the world doth daily offer to our eies. So Queene Margaret thought her then cocheſture, when duke Humfrey was made away; when nothing elſe was her confuſion ſo much, as the loſſe and lacke of that man.

So if king Richard the ſecond had not exerciſed ſuch cruelty vpon his vncle Thomas, duke of Glocester, he had not receiued ſuch wrong by king Henry the fourth as hee did, pag. 473. Likewiſe this king Edward the fourth, if he had ſuffered his brother George, duke of Clarence to haue lined, his houſe had not ſo gone to wracke by Richard his other brother, as it did. What befell vpon the Student of Aſtrology in the Vniuerſity of Baſil, ye heard before, who if he had not meruailed himſelfe in his chamber for feare of his diuination, had eſcaped the ſtroke that fell. Now in auoiding ſuch prophetical euents which hee ſhould not haue ſearched, hee fell into that which hee did feare. Theſe few examples for inſtruction ſake, I thought by occaſion to inferre, not as though theſe were alone; but by theſe few to admonith the Reader of infinite other, which daily come in practiſe of life, to the great danger and decay, as well in priuate houſes, as in weales publike.

Wherefore briefly to repeat what before ſimply hath been ſaid touching this matter, ſeeing that ſathan through ſuch falſe prophecies, hath and yet doth daily practiſe ſo manifold miſchiefes in the world, ſetting brother againſt brother, nephew againſt the vncle, houſe againſt houſe, and realm againſt realme, kindling hatred where loue was, and ſubuerting priuily the ſimplicity of our chriſtian faith; therefore the firſt thing and beſt is, for godly men not to buſie their braines about ſuch phantaſies, neither in delighting in them, nor in harkening to Curioſities of prophecies to be auoyded.

The 3. part, how to auoid the danger of diuelliſh prophecies.

Two rare rules againſt diuelliſh prophecies.

The firſt remedie.

The ſecond remedy againſt dangerous prophecies.

Mans policie can nothing ho againſt the diuell.

Only Chriſt able to withſtand the power of Sathan. Pſal. 90.

No power can withſtand Sathan, but only Chriſt, and our faith in him.

The ſtrength of a Chriſtian mans faith in Chriſt.

to them, nor in ſearching for them, either by ſouthſaier, or by coniuration, or by familiar, or by aſtrologer: knowing and conſidering this, that whoſoeuer ſhall be deſirous or readie to ſearch for them, the diuell is as readie to anſwere his curioſitie therein. For as once in the old time of Gentilitie, he gaue his Oracles by Idols, and Prieſts of that time: ſo the ſame diuell, although he worketh not now by Idols, yet hee craftilie can giue now anſwere by Aſtrologers, and coniurers in theſe our dayes, and in ſo doing, both to ſay truth, and yet to deceiue men when he hath ſaid. Wherefore, leauing off ſuch curioſitie, let euery Chriſtian man walke ſimply in his prefect vocation, referring his things not in the word perpeſſed, vnto him which faith in his word: Non eſt veſtrum ſcire tempora & momenta temporum, &c. It is not for you to know the times, and ſeaſons of times, which the father hath kept in his owne power, &c.

Secondly, in this matter of Prophecies, requiſite it is (as is ſaid) for euery Chriſtian man to learne, how to diſcerne and diſtinct the true prophecies, which proceede of God, and the falſe Prophecies, which come of Sathan. The difference whereof, as it is not hard to be diſcerned: ſo neceſſarie it is, that euery good man doe rightly vnderſtand the ſame, to the intent that he knowing and ſeeing the danger of the one, may be the more certaine and conſtant in adhering to the other.

Thirdly, becauſe it is not ſufficient that the deceitfull prophecies of the diuell be knowen, but alſo that they be reſiſted, I haue alſo declared, by what meanes the operation of Sathans works and Prophecies are to be ouercome: that is, not with ſtrength and policie of man, for that there is nothing in man, able to counteruaile the power of that enemie. Vnder heauen there is nothing elſe that can preuaile againſt his works, but only the name of the Lord Jeſus the ſonne of God, not outwardly pronounced onely with our lips, or ſigned in our foreheads with the outward croſſe, but inwardly apprehended and diuelling in our hearts by a ſilent faith, firmely and earneſtly truſting vpon the promiſes of God, giuen and alled vnto vs in his name: For ſo it hath pleaſed God moſt fatherly tolſedome, to ſet him vp, to be both our righteouſneſſe before himſelfe, and alſo to be our ſtrength againſt the enemie, accepting our faith in his ſonne, in no leſſe price, then he accepteth the workes and worthineſſe of the ſame his ſonne, in whom we doe beleeue.

Such is the ſtrength and effect of faith both in heauen, in earth, and alſo in hell: In heauen to iuſtifie, in earth to preſerue, in hell to conquere. And therefore when any ſuch Prophecie, or any other thing is to vs obiected, which ſeemeth to tend againſt vs, let vs firſt conſider whether it ſauour of Sathan, or not. If it doe, then let vs flee our ſuccour, not in our ſelues, where it doth not dwell, neither let vs kill, nor ſlay, nor chaunge our vocation therefore, following vnordinate wayes: but let vs run to our Caſtle of refuge, which is to the power of the Lord Jeſus, remembring the true promiſe of the Pſalme: Qui habitat in adiutorio altiſſimi, in protectione Dei cœli commorabitur. That is, Who ſo putteth his truſt in the ſuccour of the Lord, ſhall haue the God of heauen to his protector. And then ſhall it afterward follow in the ſame Pſalme: Ipſe liberabit te à laqueo venantium, & à verbo aſpero. That is: And he ſhall deliuer him from the ſnare of the hunter, and from all euill words, and Prophecies, be they neuer ſo ſharpe or bitter againſt him, &c. And thus much by the occaſion of king Edward, of Prophecies.

Now hauing long taried at home in deſcribing the ſtumbles and troubles within our owne land, we will let out our ſkoy more at large, to conſider the afflictions and perturbations of other parties and places alſo of Chriſtes Church, as well here in Europe vnder the Pope, as in the Eaſt parts vnder the Turke, firſt deducing our ſkoile from the time of Sigiſmund, where before we left: Which Sigiſmund, as is aboue recorded, was a great doer in the Councell of Conſtance againſt Johan Hus, and Hieronime of Prage. This Emperour had euer euill lucke, fighting againſt the Turkes. Twice he warred againſt them, and in both the battailes was diſcomfited and put to flight: once about the Citie of Mylia, fighting againſt Baiazetes the great Turke. an. 1395. the ſecond time fighting againſt Celebinus the ſonne of Baiazetes, about the towne called Columbachum. But ſpecially after the Councell of Conſtance, wherein were condemned and burned thoſe two godly Martyrs, more vnproſperous ſucceſſe did then follow him, fighting againſt the Bohemians, his owne ſubiects, an. 1420. by whom he was repulſed in ſo many battailes, to his great diſhonour, during all the life of Ziſca, and of Procopius, as is afore more at large expreſſed: who was ſo beaten both of the Turkes, and at home of his owne people, that he neuer did encounter with the Turkes after. Then followed the Councell of Baſil, after the beginning whereof within fiue yeeres, this Sigiſmundus, which was Emperour, king of Hungarie, and king of Boheme, died in Pauania, an. 1437.

¶ Albertus Emperour.

Albert duke of Auſtrich, Emperour, king of Hungary, and king alſo of Boheme.

THis Sigiſmund left behinde him one onely daughter Elizabeth, who was married to Albert, Duke of Auſtrich: by reaſon whereof, he was aduanced to the empire, and ſo was both Duke of Auſtrich, Emperour, king of Hungary, and king alſo of Boheme. But this Albert (as is afore declared) being an enemie and a diſquieter to the Bohemians, and eſpecially to the good men of Thabor, as hee was preparing and fetting forth againſt the Turkes, in the meane time died, in the ſecond peare of his Empire, an. 1439. leauing his wife great with childe, who bring then in Hungarie, and thinking to be great with a daughter, called to her the Princes and the chiefe eſtates of the Realme, declaring to them that ſhee was but a woman, and inſufficient to the gouernance of ſuch a ſtate: and moreouer how the thought her ſelfe to be with childe of a daughter, and therefore required them to prouide among them, ſuch a Prince and gouernour, (reſeruing the right of the kingdome to her ſelfe) as were fit and able vnder her, to haue the regiment of the land committed. The Turke in the meane while being eleuated and incouraged with his proſperous victories againſt Sigiſmundus aforeſaid, began then more fiercely to inuade Hungarie and thoſe parties of Chriſtendome. Wherefore the Hungarians making the more haſte, conſulted among themſelues, to make duke Uladiſlaus, brother to Caſimirus king of Polonie, their king.

But while this was in working betweene the Hungarians and Uladiſlaus the duke, in the meane ſpace Elizabeth brought forth a ſonne called Ladiſlaus, who being the lawfull heire of the kingdome, the queene calleth backe againe her former word, minding to reſerue the kingdome for her ſonne, being the true heire thereof, and therefore refuſeth marriage with the ſaid Uladiſlaus, which he had before pretended. But Uladiſlaus ioyning with a great part of the Hungarians, preſſing ſtill in the condition before granted, would not giue ouer: by reaſon whereof, great contention and diuiſion ſundry among the people of Hungarie, Amurathes, the great Turke, taking his aduantage of their diſcord, and partly ſurpriſed with pride of his former ſucceſſe againſt Sigiſmund aforeſaid, with his whole maine and force, inuaded the Realme of Hungarie: where Hyniades ſurnamed Uaiuoda Prince of Tranſiluania, ioyning with the new king Uladiſlaus, did both together ſet againſt the Turke, an. 1444. and there Uladiſlaus the newe king of Hungaria, the fourth peare of his kingdome was ſlaine. Elizabeth with her ſonne, was fled in the meane while, to Frederick the Emperour. Of Hyniades Uaiuoda the noble captaine, and of his acts, and alſo of Ladiſlaus Chriſt willing, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter, in his time and place.

¶ Fredericus the third Emperour.

AFter the deceaſe of Albert, ſucceeded in the Empire Fredericus the third, duke of Auſtria, an. 1440. By whom it was procured (as in haue before ſignified) that Pope Felix eleated by the Councell of Baſil, did reſigne his Popedome, to Pope Nicolas the fift, vpon this condition, that the ſaid Pope Nicolas ſhould ratifie the acts decred in the ſaid Councell of Baſill. In the dayes of this Emperour, much warre and diſſention raged almoſt thorough all chriſtian realmes, in Auſtria, Hungaria, Polonia, in France, in Burgoine, and alſo here in England, betweene king Henrie the ſixth, and king Edward the fourth, as ye haue alreadie heard, whereby Edward the fourth, as ye haue alreadie heard, with little maiſtrie, to haue ouerturned all the Chriſtian Realmes in Europe, had not the prouidence of our mercifull Lord otherwiſe prouided to keepe Amurathes the Turke occupied in other ciuill warres at home in the meane while. Unto this Fredericke came Elizabeth (as is afore ſaid) with Ladiſlaus her ſonne: by whom he was nourriſhed and entertained a certaine ſpace, till at length, after the death of Uladiſlaus aforeſaid, king of Hungarie (which was ſlaine in battaile by the Turkes) the men of Auſtria, though the inſtigation of Ulricus Cilingerus and of Ulricus earle of Cilicia riſing vp in armour, required of Fredericke the Emperour, either to giue them their young king, or elſe to ſtand to his owne defence.

Fredericus 3. Emperour.

Uladiſlaus K. of Hungarie ſlaine in battaile by the Turke.

When Fredericke heard this, neither would he render to them a ſodaine anſwere, neither would they abide any longer delay: and ſo the matter growing to warre, the new Citie was beſieged, where many were ſlaine, and much harme done. At length the Emperor inſpart being the weaker, the Emperour through the interuention of certaine Nobles of Germanie, reſtored Ladiſlaus vnto their hands, who being yet vnder age, committed his three kingdomes to three gouernours. Whereof Johan Hyniades the worthie captaine aboue mentioned, had the ruling of Hungarie: George Poſiebacius had Boheme: and Ulricus the Earle of Cilicia, had Auſtria. Which Ulrice, hauing the chiefe cuſtodie of the king, bare the greateſt authoritie aboue the reſt, a man as much full of ambition and tyrannie, as hee was hated almoſt of all the Auſtrians, and ſhortly after by the meanes of Cilingerus, was expulſed alſo from the king and the court, but afterward reſtored againe, and Cilingerus thruſt out. Such is the vnſtable condition of them which be nert in place about Princes. But this contention betweene them I ouerpaſſe.

Johan Hyniades, gouernour of Hungary vnder the king. Geoge Poſiebrachius gouernour of Boheme. Ulricus gouernour of Auſtrich.

Not long after, Ladiſlaus the yong king went to Boheme, there to be crowned, where George Pogiebracius (as is sayd) had the gouernance. But Ladislaus during all the time of his beeing there, though being much requested, yet would neither resort into the Churches, nor heare the seruice of them, which did draw after the doctrine of Hus. Insomuch that when a certaine Priest in the high tower of Prage, was appointed and addicted, after the manner of Priests, to say seruice before the king, being enclosed to hold with Iohn Hus and Hieronymus, the king disdaining at him, commaunded him to giue place and depart, or else he would send him downe headlong from the rocke of the tower: and so the good minister repulsed by the king, departed. Also another time the said Ladislaus, seeing the Sacrament carried by a minister of that side, whom they called the Hussites, would doe thereunto no reuerence. Ex Aene. Syluio.

Ladislaus a young boy, king.

Ladislaus could not abide the sacrament of bread.

At length the long abode of the king, although it was not very long, yet seemed to the godly disposed to bee longer then they wished: and that was not to the king vntowardnes, which made him to make the more haste away: but before he departed, hee thought first to visite the noble Citie Stratislauia in Sclesia. In the which Citie, the foresaid king Ladislaus being there in the high church, at seruice, many great princes were about him: Among whom was also George Pogiebracius, who then stood neerest to the king, vnto whom one Chiliarches playing the Parasite about the king (as the fashion is of such as faine themselues fooles, to make other men as very fooles as they) spake in this wise as followeth: With what countenance you doe behold this our seruice, I see right well, but your heart I doe not see. Say then, doth not the order of this our Religion seeme vnto you decent and comely? Do you not see how many and how great princes, yea the king himselfe, doe follow one order and vniformitie? And why doe you then follow rather your Preacher Rochezana then these? Doe you thinke a few Bohemians to be more wise then all the Church of Christ besides? why then doe you not forsake that rude and rusticall people, and ioyne to these Nobles, as you are a noble man your selfe?

Chiliarches a Parasite about king Ladislaus.

To whom he answered a prudently with a pleasant mocke.

Then vnto this Pogiebracius sagely againe doth answere. If you speake these words of your selfe, saith he, you are not the man whom you faine your selfe to be: and so to you I answere, as not to a fole. But if you speake this by the suggestion of others, then must I satisfie them. Heare therefore. As touching the Ceremonies of the Church, every man hath a conscience of his owne to follow. As for vs, we vse such ceremonies, as we trust doe please God: Neither is it in our abridgement to beleeue what we will our selues. The mind of man being perswaded with great reasons, is captiuated, will nee will he: and as nature is instructed and taught, so is she drawen, in some one way, and in no wise another. As for my selfe, I am fully perswaded in the religion of my preachers. If I should follow thy religion, I might perchance deceiue men, going contrary to mine owne conscience, but I cannot deceiue God, who seeth the hearts of all: Neither shall it become mee to frame my selfe like to thy disposition. That which is meete for another, is not likewise conuenient for a noble man. And these words either take to thy selfe, as spoken to thee, if thou be a wise man, or else I referre them to those which set thee a work. Ex Aen. Syl. in Hist. Bohem.

An answere pertaining to a prudently Politique.

After the king was returned from the Bohemians againe to Austria, the Vngarians likewise made their petitions to the king, that he would also come vnto them. The gouernour of Vngarie (as yee before haue heard) was Ioannes Huniades, whose victorious acts against the Turks are famous. Against this Huniades, wicked Vlricus Earle of Cilica, did all he could with the king, to bring him to destruction, and therefore caused the king to send for him vp to Vienna, and there priuily to worke his death. But Huniades hauing theref of intelligence, offereth himselfe with Vngarie to serue his Prince, to all affaires: Out of the land where he was, it was neither best (said hee) for the king, nor safest for himselfe, to come. The earle being disappointed, came backe with certaine Nobles of the Court, to the borders of Hungarie, thinking either to apprehend him and bring him to Vienna, or else to dispatch him. Huniades without in the fieldes, had he no talke or commune with him, within the towne he would not be brought. After that, an other traine also was laid for him, that vnder pretence of the kings safe-conduct, hee should meete the king in the broad fields of Vienna. But Huniades suspecting deceit, came vnbidde to the place appointed, where he neither seeing the king to come, nor the earle to haue any safe-conduct for him, was moued (and not without cause) against the earle, declaring how it was in his power there to slay him, which went about to seeke his blood, but for the reuerence of the king, hee would spare him and let him go.

Not long after this, the Turke with a great power of eighty thousand men, to the number of an hundred and fiftene thousand, arriued in Vngarie, where he laid siege to the Citie Alba. But through the merciful hand of God, Iohn Huniades, and Capistranus a certaine Minorite, with a small garrison of Christian souldiours, gaue him the repulse and put him to flight, with all his mightie host: Whereof more Christ willing) hereafter. Ex hist. Bohemic. Aen. Sylui. Huniades shortly after this victorie, deceased. Of whose death when the king and the earle did vnderstand, they came the more boldly into Hungarie, where he being receiued by Ladislaus Huniades sonne, into the towne of Alba: there viewed the places where the Turkes before had pitched their tents. When this Ladislaus heard that the king was comming first toward the towne, obediently he opened to him the gates. Foure thousand only of armed souldiours hee debarred from entring the Citie.

Vlricus Ladislaus resisteth into Hungarie.

Ladislaus Huniades sonne.

In the meane time while the king was there resident in the Citie, the earle with other Nobles did sit in counsaile, requiring also Ladislaus to resort vnto them: who first doubting with himselfe what he might doe, at length putteth on a pyne coate of male, and commeth to them. Whether the earle first began with him, or he with the Earle, it is not known. The opinion is of some, that Vlricus first called him traitor, for shutting the gates against the kings souldiors. Howsoeuer the occasion began, this is vndoubted, that Ulricus taking his sword from his page, let fite at his head. To breake the blow, some putting by their handes, had their fingers cut off. The Hungarians hearing a noise and tumult within the chamber brake it vpon them, and there incontinent slew Vlrick the earle, wounding and cutting him almost all to peeces: The king hearing thereof, although he was not a little discontented thereat in his minde: yet seeing there was then no other remedie, dissembled his griefe for a time.

From thence the king tooke his iourney againe to Buda, accompanied with the foresaid Ladislaus, who passing by the towne, where the wife of Huniades was mourning for the death of her husband, seemed with many faire words to comfort her: and after he had there sufficiently repatled himselfe, with such pretence of dissembled loue, and fained fauour, that they were without all suspition and feare: from thence he set forward in his iourney, taking with him the two sonnes of Huniades, Ladislaus and Mathias, who were right readie to wait vpon him. The king being come to Buda (whether of his owne head, or by sinister counsell set on) when he had them at a banquet, caused both the sonnes of Huniades: to wit, Ladislaus and Mathias, to be apprehended. And first was brought forth Ladislaus the elder sonne, to the place of execution, there to be beheaded: where meekely he suffered, being charged with no other crime, but this, published by the voyce of the crier, saying: Thus are they to be chastened, which are rebels against their Lord. Pouncrus writing of his death, addeth this moreouer, that after the hangman had three blowes at his necke, yet notwithstanding the said Ladislaus hauing his hands bound behind him after the third stroke, rose vp right vpon his feete, and looking vp to heauen, called vpon the Lord, and protested his innocencie in that behalfe: and so laying downe his necke againe, at the fourth blow was dispatched. Mathias the other brother was led captiue with the king vnto Austria. The rest of the captiues beake the prison and escaped.

A miraculous token at the death of Ladislaus.

Ex Pouncr. Chron. lib. 5.

It was not long after this crueltie was wrought vpon Ladislaus, the king being about the age of twentie and two yeres, that talke was made of the kings marriage, with Magdalene daughter to the French king. The place of the marriage was appointed at Prage, where great preparation was for the matter. At the first entrance of the king into the Citie of Prage, Rochezana with a companie of ministers, such as were fauourers of Iohn Hus, and of sincere religion, came with all solemnitie to receiue the king, making there his oration to gratulate the kings most ioyfull and prosperous accesse into the same his owne realme and countrey of Boheme. Vnto which Rochezana, after he had ended his oration, scarce the king would open his mouth to giue thankes to him, or any chearefull countenance vnto his companie, but fiercely seemed to frowne vpon them. In the next Pageant after these, came forth the Priests of the high Minister, after the most Popish manner, meeting him with procession, and with the Sacrament of the altar: For as Panacea among Physitions serueth for all diseases, so the Sacrament of the Popes altar, serueth for all pompes and pageants. First I must lie vpon the altar, then it must be holden vp with handes, then it must hang in the pixe, it must serue for the quicke, it must also helpe the dead, it must moreouer visite the sicke, it must walke about the Churchyard, it must goe about the streets, it must bee carried about the fieldes to make the grasse to grow, it must be had to the battaile, it must ride on horseback before the pope: And finally, it must welcome kings into Cities. Wherein these Catholike Fathers doe seeme somewhat to forget themselues. For if the pope, being inferiour to the Sacrament of the altar, at the comming of kings, doe vse to sit still while the kings come and kisse his feete, what reason is it that the Sacrament of the altar, which is (I trow) aboue the pope, should meet kings by the way, and welcome them to the towne? But this by the way of parenthesis: Let vs now continue the text.

and especially with their blessed Sacrament, to come: with all reuerence and much deuotion, helighted downe from his horse, he embraced the croslle and kissed it, and with chearefull countenance saluted the Priests in order. All this while his young wife was not yet come out of France, but Legates were sent, after most sumptuous wise, to conduct her. Other Legates also were sent the same time, to the Emperour Frederick, for conclusion of peace. The third Legacie was directed likewise to Pope Calixtus about Religion, how to reduce the Bohemians to the Church of Rome. The author of this storie (which was Pope Pius himselfe) declareth further the opinion of some to bee, that king Ladislaus the same time had intended, to make a finall end and destruction of all that set in Boheme, which held with the doctrine of Iohn Hus, and Hierome, by the assembly and concourse of the catholicke Princes, and Popish Prelates, which were appointed there to meet together at that marriage in Prage. For there should be first the Emperour Frederick, Elizabeth the kings mother, and his sisters, Elizabeth, and Anna, the Princes of Saronie, Baiozia, Silesia, Franconia, the Palatine, and other Princes of Rhene: many also of the Lords of France, besides the Popes Cardinals, Legats, Prelats, and other potestates of the Popes Church. Who if they had all together conuented in Boheme, no doubt but some great mischiefe had beene wrought there against the Hussites: against whom this Ladislaus, following the steps of Sigismundus his grandfather, and Albertus his father, was euer an vtter enemy. But when man hath purposed, yet God disposeth as seeth him.

A great conuents of catholicke princes intended against the Hussites.

Man purposeth and God disposeth.

Ex Aenea Silu.

And therefore, truely it is written of Aeneas Syluius in the same place, saying: De regimine Ciuitatum, de mutatione regnorum, de orbis imperio, minimum est, quod homines possint (tum verò De religionis constitutione multo minus) magna magnus disponit Deus. That is: In regiment of Cities, in alteration of kingdomes, in ruling and gouerning the world, it is lesse then nothing that man can doe: it is the high God that ruleth high things. Wherevnto then I may well adde this moreouer, and say: that if the gouernance of worldly kingdomes standeth not in mans power, but in the disposition of God, much lesse is it then, that mans power can doe in the regiment and gouerning of religion. Example whereof in this purposed deuice of Princes, doth euidently appeare. For as this great preparation and solemnitie of marriage was in doing, and the princes readie to set forth, with a little turne of Gods holy hand, all these great purposes were suddenly turned and dashed. For in the midst of this businesse, about the 21. day of November, An. 1461. this great aduersarie of Christs people, king Ladislaus, king of Boheme, of Hungarie, and prince of Austria sicknes, and within 36. houres died, some say of a Pestilent sore in his grine, some say of poyson. But howsoeuer it was, as it came not without the iust iudgement of God, reuenging the innocent blod of Ladislaus Huniades sonne, wrongfully put to death before: so by the opportune death of this king, the poore Churches of Boheme were gratiously deliuered. And this end made Ladislaus, one of the mightiest princes at that time in all Europe: in whom the mightie kingdomes were coniopned and combined together, Austria, Hungaria, and Bohemia: which countries doe lie Southeall from England, in the farthest parts of all Germanie, toward Constantinople, and the dominion of the Turkes, and containe these principall townes in them.

After the death of Ladislaus, the kingdome of Boheme fell to George Pogiebracius aboue mentioned, whom Pope Innocent the eight, did excommunicate and depose for his religion, as is afore declared.

George Pogiebracius.

Furthermore the kingdome of Hungarie, was giuen to Matthias son of Huniades, who was in captiuity (as is said) with king Ladislaus, and should haue beene put to death after his brother, had not the king before beene preuented with death, as is aboue recorded. Moreouer, here is to be noted that the said king Ladislaus, thus dying without wife and issue, left behinde him two sisters alive, to witte, Elizabeth, which was married to Casimirus king of Polonia: and Anna, married to William, duke of Saronie; Elizabeth by her husband Casimirus, king of Polonia, had Vladislaus, who at length was king both of Boheme and Hungarie. This Casimirus, first was married to Beatrix, wife before to Matthias. Then being diuorced from her by the dispensation of pope Alexander married a new wife a countesse of France, by whom he had two children, Lewes, and Anna; Lewes which was heire of both kingdomes of Boheme, and Hungarie, was slaine fighting against the Turkes. Anna was married to Ferdinandus, by whom he was Archduke of Austria king of Boheme, &c.

War betweene Matthias and Fredericke the Emperour.

Yee heard before, how after the decease of Ladislaus, the Hungarians by their election preferred Mathias, surnamed Corninus, which was sonne of Huniades, to the kingdome of Hungarie. For which cause dissension fell betweene Fredericke the Emperour and him, for that the said Fredericke was both nominated himselfe by diuers vnto that kingdome, and also because he had the crowne of Hungarie then remaining in his hands, which Elizabeth mother to king Ladislaus, had brought to the Emperour, as was before declared. Vpon this warre betweene them, was ceased by the intercession of the princes of Germany, so that Matthias raunsomed that crowne of Fredericke for eight thousand Florences.

Not long after, Pope Innocent being displeased with George Pogiebracius (or Boiebracius) king of Boheme, for fauouring of Iohn Hus, and his religion, that is to say, for playing the part of a godly Prince, did excommunicate and depose him, conferring his kingdome to Matthias. But notwithstanding as Fredericke the Emperour would not thereto consent, and especially after the death of the aforesaide George, take the Emperour and the Bohemians, drawing out Matthias, did nominate Uladislaus sonne of Casimirus, king of Polonie, and of Elisabeth, to be king of Boheme, therefore great warre and trouble kindled betweene him and Fredericke the Emperour: Wherein the Emperour had vtterly gone to ruine, had not Albertus duke of Saxonie refused the Emperour, and repressed the vehemencie of Matthias.

Uladislaus Casimirus son, made king of Hungarie.

Albert duke of Saxonie.

The noble acts of Iohn Huniades and of his Matthias his sonne, were not onely great stairs to Hungarie, but almost to all Christendome, in repelling backe the Turke. For beside the other victories of Iohn Huniades the father, aforementioned, this Matthias also his sonne succeeding to him in the valiantnesse, then in the name of his father, did so recouer Sirmium, and the confines of Illyrica, from the hands of the Turkes, and so vanquished their power, that both Mahumetes, and also Baiazetes his sonne, were inforced to seeke for truce.

The noble acts of Iohn Huniades and Matthias his sonne against the Turkes. Sirmium and the confines of Illyrica recouered from the Turkes.

Matthias reconciled. The fabre practise of Matthias to keep euill practises hidde.

Duer and besides, the same Matthias conducting his armie into Austa (which lieth South from Hungarie) recouered againe Iaitza, the principall towne of that kingdome, from the Turkes possession. Who, if other Christian Princes had ioyned their helpes withall, would haue proceeded farther into Thracia. But behold here the malitious subtilitie of Satan working by the Pope. For while Matthias was thus occupied in this expedition against the Turkes, wherein hee should haue bene set forward and aided by Christian Princes, and Bishops of the Sea of Rome, wickedly and sinfully mischiefe matter of ciuill discord betweene him and Pogiebracius aforesaid, in removing him from the right of his kingdome, and transferring the same to Matthias. Whereupon, not onely the course of victorie against the Turkes was stopped, but also great warre and bloodshed followed in Christian realmes, as well betweene this Matthias, and Pogiebractus, with his two sonnes Victorinus and Henricus, as also betweene Casimirus, Uladislaus, and Matthias warring about Uratislauia, till at length the matter was taken vp by the Princes of Germanie.

The pope excommunicateth and deposeth Pogiebracius. Matthias ambitiously aspireth vnto the kingdome of Bohemia.

Albeit, for all the execrable excommunication of the Pope against Pogiebracius, a great part of Boheme would not be removed from the obedience of their king, whom the Pope had cursed, and deposed: yet Matthias take from him Moraria, and a great portion of Silesia, and adioyned it to his kingdome of Hungarie, An. 1474.

¶ Where this by the way is to be noted, that the religion in Boheme, planted by Iohn Hus, could not be extinct or suppressed with all the power of foure mightie Princes, Vincelaus, Sigismundus, Albertus, and Ladislaus, notwithstanding they with the popes, did therein what they possibly could: but still the Lord maintained the same, as yée see by this Pogiebractus king of Boheme, whom the pope could not bitterly remoue out of the kingdome of Bohemia.

The religion of the Boheme planted by Iohn Hus, and by God against the diuersities of princes in Europe. Matthias a great fauourer of learning and of learned men.

This foresaid Matthias, beside his other memorable acts of Christus, is no lesse also commended for his singular knowledge and loue of learning and of learned men, whom he with great stipends, procured into Pannonia: where by the meanes of godlie letters, and furniture of learned men, he reduced in that space the barbarous rudenesse of that country, into a flourishing common wealth. Moreouer such a Librarie hee did there erect, and replenish with all kind of Authors, Sciences, and Histories, which he caused to be translated out of Greeke into Latin, as the like is not thought to bee found, nere to Italy, in all Europe beside. Out of which Librarie we haue receiued diuers fragments of writers, as of Polybius, and Diodorus Siculus, which were not extant before. Ex Pencer.

The noble Librarie of Matthias the mother of Languages. Ex Iac. Pere.

The constant fortitude also of Georgius Pogiebracius king of Boheme, is not vnworthy of commendation: of whom also pope Pius himselfe, in Descriptione Europæ, both honestly reporteth as a pope may speake of a protestant, in these words writing: Magnus vir alioqui, & rebus bellicis clarus, &c. Who although pope Innocent did execrate with his children, yet he left not off the profession of the veritie and knowledge which he had receiued. Moreouer, the Lord so prospered his sonnes, Victorinus, and Henricus, that they subdued their enemies, and kept their estate: Insomuch, that when Fredericke the Emperour at Vienna was in Custodie enclosed by the Citizens, Victorinus did rescue and deliuer him out of their handes: Wherefore the Emperour afterward aduanced them to be dukes. Also God gaue them sometimes prosperous victory against Matthias, as at the Citie of Slogonia, &c.

Commendation of George Pogiebracius king of Boheme. Ex Pio Pont. De Europa Europæ.

God fauorable to the sonnes of Pogiebractus.

After the decease of Georgius Pogiebractus, king of Boheme, Frederiche the Emperour assigned that kingdome, not to Matthias, vpon whom the pope had bestowed it before, but vpon Uladislaus sonne of Casimirus, king of Polonie, and of Elisabeth, daughter of the Emperour Albert, and sister to Ladislaus. For the which, Matthias being discontented, and for that the Emperour had denied him his daughter Kunegunda, went about to exclude Uladislaus out of Boheme, and also proclaimed warre against Frederiche. But before he accomplished his purposed preparation, death preuented him, who without issue departed, An. 1490.

The death of Pogiebractus.

Uladislaus forsaketh his first wife.

After the death of Matthias, departing without issue, Uladislaus sonne of Casimirus, king of Polonie, and of Elizabeth daughter to Albert Emperour, and sister to king Ladislaus, married his wife Beatrix, whom Matthias left a widow, and with her was elected king of Hungarie, with this condition made betweene him and Frederiche the Emperour, that if she died without lawfull issue, then the kingdomes of Hungarie and of Boheme, should returne to Maximilian, sonne to Fredericus. But Uladislaus not long after, did repudiate his wife Beatrix, and depriuing her of her kingdome, caused the said Beatrix to sweare and to consent to the marrying of another woman, which was the daughter of the French king, named Anne, procuring from Pope Alexander a dispensation for the same, as is before signified. By this Anne, Uladislaus had Lewis, and Anne, which Anne afterward was married to Ferdinandus.

Of Charles duke of Burgoine, somewhat was before touched, who had married king Edwards sister: and what troubles by him were stirred vp in France, partly was before notified. This Charles after he had destroyed the Citie Nuilla, or Nouisium, the space of a whole yeere, went about to alienate the territorie of Colen, from the Empire to his owne dominion: wherefore warre began to bee moued betweene him and Fr: dericke the Emperour. At length though communication had, peace was concluded, and a marriage appointed betweene Mary the onely daughter of Charles, and Maximilian the Emperours sonne: Anno 1475. Then from Nouisium, Charles leadeth his armie toward Heluatia, against Renatus or Reinhardus duke of Lotharing: then against the Heluetians.

Where yée by the way may see the miserable vexations and contentions among our Christian princes here in Europe described, vnder the raigne of this Fredericke the third emperour, so that almost no angle or portion of all Christendome (whether we consider the state of the Church or ciuill gouernment) was free from discord, tumults, and dissensions. This cankered worme of ambition so mightily creepeth, and euery where preuaileth in these latter ends of the world, that it suffereth neither rest in common weales, nor peace in the Church, nor any sparkle of charitie almost to remaine in the life of men. And what marueil then, if the Lord seeing vs so farre to degenerate, not onely from his precepts and counsels, but almost from the sense and bond of nature, that brother with brother, vncle with nephew, blood with blood cannot agree, in striuing, killing, and fighting for worthy dominions, doe send therefore these cruell Turkes vpon vs so to scourge and deuour vs: Of whose bloodie tyrannie and daily spilling of Christian blood, hereafter (by the grace of Christ) wee will discourse more at large, when wee come to the peculiar consideration of the Turkish stories. In the meane time, this shall be for vs to note and obserue, not so much the scourge how grieuous it is: but rather to behold the causes which bring the whip vpon vs, which is our owne miserable ambition and wretched warres among our selues.

Warre and dissension among Christian Princes.

The discord of Christians scourged by the Turkes.

Ambition and auarice of the Church of Rome.

And yet if this Christian peace and loue, left and commended so heartily vnto vs by the mouth of the sonne of God, being now banished out of Christian Realmes and ciuill gouernance, might at least finde some refuge in the Church, or take Sanctuarie among men professing nothing but Religion, lesse cause wee had to mourne. Now so it is, that as wee see little peace and amitie among ciuill Potentates: so lesse wee finde in the spirituall sort of them, which chiefly take vpon them the administration of Christs Church. So that it may well bee doubted whether the scourge of the Turke, or the ciuill sword of Princes haue slaine moe in the fieldes, or the Popes keyes haue burnt moe in townes and Cities. And albeit such as bee professed to the Church, doe not fight with swoorde and Target for Dominions and reuenewes, as Warlike Princes doe: yet this ambition, pride and auarice, appeareth in them nothing inferiour vnto other worldly potentates:

Discord and dissension in the Church no lesse.

potentates: especially if we behold and aduise the doings and insatiable desires of the court of Rome. Great argument and proofe hereof neither is hard to be found, nor far to be sought. What realme almost though all Christendome hath not onlie seene with their eyes, but haue felt in their purses the ambition intollerable, and auarice insatiable of that deuouring Church, and also haue complained vpon the greeuance thereof, but neuer could be redressed? What exactions and extortions haue bene here in England out of bishoprickes, monasteries, benefices, deanries, archdeaconries, and all other offices of the church, to fill the popes coffers? and when they had all done, yet euery yeare brought almost some newe inuention from Rome, to fetch in our English money: and if all the floods in England (yea in all Europe) did runne into the sea of Rome, yet were that Ocean neuer able to be satisfied.

¶ In France likewise, what floods of money were swallowed vp into this sea of Rome? it was openly complained of in the councell of Basill as is testified by Henry Tolen, Canon and Ambassadour of the archbishop of Maidenburge, written in this booke intituled Rapularium, where as hee witnesseth that in the councell of Basill, An. 1436. the archb. of Lions did declare, that in the time of pope Martine, there came out of France to the court of Rome, 9. millions of golde, which was gathered of the Bishops and Prelats, besides those which could not be counted of the pope Clergie, which daily without number, ran vnto the court of Rome, carrying with them all their whole substance: The archbishop of Turonne laid also at Basill, in the yeare of our Lord 1439. that thée millions of gold came into Rome in his time, within the space of 14. yeares, from the prelates and prelacies, whereof no account could be made, besides poore clergie, which daily runne to that court. Let the man which feareth God, iudge what a deuouring gulfe this is. A million containeth 1. C. M.

And that made pope Pius the 2. to labour so earnestlie to Lewes the 11. the French king (who as is aforesaide was a great enemie to the house of Burgoin) that hee would (according to his former promise) abolish and vtterly extinct the constitution established before at the Councell of Bitures, by king Charles the 7. his predecessor, called Pragmatica Sanctio, but onlie the ambition of y see, which had no measure, & their auarice which had no end: The storie is this. K. Charles 7. French king, willing to obey & follow the councell of Basill, did summon a Parliament at Bitures: where by the full consent of all the states in France, both spirituall and temporall, a certaine constitution was decreed and published, called Pragmatica Sanctio: wherein was comprehended briefly the pith and effect of all the Canons and decrees concluded in the councell of Basill. The which constitution the said king Charles willed and commanded through all his realme, inuiolably to be obserued and ratified for the honor and increase of Christian religion for euer. This was An. 1438.

Pragmatica Sanctio.

Ex Ioan. Mario Belga. de Schismat. & Concil. lib. cap. 24.

Pope Pius laboureth that Pragmatica Sanctio should be abolished.

It followed, that after the decease of this foresaid Charles the 7. succeeded king Lewes 11. who had promised before, being Dolphine to Pope Pius, y if he euer came to the crowne, the foresaid Sanctio Pragmatica should be abolished. Whereupon Pope Pius hearing him to be crowned, did send into him Iohn Balucus a Cardinall, with his great letters patent, willing him to be mindfull of his promise made. The king either willing, or els pretending a will to performe, and accomplish what he had promised, directed the popes letters patent, with the said Cardinall to the councell of Paris, requiring them to consult vpon the cause.

The Councell of Paris appealeth from the Pope to the generall councell. Fid. supra, pag. 616.

Thus the matter being brought and proposed in the Parliament house, the kings Attorney named Ioannes Romanus, a man well spoken, singularlie witted, and well reasoned, stepping forth, with great eloquence, and no lesse boldnesse, proued the said Sanction to be profitable, holie, and necessary for the wealth of the realme, and in no case to be abolished. Vnto whose sentence the Vniuersitie of Paris adioyning their consent, did appeale from the attempts of the pope to the next generall Councell. The Cardinall vnderstanding this, tooke no little indignation thereat, fretting and fuming, and threatning manie terrible things against them: but all his minatorie words notwithstanding, he returned againe to the king, his purpose not obtained, An. 1438. Ex Ioan. Mario.

Thus the popes purpose in France was disappointed, which also in Germanie had come to the like effect, if Fredericke the Emperor had there done his part likewise toward the Germaines: who at the same time bewailing their miserable estate, went about with humble suite to perswade the Emperour that he should no longer be vnder the subiection of the Popes of Rome, except they had first obtained certain things of them as touching the charter of Appeales, declaring their estate to be far worse (although vnbeleeued) then the Frenchmen or Italians: whose seruants (and especiallie of the Italians) they are worthily to be called, except that their estate were altered. The nobles and communaltie of Germany, did instantly intreate with most waighty reasons and examples, both for the vtilitie and profit of the Empire, to haue the emperours aid and helpe therein, for that which hee was bound vnto them by an othe: alleging also the great dishonour and ignominie in that they alone had not the vse of their owne lawes, declaring how the French nation had not made their sute vnto their king in vain against the exactions of popes: by whom they were defended; which also prouided decrees and ordinances for the libertie of his people, and ceased the same to be obserued: the which thing the Emperour ought to foresee within his Empire, and to prouide for his people and states of his empire, aswell as other kings doe. For that shall come to passe thereby, if that forain nations hauing recourse vnto their kings, being relieued and defended by them from the said exactions, and the Germaines, and states of the Empire flying vnto their Emperour, be by him forsaken or rather betraied and depriued of their owne lawes and decrees: The Emperour being moued, and partly ouercome by their perswasions, promised that hee would prouide no lesse for them, then the king of France had done for the Frenchmen, to make decrees in that behalfe. But the graue authoritie of Aeneas Syluius, as Platina writeth in the historie of Pius the second, brake off the matter, who by his subtile and pestiferous perswasions did so bewitch the emperor, that he contemning the equall, iust, and necessarie requests of his subiects, chose the said Aeneas to be his Ambassadour vnto Calixtus then newlie chosen pope, to sweare vnto him in his name, and to promise the absolute obedience of all Germanie, as the onlie countrie (as they call it) of obedience, neglecting the ordinances and decrees of their countrie, as before he had done vnto Eugenius the 4. being Ambassador for the said Frederick, promising that he & all the Germains would be obedient vnto him from henceforth in all matters, aswell spirituall as temporall.

Thus twice Frederick of Austrich contemned and derided the Germains, & fruitrating them of their natiue decrees and ordinances, brought them vnder subiection and bondage of the Pope: which partlie was the cause that 7. yeares before his death, he caused his son Maximilian, not onlie to be chosen, but also crowned king of Romains, and did allegate him to the administration of the empire, lest after his death (as it came to passe) the empire should be transported into another familie, suspecting the Germains, whom hee had twice contrarie to his lawes made subiect and in bondage vnto the Popes exactions: first before he was crowned in the time of Eugenius the 4. and againe the second time after his coronation, and death of Pope Nicolas the 5. denying their requests. Whereupon Germanie being in this miserable pouertie and grieuous subiection vnder the Popes tyrannie and polling, with teares and sighes lamenting their estate, continued so almost vnto Luthers time, as the histories hereafter following do testifie.

And here ceasing with the storie of Fredericke, we will now proceed to the raigne of Maximilian his sonne, omitting diuers things else incident in the time of this Emperour: as first touching the vnbrotherlie contention and conflicts betweene this Frederick and Albertus his brother, and Sigismundus his vncle, for the dukedome of Austria, after the death of Matthias afore mentioned: Omitting also to speake of the long and cruell warre betweene the Prussians, and Polonians, with the religious sect of them, which were called Tentones fratres sanctæ Mariæ, in the time of Uladislaus: Omitting also the strife and variance for the dukedome of Millain, betweene Fredericus the Emperour, Alfonsus, Carolus duke of Orleance, and Franciscus Sfortia: And how the said Princedome being after giuen to Sfortia, great warres were kindled and long continued betweene Sfortia and the Spiniers, then betweene the Spiniers and Venetians, and after betweene the Frenchmen and the Spiniers. All which tumults and commotions, as not pertinent greatlie to the purpose of this storie, I referre to other writers, where they are to be found more amply discoursed.

Fred. Albertus his brother, and Sigismundus his vncle, striue for the dukedome of Austria.

What betweene Franciscus Sfortia and the Venetians a warre: What betweene Galeatius duke of Millain, and his brother Ludouicus Sforsa, called the Moore: betweene the French king, and the citie of Millaine.

The articles of the faith are to be learned of the holy Scripture.

That all men be ſaued freely, and through meere grace by faith in Chriſt. Free will to be nothing. Onely that we ſhould beleeue the word of God, and not the gloſſe of any man, or fathers. That the word of God is to bee expounded with the collation of one place with another. That prelats haue no authoritie to make lawes, or to expound the ſcriptures by any priuate right, giuen them more then to another. That mens traditions, as faſtings, pardons, feaſts, long prayers, peregrinations and ſuch like, are to be reiected. Extreame vnction and confirmation to be reproued: confeſſion and ſatisfaction to be reprehended. The primacie of the pope alſo he affirmed to be nothing.

Certaine other articles alſo were gathered out of him by his aduerſaries, but in ſuch ſort, that they may ſeeme rather to follow their owne malitious gathering, then any true intelligence of his minde: whereof more is to be vnderſtood in this proceſſe hereafter.

Thus when Weſaliantus was commaunded to appeare, there commeth together, firſt the archbiſhop, the inquiſitor, the doctors of Colein, and the doctors of Heidelberge, with the maiſters of the ſame, & the Rector of the Vniuerſitie of Wentz, the Deane of facultie, Bacheleors of diuinitie, and many other maiſters of the ſame Vniuerſitie, Canons, Doctours, with the Biſhops Chancellor, and his Counſellors, beſides many religious prelates, ſchollers, with a doctour of Franchefort, the ſummer and bedell, which all met together in the great hall of Monkes, for the examination of this Ioan. de Weſalia.

Frier Elton the Inquiſitour, firſt ſitteth in the higheſt place, then after him others according to their degree. In the beginning of the examination, firſt the Inquiſitor beginneth with theſe words: Well reuerend father and honourable doctors, &c. Our reuerend father and prince Elector hath cauſed this preſent conuocation to be called, to heare the examination of M. Ioan de Weſalia, in certaine ſuſpected articles concerning the catholike faith. But ſomething I will ſay before, that may doe him good, and deſire that two or three of them that fauour him, or ſome other, will riſe vp and giue him counſell, to forſake and leaue his errours, to recognize himſelfe, and to aſke pardon; which if he will doe, he ſhall haue pardon: if hee will not, we will proceed againſt him without pardon. And thus Weſaliantus being cited and brought in the midſt betwixt two Nouices, being verie aged, and hauing a ſtaffe in his hand, was ſet before the Inquiſitor. Who beginning to anſwer for himſelfe with a long proteſtation, could not be ſuffered to proſecute his oration, but was cut off & required briefly to make an end, and to tell them in few words whether hee would ſtand to his opinions, or to the determinati on of the Church. To this he anſwered, that he neuer ſpake any thing againſt the determination of the church, but ſaid that hee had written diuers and ſundry treaſiſes, in the which if he had erred, or were found to ſay otherwiſe then well, he was content to reuoke and call back the ſame, and do all things that were requiſite. Then ſaid the Inquiſitor, doe you aſke then pardon? The other anſwered, why ſhould I aſke pardon, when I know no crime or error committed? The Inquiſitour ſaid: well we will tell you to the remembrance thereof, and proceede to the examination.

In the meane time, others called vpon him inſtantlie to aſke pardon. Then ſaid Weſaliantus, I aſke pardon. Notwithſtanding the Inquiſitor proceeded to the examination, reading there two inſtruments, declaring that hee had authoritie from the Apoſtolicke ſea: after the citing of the ſaid Ioan to appeare to his examination. Thirdly hee commanded him vnder paine of diſobedience, in the vertue of the holy Ghoſt, and vnder paine of excommunication of the greater curſe, (from the which no man could abſolue him, but only the pope, or ſ. Auguſtine) neuer after at the point of death, to tell plainly the truth vpon ſuch things as ſhould be demanded of him concerning his faith, without ambages and ſophiſtication of words. And ſo being demanded firſt whether he did beleeue vpon his othe taken, that he was bound to tell the trueth, although it were againſt himſelfe or any other: to this hee anſwered, Scio, that is; I know: Then the Inquiſitour biddeth him ſay, Credo, that is, I beleeue. To the which he anſwered againe, what needs I ſay that I beleeue that thing I know? There the Inquiſitor ſomething ſtirred with the matter, as hote as a toſſe, (as they ſay) cried out with a lead voyce, maiſter Ioannes, maiſter Ioannes, maiſter Joannes, ſay Credo, ſay Credo. Then he anſwered, Credo.

After this, being demanded whether hee had written anie treatiſe, concerning the binding of humaine lawes, to one Nicolas of Boheme, and whether he had written any treatiſe of the Eccleſiaſticall power of indulgences and pardons, and of faſting and other treatiſes: he beleeued that he had ſo written, and had conferred with diuers learned men: Alſo that he had ſent to the biſhops of Mozmes, a certaine treatiſe of faſting.

Many other interrogatories were miniſtred vnto him, whereof ſome were vaine, ſome falſe. Such as were more principall here we will briefly touch, leauing out ſuperfluities.

Being demanded whether he was a fautor of the Boheminans, he ſaid he was not. Alſo being demanded concerning the ſacrament of the holy body and bloud of our Lord, whether he thought Chriſt there to be contained realliè, or only diuinitie, and why: ther he did beleeue in the ſaid ſacrament the ſubſtance of bread there to remaine, or onlie the forme thereof: to this he anſwered, not denying but the body of Chriſt was there realie contained, and alſo with the body of Chriſt, the ſubſtance of bread to remaine.

After this he was demaunded his opinion concerning religious men, as Monkes, Fannes, or Begines, why they here thought them to be bound to the vow of chaſtitie, or to the liue ſping of any other vow, and whether he ſaid to the Friers Minorites any ſuch word to effect: I cannot ſaue you in this your ſtate and order. This he confeſſed, that he had ſaid, how that not your religion ſaueth you, but the grace of God, &c. not denying but they might be ſaued.

Item, being required whether he beleeued or had written, that there is no mortall ſin, but which is expect to be mortall in the canon of the holy Bible: to this he anſwered, that hee did ſo beleeue as he hath written, till he was better informed. Likewiſe being required what he thought of the vicar of Chriſt in earth, he anſwered, that hee beleeued that Chriſt left no vicar in earth: For the confirmation whereof he alledged and ſaid, that Chriſt aſcending vp to heauen, ſaid: Ecce ego vobiſcum ſum, &c. Behold I am with you, &c. In the which words he plainly declared, that hee would ſubſtitute vnder him no vicar here in earth; and ſaid moreouer, if a vicar ſignified any man, which in the abſence of the principall hath to doe the works of the principall, then Chriſt hath no vicar here in earth.

In like maner, concerning indulgences and pardons, ſuch as the church doth vſe to giue, they demaunded of him, whether they had any efficacie, and what hee thought thereof: who anſwered again that he had written a certaine treatiſe of that matter, and what he had written in that treatiſe, hee would perſiſt therein, which was thus: that he beleeued, that the treaſure bore of the merits of Saints could not be diſtributed of the pope to others, becauſe that treaſure is not left here in earth: for ſo it is written in the Apocalyps: Opera enim illorum ſequuntur illos, &c. that is: their works follow them.

Item, that their merits could not be applied to other men, for the ſatisfaction of their paine due vnto them, and therefore that the pope and other prelates cannot diſtribute that treaſure to men.

It was obiected to him moreouer, that in the ſaid his treatiſe, he called pardons and indulgences, Pias fraudes fidelium, that is, holie fraudes and deceits of the faithfull.

Alſo being demanded what hee thought of the hallowing & bleſſing of altars, chalices, veſtiments, ware candels, palms, herbes, holie water, and other diuine things, &c. he anſwered that they had no ſpirituall vertue and power in them to driue away diuels, and that holy water hath no more efficacie then other water not hallowed, as concerning remiſſion of veniall ſins, and driuing away diuels and other effects, which the whole doctors doe attribute to it.

Item, for degrees of mariage forbidden in the ſcriptures, he beleeueth that all chriſtian men vnder deadlie ſinne, are bound vnto the ſame.

Item, that hee beleeueth that God may giue grace to a man hauing the vſe of reaſon, without all motion of free will. Alſo he thinketh that S. Paul in his connerſion, did nothing of his owne free will for his connerſion. He beleeueth moreouer, that God may giue ſuch grace to a man hauing the vſe of reaſon, not doing that which in him is.

Item, he affirmed that nothing is to be beleeued, which is not contained in the canon of the Bible.

Alſo, that the elect are ſaued onely by the grace of God.

Beſides all theſe, moreouer he was charged with the old opinion of the Grecians, which they did holde contrarie to the Romaine church, vnto the time of the councell of Ferraria aboue mentioned, concerning the proceeding of the holy ghoſt.

The Wedneſday next following, three doctours, the Suffragane, Herwicus and Jacobus Sprenger, were ſent vnto him with perſwaſions to exhort him, and when he would not ſtarde to their Canons, whereby they went about to refute his doctrine, he was then demanded of Herwicus, why he would beleeue rather the 4. Euangeliſtes, then the Goſpell of Nicodemus. To whom he anſwered, becauſe he would. Being aſked again why he beleeued the 4. Euangeliſts, he ſaid: becauſe he ſo receiued of his parents. Then being demanded, why he would not beleeue the doctors: becauſe (ſaid he) their doctrine is not canonicall ſcripture. Againe, it was to him obiected, why he would be credited himſelfe, when he preached, ſeeing he would not beleeue the holy doctors? In the booke of Orthuinus Gratius, and in Parlipomena, attoyned to Abbas Vrſpergenſis, we reade theſe words written of this Ioannes de Weſalia: Dempto ſolo articulo de proceſſione ſpiritus ſancti, in alijs victur non ita graui cenſura, &c. That is: except onely the article of the proceeding of the holy Ghoſt, in other articles it ſeemeth that he was not to bee challenged with ſo harpe cenſure, if reſpit and place had beene giuen him, if good counſellors had been about him, if all they which did accuſe came to my hands at the writing hereof, wherein this ſelfe ſame narration is contained, wherein I ſhould not only this to be true, which in John Vale is expreſſed, but alſo found in like manner, another wonder as prodigious as this: where in another place not farre off, is ſtored in the ſame booke, how that about the time of ſaint Dominicke, there was a certaine matron in Spaine, named Lucia, which being taken captiue by the Saracens, hauing her huſband killed, was carried great with child into the Turkiſh land.

Which ſtorie if it be true, then is the popes Canon by this example to be controlled, which permitteth midwiues in time of neceſſitie to baptiſe, ſeeing the bleſſed virgin, playing the part her ſelf of a midwife, durſt not baptiſe this child without a prieſt.

It followeth more in the ſtorie, that by the helpe of the ſaid bleſſed virgin, this Lucia our ladies goſſip, after her purification, was reſtored with her child ſafe to her countrie againe. This booke being in Latine and printed, beareth this title: Roſacea Auguſtiſſimæ Chriſtiferæ Mariæ corona: and in the front it beareth the name of Iodocus Biſſelius a noble man of Aquine. And this by the occaſion of pope Sixtus. Which Sixtus, what a maintainer of blind ſuperſtition he was, partly by that afore ſpoken, partly by the end following it may be ſeene. For we read in certaine writers, that after this pope had vnderſtanding that Hercules Eſtenſis, duke of Ferraria, had ſtoyned peace with the Venetians againſt his will, he was ſo grieued therewith, that for rancour of mind, within fiue daies after, he died: whereunto his Epitaph following, giueth ſufficient record. In the time of which king Edward, this alſo is not to be forgotten, that one Burdet, a marchant dwelling in Cheapeſide, at the ſigne of the crowne, which is the ſigne now of the Flower deluce, merrily ſpeaking to his ſonne, ſaid that he would make him inheritor of the crowne, meaning indeed his ſigne houſe. For the which words, when king Edward cauſed to be miſconſtrued, and interpreted, as though he had ment the croiune of the Realme, within leſſe ſpace then foure houres, he was apprehended, iudged, drawne, and quartered in Cheapeſide.

King Edward the 5.

K. Edward 5.

His king Edward left behinde him by his wife Elizabeth two ſonnes, Edward & Richard, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Cicile. Which two ſonnes Edward and Richard, forſomuch as they were vnder age and not ripe to gouerne, a conſultation was called among the peeres to debate whether the foreſaid yong prince and king, ſhould be vnder the gouernment of his mother, or elſe that Richard Duke of Glocester, brother brother to king Edward the fourth, & vncle to the child, should be gouernour of the king, and protector of the realme, there hath been and is euidēt danger, the words whereof rather then in the true meaning, is vnlyked out of Salomon: Væ regno cuius Rex puer est. Wilt thou find leaue herein to thyself in a gloss, & would add: this, and say: Væ illi puero, qui sui regni Rex non est? Vnto that child, which is a king in a kingdome vntrayne and vnbridled. There was the same season among other noble peeres of the realme, the duke of Buckingham, a man of great authority, who had maried king Edwards wines sister. Because the duke being so neere allied to the king, had become vnlikely (as he thought) of the king entreated, framing by him no aduancement nor any great friendship thereto, according to his expectation, took part therefore with Richard duke of Gloucester, both against the queene and her kindred, to make the forsaid duke, the chiefe gouernour and protector. The which thing being brought to passe, by the aide, assistance and working of the duke of Buckingham, the queen rosse sanctuarie with her yonger sonne: the elder brother, which was the king, remained in the custodie of the duke of Gloucester his vncle. Who being now in a good towardnesse to obtaine that which he long looked for, sought all the meanes, and some compassed ỹ matter, by false colour of disfembled words, by periurie, and labour of friends, namely of the duke of Buckingham, and the cardinall archbishop of Canterburie, that the other brother also should be committed to his credit. Thus the ambitious protector and vnnaturall vncle, hauing the possession of his two nephewes, and innocent babes, thought himselfe almost vp the staire where he would climbe: although he could not walke in such mists and clouds, but this deuised purposes began to be espied: which caused him more covertly to goe about to remoue from him all suspition and to blind the peoples eies. But before hee could accomplish his execrable enterprise, some there were, whom he thought first must be rid out of the way, as namely the lord Hastings, and the lord Stanley, who as they were sitting together in counsell within the Tower, the protector (the matter being so appointed before, suddenly rushed in among them, and after a few words there commoned, hee suddenly hasted out againe: his mind beliue, being full of mischiefe and furie was not quiet. Who within the space of an houre, returned againe into the chamber with a fierce countenance and a frowning looke, and so there set him downe in his place. Then the lords were in great maruell and muse at the meaning hereof: then he out of a cankered hart, thus began to bray, asking them, What are they worthie to haue, which go about to imagine the destruction of him being so neere to the kings blod, and protector of the realme? At the which question, as the other lords sate musing, the lord Hastings, because he had been more familiar with him, thus answered, that they were worthie of punishment, whatsoeuer they were. Which when the other lords also had affirmed: that is quoth the Protector) yonder sorceresse, my brothers wife, meaning the queene and other with her: adding moreouer, and saying: that sorcerelle and other of her counsell, as Shores wife, with her affinitie, haue by their witchcraft, thus wasted my bodie, and therewith threwed forth his left arme a wearish withered thing, as it was neuer otherwise, as was well knowne.

This Shores wife had been before a concubine to king Edward, and afterward was kept by the same lord Hastings. Moreouer, here is to be noted, that by the consent of the said lord Hastings, the councll Protector had deuised about the same time, the banded of the queene, innocently to be beheaded at Pomfret, of more despite and hatred. Wherefore, this punishment not vnderserued, by the iust hand of God, fell vpon the said lord Hastings.

It followeth then more in the storie, that when the lord Hastings had heard these false accusations of the tyrant, which he knew to be vntrue: certainly (my lord) said he, if they haue so done, they be worthie of hainous punishment. Why quoth the Protector, doest thou serue me with, and with and? Tell that, they haue so done, and that I will make good on thy bodie traitor: and therewith gaining a great rap on the head (for a token or watchword) one cried treason without, and forthwith the chamber was full of harnessed men. The Protector then approching to the lord Hastings, arrested him as a traytor. Another let fle at the lord Stanley: who to auoid the blow thrunke vnder the table: or else his head had been cleft all vnder: notwithstanding he receiued such a wound, that the blod ran about his eares. There were in that counsell the same time the archbishop of Yorke, and doctor Morton bishop of Elie (by whose preconcrement afterward king Henrie the seuenth was sent for into England, and he made archbishop after that of Canturburie) these with the lord Stanley diuerslie were beklowed in diuers chambers. The lord Hastings was commanded to speed and shrine him apace, for before dinner the Protector sware by Saint Paul that he should die: and so incontinently, without further indgement, his head was stricken off, by whose counsell the queenes kindred were at the same time and day, beheaded at Pomfret.

After this tyrannous murder accomplished, the mischieuous protector aspiring still to the crolone, to set his deuices forward, first through gifts and faire promises, did subordinate doctor Shaw a famous preacher then in London, at Paules crosse to insinuate to the people, that neither king Edward with his sonnes, nor the duke of Clarence were lawfullie begotten, nor the very children of the duke of Yorke, but begotten vnlawfullie by other persons in adulterie on the duches their mother, and that hee alone was the true and onelie lawfull heire of the duke of Yorke. Moreouer, to declare and to signifie to the audience, that king Edward was neuer lawfullie married to the Quéene, but his wife before was dame Elizabeth Lucie, and so the two children of king Edward to bee base and bastards, and therefore the title of the crowne moft rightly to pertaine to the lord protector. Thus this false flatterer, and loud lying preacher, to serue the protectours humour, framed not moft impudently to abuse that holy place, that reuerend auditorie, the sacred word of God, taking for his theame: Adulteræ plantationes non dabunt radices altas, &c. which he moft impiouslie did applie against the innocent children and right heires of the realme. Whereupon such grudge and disdaine of the people with wrongfully wonder followed him, that for shame of the people crying out of him, in few daies after he pined away.

When this sermon would take no effect with the people, the protector vnmercifully browned in ambition, rested not thus, but within few daies after, excited the duke of Buckingham first to breake the matter in councel talke, to the maior and certaine of the heades of the citie, picked out for the purpose: that done, to come to the Guildhall, to moue the people by all flattering and lying persuasions to the same, which thamelesse Shaw before had preached at Pauls crosse. Which the duke with all diligence and helpes of eloquence, being a man both learned and well spoken, endeuoured to accomplish, making to the people a long and artificiall oration, suppoling no lesse, but that the people allured by his crafte insinuations would crie, king Richard, king Richard. But there was no king Richard in their mouthes, lesse in their hearts. Whereupon the duke looking to the lord maior, and asking what this silence meant, contrarie to the promise of the one, and the expectation of the other: it was then answered of the maior, that the people peraduenture well vnderstood him not: wherefore the duke reiterating his narration in other words, declared againe that hee had done before. Likewise the third time he repeated his oration againe and againe. Then the commons which before stood mute, being now in a maze, seeing this importunitie, began to mutter softly among themselues, but yet no king Richard could sound in their lips, saue onely that in the neather end of the hall, certaine of the dukes seruants with one Nashfield, and other belonging to the protector, thrusting into the hall among the preasse, began suddenlie at mens backes to crie king Richard, king Richard, throwing vp their cappes; whereat the citizens turning backe their heads, marueiled not a little, but said nothing.

The Duke and the Lord Maior with that side, taking this for sufficient testimonie, incontinent came blowing for hall to the protector, then lying at Baynards castle. Where the matter being made before, was now so contrived, that forsooth, humble petition was made in the name of the whole commons and that with these sundrie fates, to the humble and simple protector, that he, although it was vtterlie against his will to take it: yet would of his humilitie stoope so low, as to receiue the heauie kingdome of England vpon his shoulders. At this their tender requeft and suit of the lords and commons made (ye muft know how) the milde Duke seeing no other remedie, was contented at length to yeeld, although sore against his will (ye muft so imagine) and to submit himselfe so low, as of a protector, to be made king: not much herein vnlike to our prelats in the popith church, who when they haue before twelt compounded for the popes Bals, yet muft they for manor sake make courtesie, and thrice denie that for which they so long before haue gaped, and so sweetlie haue paied for.

wards daughter and him, whereby the two houses of Yorke and Lancaster were vnited together.

After the kingdome of England was thus allotted to king Richard the vsurper, as in manner aboue remembred, he taried not long for his coronation, which was solemnized the twentith next ensuing, the sixth day of Iulie.

The triumph and solemnitie of his vsurped coronation being finished, and all things to the same appertaining, this vniquiet tyrant yet could not thinke himselfe safe, so long as yong Edward the right king and his brother, were aliue: wherefore the next enterprise which he did set vpon was this, how to rid those innocent babes out of the way, that he might reigne king alone.

In the meane time while all this rustling was in hand, what dread and sorrow the tender hearts of these fatherlesse and friendlesse children were in, what little ioy of themselues, what small ioy of life they had, it is not so hard as doloious, for tender hearts to vnderstand. As the yonger brother lingred in thought and heauinesse: so the prince which was 12. yeere old, was so out of heart and so fraught with feare that hee neuer tied his points, nor yoong day, till the traitorous impietie of their cruell vncle had deliuered them of their wretchednesse, which was not long in dispatching. For after king Richard their vncle, first attempting to compasse his diuelish deuice by Robert Brakenburie constable of the tower, and could not win him to lack a cruell fact (to die therefore) then hee got one Iames Tyrell, ioyning with him I. Dighton, & Miles Forrell, to perpetrate this hainous murther. Which Dighton and Forrell about midnight entring into their chamber, so bewrapped and intangled them amongst the clothes, keeping downe the fetherbed and pillowes hard vnto their mouthes, that within a while, they smothered and stifled them pitiouslie in their bed.

And thus ended these two yong princes their liues, through the wretched cruelties of these forenamed tormentors, who for their detestable and bloodie murther committed, escaped not long vnpunished by the iuft hand of God. For first Miles Forrest, at saint Martins le grand, by excedent miserable rotted away: Iohn Dighton lurcht at Calis long after so diseased: and hated, that he was pointed at of all men, and here died in great miserie. Sir Iames Tyrell was beheaded at Tower hill for treason. Also king Richard himselfe within a yeere and a halfe after, was slaine in the field hacked and hewed of his enemies handes, torne and tugged like a cur dog.

Furthermore, the said iuftice of Gods hand let not the duke of Buckingham escape free: which was a great maintainer and setter vp of this butcherlie vsurper: for leste then within a yeare after so God wrought, that he was himselfe beheaded for treason by the said king, vpon the so iuftlie before had aduanced and set vp.

In the same catalogue and order of these wicked doers afore recited, we haue also to comprehend two other, as well worthie of memorial, as the best or rather as the worst. The name of the one was doctor Shaw aboue rehearsed: the other doctor Pinkie, prouincial of the Austen friers: both famous preachers, and both doctors in Diuinitie, both of more learning then vertue (saith the storie) of more fame then conning, and yet of more learning then truth. Shaw made a sermon in praise of the Protector, before his coronation. Pinkie preached after his coronation. Both were so full of ted eruditerie, that no god cares could abide them. Pinkie in his sermon so lolt his voice, that he was faine to leane off and caine downe in the middeft. Doctor Shaw by his sermon lost his honestie, and some after his life, for verie shame of the world, so that he neuer durft after that, shew his face againe. But as for the frier, he was so far past shame, that the losse thereof did little touch him.

Mention was made a little before of doctor Morton bishop of Elie, by whose meanes the deuice was first brocched, for the coniovning of the two houses of Yorke and Lancaster together. This deuice was first broken to the Duke of Buckingham, which some after cost him his life. But that bishop more craftie to saue himselfe, incontinent fled into Britaine. Notwithstanding, the deuice once being brocched was so plausible, and took such effect, that in effage was sent ouer ỹ sea to Henrie earle of Richmond, by his mother and by the quéne, mother to the ladie Elizabeth, that if he would make his returne, and promise to marrie with the said ladie Elizabeth king Edwards daughter, he should be receiued. To make a longer discourse of this matter, which is sufficiently set forth by sir Thomas More so ornately, it needeth not.

Briefely (to contract that in a small compaffe of words, which was not so small a thing in doing) after that the Earle Henrie, with such other banished men, as fled out of England at the taking of the duke of Buckingham, had perfect intelligence by his mother and by the quéne, and other friends moe out of England, how the case of the realme stood, and how it was here purposed by his friends, that is, that he should with all conuenient speed, haste his returne ouer into England, promising to marrie with ladie Elizabeth: he with all diligence as time and preparation would serue, aduanced forward his iourney, being well helped and furnished by Francis duke of Britaine, and so shipped his men. Albeit his first voiage sped not, for that the winds turning contrary; by force of weather his ships were dispersed, and he repulsed back into France againe. His second voiage was more prosperous. Who taking the seas at Harflet, in the month of August, anno 1485. with accompanied onlie with two thousand men, and a small number of ships, arrived at Milford Hauen in Wales, and first came to Dale, then to Harford west, where he was ioyfullie receiued, and also by the conuning in of Rinold Walter and the Pembroke men, was in power encreased. From thence he remoued by Cardigan to Shrewsbury, and then to Newport, and so to Stafford, from thence to Lichfield, his armie still more and more augmented. Like as a great flood by comming in of many small riuers, gathereth more abundance of waters: so to this earles diuers noble captaines and men of power adioyned themselues, as Richard Griffith, Iohn Morgan, Rice ap Thomas, then sir George Talbot, with the young earle of Shrewesburie his ward, sir William Stanley, Sir Thomas Burchier, and sir Walter Hungerford, knights. At last the said earle hearing of the kings comming, conducted his whole armie to Tamworth.

King Richard first hearing of the arrival of the earle Henrie in the parts of Wales after such a tender sort, did quite little, or no regard vnto it. But after, vnderstanding that he was come to Lichfield, without resistance: or incumbrance, he was sore mawed, and exceedingly take on, casting and deuising out against them which had so deceiued him, and in al post speed, sent for Iohn duke of Northfolke, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thom. earle of Surrey, with other his friends of speciall trust. Robert Brakenburie alsolieutenant of the tower was sent for, with sir Thomas Burchier, and sir Walter Hungerford, with certaine other knights and esquires, of whom he partly mistrusted, or had some suspitious telouste. Thus king Richard, after moll forceable manner hath well fortified and accompanied, leauing nothing vndone that diligence could require, for forward towards his enemies. The earle by this time was come to Tamworth, to whom secretly in the meeting resorted sir John Sauage, sir Bryan Sanford, sir Edmund Digby, and many other, forsaking the part of king Richard, whom all good men hated, as hee no otherwise deserued. The king hauing perfect knowledge the earle to bee encamped at Tamworth, embattelled himselfe in a place neere to a village called Bosworth, not farre from Leicester, appointing there to encounter with his aduersaries. Here the matter lay in great doubt and suspense concerning the lord Stanley (which was the earles father in law and had married his mother) to what part he would encline. For although his hart went (no doubt) with the earle, and had secret conference with him the night before, yet because of his sonne and heire George lord Strange, being then in the hands of king Richard, left the king should attempt any prejudicall thing against him, durst not be seene openly to goe that way, where in heart he fauoured, and therefore closely kept himselfe betweene both, till the push came that his help might serue at a pinch.

The number of the earles part exceeded not to the one half of the side of king Richard. When the time and the place was appointed, where the two battailes should encounter and ioyne together, sore stripes and great blowes were giuen on both sides, and many slaine. Finumber and multitude might go vpon the successe of battell, king Richard had double to the earle. But God (as he, not man, that giueth victorie, by what meanes it seemeth to his diuine prouidence best. In what order and by what occasion this field was won and lost, the certaine intelligence we haue not certainely expressed, but onely by the historie of Polydore Virgil, whom sir Thomas More doth follow word for word. In the which historie it doth appeare, that as these two armies were comping together, K. Richard, vnderstanding by his espials where the Earle of Richmond was, and how he was but slenderly accompanied, and being him to approch more neere vnto him, he rather caried with courage, then ruled with reason, set spurres to the horse, and ranging out of the compasse of his rankes, prested toward the earle, setting vpon him so sharpely, that first he killed sir William Brandon, the earles standard bearer, father to the lord Charles Brandon D. of Suffolk, then after ouerthrew sir John Cheinie, thinking likewise to oppresse the earle. But as the Lord by his secret prouidence disposeth the euent of all things, as the earle with his men about him being ouermatched, began to despaire of victorie, suddenly and opportunely came sir William Stanley with three thousand well appointed able men, whereby king Richards men were driuen backe, and hee himselfe cruelly fighting in the thicke of his enemies, was there slaine, and brought to his confusion and death, which he worthily deserued.

In the meane time the Earle of Oxford, who had the guiding of the forward, discomfited the forces of king Richards host, and put them to flight, in which chase many were slaine, of noble men especially about other. Iohn duke of Northfolke, Lord Ferrers, sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Robert Brakenburie lieutenant of the Tower, &c. Lord Thomas Hatward earle of Surrey, there submitted himselfe, & although he was not receiued at first to grace, but long remained in the

This king Richard had but one sonne, who shortly after the cruell murder of king Edwards sonnes, was taken with sicknesse and died. The wife of the said king Richard (whether by poison or by sickenesse) died also a little before the fielde of Bosworth: after whose decease, the sonne of Polydore and of sir Thomas More affirmeth; that he intended himselfe to marie the ladie Elisabeth his owne brothers daughter, and so to purchase the earle of Richmond.

Moreouer, as touching the lord Stanley, thus reporteth the storie, that king Richard being in Bosworth field, sent for the lord Stanley by a pursuant, to aduance forward with his companie, and comming his presence: otherwise he sware by Christs passion, that he would strike off his sonnes head before his owne. The lord Stanley sent word againe, that if he did, he had more sonnes aliue. Whereupon the king immediatly commanded the lord Strange to be beheaded: which was the very time when both the armies were within sight, and were ready to ioyne together. Therefore the kings counsellors pondering the same and the case perswaded the king, that it was now time to fight, and not to doe execution, aduising him to delay the matter till the battell were ended. And so (as God would) king Richard breaking his oth, or rather keeping his oth, for he himselfe was slaine before dinner, the lord Strange was committed to be kept prisoner within the kings tent: who then after the victorie gotten, was sought out and brought to his ioyfull father. And thus haue ye the tragicall life and end of this wretched king Richard.

During the Erle of Richmond, after heartie thankes giuen to almightie God, for his glorious victorie obteined, proceeded to the towne of Leicester, where was brought to him by the lord Strange, the crowne, and put on the Saracens head.

In the meane time the dead corps of king Richard was shamefully carried to the towne of Leicester, being naked and despoiled to the skin, and being trussed behind a pursenant of armes, was carried like a hog or a dog, hauing his head and armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and the legges on the other side, all sprinkled with mire and blood. And thus ended the vnhaped reigne of king Richard, who reigned two yeares, and two moneths. Ex Polydo. & Th. Moro.

King Henry the vij.

King Henrie 7.

WHen king Henrie, by the prouidence of God had obteined this triumphant victorie and diademe of the realme, first sending for Edward Plantagenet earle of Warwike, sonne to George Duke of Clarence, and committing him to safe custody within the tower, from Leicester remoued to London, and not long after, according to his oth and promise made before, espoused to him the yong ladie Elisabeth, heire of the house of Yorke: whereby both the houses of Yorke and Lancaster were coniоyned together, to the no little reioycing of all Englishe hearts, and no lesse quiet vnto the realme, which was, an. 1485. This king reigned 23. yeares, and eight moneths, and being a Prince of great policie, iustice and temperance, kept his realme in good tolerable rule and order. And here interrupting a little the course of our English matters, we will now (the Lord willing) enter the storie aboue promised, of Maximilian the emperour, and in matters of the empire, especially such as pertaine to the Church.

✲ Maximilian the Emperour.

Anno 1486

IN the yere of our Lord 1486. Fredericus waxing aged and partly also mistrusting the hearts of the Germains, who had complained before of their grieuances, and could not be heard; and therefore misdoubting that his house after his decease, should haue the lesse fauour among them, for that cause in his liftime did associate his sonne Maximilian to be ioyned emperour with him: with whom he reigned the space of 7. yeres till the death of the said Fredericke his father, who departed an. 1494. after he had reigned ouer the Empire 53. yeares, lacking onely but three yeres of the raigne of Augustus Cæsar, vnder whom was the birth of our Lord and Sauiour Christ.

Maximilian. Fredericus Imperator.

The reigne and death of Frederick the emperour.

Anno 1494

This Maximilian, as he was a valiant Emperour, prudent and singularly learned: so was his reigne intangled in many vnquiet and difficill wars: first in the lower Countries of Flanders and Brabant, where the said Maximilian was taken captiue, but shortly after rescued and deliuered againe by his father, an. 1487. It was signified before how this Maximilian by the aduice of the Burgundians, had to wife Mary the onely daughter of Charles duke of Burgundie afore mentioned, by whom he had two children, Philip and Margaret, an. 1477. Which Mary not long after, about the yere of our Lord, 1482. by a fall from her horse, fell into an ague, and departed. Other wars many mo, the same Maximilian also atchieued, both in France, in Italy, in Hungarie, and diuers besides.

Maximilian marieth with the daughter of Charles duke of Burgundie. Their issue were two children, Philip and Margaret.

The learning of Maximilian commended.

So happie was the education of this Emperour in good letters, so expert he was in tongues and sciences, but especially such was his dexteritie and promptnesse in the Latin stile, that he imitating the example of Iulius Cæsar, did write and comprehend in Latin histories, his owne acts and feates done, and that in such sort, that when he had giuen a certaine taste of his historie, to one Bircmerus a learned man, asking his iudgement how his warlike stile of Latin did like him, the said Pircmerus did affirme and report of him to Iohn Caron (the witnesse and writer of this storie) that he did neuer see nor read in any Germane storie, a thing more cleanly (and that in such a rude soile, as the rude of Germanie. Moreouer, as he was learned himselfe, so was he a singular patrone and aduancer of learned students, as may well appeare by the erecting and setting vp the Vniuersitie of Wittenberge. By this Emperour many in those dayes were excited to the embracing as well of other liberall artes, as also namely to the searching out of old antiquities of histories, whereby diuers were then by him first occasioned in Germanie, to set their minds and to exercise their diligence, in collecting and explicating matters pertaining to the knowledge of historie, as well of ancient as also of latter times, as namely Cuspinianus, Nauclerus, Conradus Peutingerus, Manlius, and other.

Maximilian writer of his owne deeds.

Ex Io. Caricon.

Maximilian first ordainer of the vniuersitie of Wittenberg.

Hereupon it began right well to appeare, what great benefite was broched to the world, by the arte and facultie of Printing, as is before mentioned. Though the meanes of which printing the church and comon wealth of Christ began now to be replenished with learned men, as both may appeare by this Emperour, being so indued himselfe with such excellent knowledge of good letters, and also by diuers other famous and worthie wits, which began now in this age exceedingly to encrease and multiplie; as Baptista Mantuanus, Ang. Politianus, Hermolaus Barbarus, Picus Mirandula, and Francicus his cosine, Rodol. Agricola; Pontanus, Philippus, Beroaldus, Marsilius, Ficinus, Volateranus, Georgius Valla, with infinite other.

Learned men began to grow in Christendome.

Among whom is also to be numbred Weselus Groningensis, otherwise named Basilius, who was not long after Ioan de Wesalia aboue recited, both much about one time, and both great friends together. This Weselus died the yere of our Lord, 1490. After that Ioannes doctor de Wesalia aforesaid was condemned, this Weselus being familiar with him, thought that the Inquisitour would come and examine him also, as he himselfe in a certaine Epistle doth write. He was so notable and worthie a man, that of the people he was called Lux mundi: That is: the light of the world.

Dort. Weselus Groningensis.

Wesel⁹ called Lux mundi.

Concerning his doctrine, first he reprehended the opinion of the papists, as touching repentance, which they diuided into three parts, of the which three parts, satisfaction and confession he did disallow. Likewise Purgatorie and supererogation of workes and pardons he did dispraise, both at Rome and at Paris. He spake against the popes indulgences, by the occasion whereof diuers of the popes court perswaded by him, began to speake more freely against the same matter, then hee himselfe had done.

The doctrine of Weselus Groningensis.

The abuses of masses and praying for the dead he disallowed: and likewise the supremacie of the pope he vtterly reiected (as appeareth in a booke of his, De sacramento penitentiæ) denying vtterly that any supreme head or gouernour ought to be in the world ouer all other: affirming also and saying many times, that the pope had no authoritie to doe any thing by commandement but by truth: that is, so farre as truth goeth with him, so farre his sentence to stand: neither that he ought to preuaile by commanding, but onely by teaching, so as euery true Christian bishop may preuaile ouer an other. Also in some place in his writings he denieth not, but that popes and their spirituall Prelates, proceeding against Christs doctrine, be plaine Antichrists. Such as were infirme and not able to performe the bond of chastitie taken vpon them, he said they might well breake their vow.

Ex lib. D. Wesels De sacramento penitentiæ.

The popes supremacy vnder ten against.

Also the said Weselus witnesseth, that the forefathers which were before Albert and Th. did resist and withstand the popes indulgences, calling them in their writings plaine Idolatrie, meere fraud and errour: adding moreouer, that vnlesse the sacrifice of some good Diuines had not withstood these pardons and indulgences of the pope; innumerable errors had ouerflowne the Church.

Amongst these workes of Weselus, there is a certaine Epistle of one written to him, in which the author of the Epistle confesseth, that in his time there was a certaine learned man at Paris called master Thomas de Curselis a Deane: who being in the councell of Basill, where as diuers began to aduance the power of the pope to farre, declared and affirmed, to be said to him of Christ: Quicquid ligaueris super terram erit ligatum & in cœlo, &c. Etnon, quicquid dixeris esse ligatum. That is: Whatsoeuer thou shalt bind vpon earth shall be bound in heauen, but not, Whatsoeuer thou saiest to bee bound. As who should say, the pope cannot nor doth not binde therefore, because he so saith, except truth and righteousnesse goe also with him: then he doth so bind in deed. There is a certaine booke of this man amongst diuers others, which he intituleth, De subditis & superioribus, in the which hee disputeth greatly against the pope & his prelates: affirming that the pope vnlesse his faith and doctrine be sound, ought not to be obeyed. He affirmeth also that the pope may erre, and when he erreth, men ought to be loosed in heauen: but what soeuer is loosed in verie deed in earth, that is also loosed indeed in heauen. Against cloches in the Church. The precepts of the pope and prelates how they bind.

men ought by all manner of meanes to resist him. Item, that great and superfluous riches in the clergie doe not profite, but hurt the church. That the Pope doth wickedly distribute the rents of the church, and the church it selfe, to vnworthie ministers by Simony, for his owne profite and gaine, thereby it may appeare that he neither careth for God, nor the health of the church. Item, that the precepts and commandements of the pope and prelats be no otherwise but as the councels and precepts of Phylitions, binding no further then they are found to be wholesome and standing with the truth of the word. Item, that the pope can command no man vnder paine of deadly sinne, except God command him before. He saith that the keyes of the pope and of the prelats be not such, wherewith they open the kingdome of heauen, but rather that it, as the Pharisies did. Concerning bolwes, he disputeth that such as be foolish and impossible, ought to be broken: that the hearers ought to discerne and iudge of the doctrine of their prelates, and not to receiue euery thing that they say, without due examination.

The Popes keyes. Cloues. Doctrine not to be receiued without examination.

Excommunication.

He sheweth moreouer that the sentence of excommunication is of more force, proceeding from a true, godly, honest, simple and learned man, then from the pope; as in the councell of Constance, Bernard was more esteemed then Eugenius. Also if the pope with his prelats, gourme and rule naughtilie, that the inferiors, be they neuer so base, ought to resist him.

Writing moreouer of two popes, Pius the second and Sixtus the fourth, he saith, that Pius the second did vsurpe vnto himselfe all the kingdomes of the whole world, and that Sixtus the pope did suspende with all manner of oths in causes temporall, not only with such oths as haue bin already, but also to ly all such as shall be made hereafter: which was nothing else but to giue libertie and licence for men to forsweare themselues and deceiue one another.

This Weselus being a Physitian borne, and now aged in yeres, vpon a certaine time, when a yong man called D. Ioannes Ostendorpius, came to him, said these words: Well my child, thou shalt liue to that day, when thou shalt see the doctrine of these new and contentious diuines, as Thomas and Bonauenture, with others of the same sort, shall be vtterly reiected and exploded from all true christian Diuines. And this lykely Ostendorpius then being young, heard Weselus to preache, he reputed himselfe to Honiomagus, which wrote this storie, an. 1520. and heard it of the mouth of the said Weselus, an. 1490. Partly 18.

Ex Nouiomago. A prophecie of Weselus. This Ostendorpius was a man well learned and a canon of the minister of Liberche.

Philippus Melanthon writing of the life of Rodulphus Agricola, saith: that Iohannus Groningensis, an ancient and a godly man, reported that when as he was young, he was oftentimes present at the sermons of Rodulphus and Weselus, wherein they many times lamented the darkenesse of the church, and reprehended the abuses of the masse: and of the single life of Priests. Item, that they disputed of sentimes of the righteousnesse of faith, why Saint Paul so oftentimes did inculcate, that men be iustified by faith and not by workes. The same Iohannus also reported, that they did openly reiect and dispraise the opinion of Monkes, which say that men be iustified by their workes. Item, concerning mens traditions their opinion was, that all such were deceiued, whosoeuer attributed vnto those traditions any opinion of Gods worship, or that they could not be broken. And thus much for the storie of doctor Weselianus and Weselus.

Here it appeareth that this Rodulphus Agricola was of good iudgement though he fell afterward hereof him in a Friers weed. Rodol. Agricola. Weselus lamenteth the darkenesse of the Church.

By this it may be seene and noted, how by the grace of God and gift of printing, first came forth learning: by learning came light to iudge and discerne the errors of the pope from the truth of Gods word, as partly by these abouesaid may appeare, partly by other that follow after (by the grace of Christ) shall better be seene.

About the very same time and season, when as the Gospell began thus to branch and spring in Germanie: the host of Christs Church began also to muster and to multiplie likewise here in England, as by these histories here consequent may appeare. For not long after the death of this Weselus in the yere of our Lord 1494. and in the ninth yere of the raigne of king Henrie the 7. the 28. of Aprill, was burned a very old woman named Ioane Boughton widow, and mother to the Ladie Poung, which Ladie was also suspected to be of that opinion which her mother was. But my mother was of soure fortie yeres of age or more, and held eight of Wicklifs opinions (which opinions my author doth not shew) for the which she was burnt in Smithfield the day aboue said. My author saith, she was a disciple of Wicklifs, whom he accounted for a saint, and held so fast and firmely eight of his ten opinions, that all the doctours of London could not turne her from one of them: and when it was told her that she should be burnt for her obstinate and false beleefe, she set nothing by their menacing words, but defied them; for she said she was so beloued of God, and his holy Angels, that she passed not for the fire, and in the midst thereof she cried to God to take her soule into his holy hands. The night following that she was burnt, the most part of her ashes were had away of such as had a loue vnto the doctrine that she died for.

Shortly after the martyrdome of this godly aged mother, in the yere of our Lord, 1497. and the 17. of Ianuarie, being Sunday, two men, the one called Rich. Hilderale, and the other Iames Sturdie, bare fagots before the procession of Paules, and after stood before the preacher in the time of his Sermon. And vpon the Sunday following, stode other two men at Paules Crosse all the Sermon time: the one garnished with painted and written papers, the other hauing a Fagot on his necke. After that in Lent season vpon Passion Sunday, one Hugh Glouer bare a Faget before the procession of Paules, & after with the Faget stod before the preacher all the Sermon while at Pauls Crosse. And on the Sunday next following seuerall men stod, and did there open penance at Pauls as is aforesaid, in the sermon time many of their bookes were burnt before them at the Crosse.

Maximilian Emperour. Sauonarola. Florence. Pope Alexander. Charles the French king.

Prophecie of Fr. Sauonarola against Italy.

Savonarola cited to appeare before the Pope. The occasion of Savonarola his sermons. He refuseth, and would not come before the Pope.

Now forasmuch as the said Hierome would not leave off preaching, he was commanded to appeare before the Pope, to give account of his new learning (for so then they called the truth of the Gospell) but by meanes of the manifold perils, he made his excuse that he could not come. Then was he againe forbidden by the Pope to preach, and his learning pronounced and condemned as pernicious, false and seditious.

Savonarola preacheth contrary to the Popes commandement.

This Hieronymus, as a man worldly wise, foreseeing the great perils and dangers that might come unto him, for feare left off preaching. But when as the people, which sore hungred and longed for Gods word, were instant upon him that hee would preach againe, he began againe to preach, in the yeare of our Lord 1496. in the citie of Florence; and albeit that many counselled him that he should not so doe without the Popes commandement, yet did he not regard it, but went forward freely of his owne good will. When as the pope and his chaunc lings heard newes of this, they were greevously incensed and inflamed against him, and now againe cursed him, as an obstinate and shrecked heretike. But for all that, Hieronymus proceeded in teaching and instructing the people, saying that men ought not to regard such curses, which are against the true doctrine and the common profite, whereby the people should be learned and amended, Christs kingdome enlarged, and the kingdome of the divell utterly overthrowen.

In all his preaching he desired to teach no other thing then the onely pure and simple Word of God, making often protestation that all men should certifie him if they had heard him teach or preach any thing contrary thereunto, for upon his own conscience he knew not that he had taught any thing but the pure word of God. What his doctrine was all men may easily judge by his bookes that he hath written.

Where you wish 2. other letters to be put to this. The commentaries of Hierom Savonarola upon the Psalme beginning: In te domine speravi.

After this, in the yeere of our Lord 1498. hee was taken and brought out of Saint Marks cloyster, and two other Friers with him, named Dominicke and Silvester, which favoured his learning, and was carried into prison, where as hee wrote a godly meditation upon that most comfortable litle and one Psalme, In te Domine speravi, non confundar in aeternum, sed in justitia tua libera me. Wherein he doth excellently declare and set forth, the continuall strife betweene the flesh and the spirit.

Articles objected against Hierome and the two Friers.

After this the popes Legates came to Florence, and called forth these three good men, threatning them marcellously, but they continued still constant. Then came the chiefe counsellers of the citie, with the Popes Commissioners, which had gathered out certaine articles against these men, whereupon they were condemned to death: the tenour of which Articles hereafter ensue.

1 The first article was as touching our free justification through faith in Christ.

2 That the communion ought to be ministred under both kindes.

3 That the indulgences and pardons of the pope, were of no effect.

4 For preaching against the filthy and wicked living of the Cardinals and spiritualitie.

5 For denying the popes supremacie.

6 Also that he had affirmed, that the keyes were not given unto Peter alone, but unto the whole Church.

7 Also, that the Pope did neither follow the life nor doctrine of Christ, for that he did attribute more to his owne pardons and traditions, then to Christs merites, and therefore he was Antichrist.

8 Also, that the popes excommunications are not to be feared, and that he which doth feare or flie them, is excommunicate of God.

9 Item, that auricular confession, is not necessarie.

10 Item, that he had moved the citizens to uproze & sedition.

11 Item, that hee had neglected and contemned the Popes Citation.

12 Item, that he had shamefully spoken against, and slandered the Pope.

13 Item, that he had taken Christ to witnesse of his naughtinesse and heresie.

14 Also, that Italy must be clensed through Gods scourge, for the manifold wickednesse of the princes and clergie.

These and such other like articles, were laid unto them and read before them. Then they demaunded of the said Hieronme and his companions, whether they would recant and give over their opinions. Whereunto they answered, that through Gods helpe, they would stedfastly continue in the manifest truth, and not depart from the same. Then were they degraded one after another, by the bishop of Vasion, and so delivered over to the secular rulers of Florence, with straight commandement to carre them forth, and handle them as obstinate and stifnecked heretikes.

Hierome with his 2. companions put hanged and burnt for his doctrine. God glorified.

Thus was the worthie witnesse of Christ, with the other two aforesaid, first hanged up openly in the market place, and afterward burnt to ashes, and the ashes gathered up, and cast into the river of Arnin, the foure and twentie day of May, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand, foure hundred ninety and nine. Ex Catal. testium Illyrici.

The Martyrdome of Hierome and his two companions.

The prophesies of Hierom Savonarola.

This man foreshewed many things to come, as the destruction of Florence and Rome, and the turning of the Church: which three things, have happened in these times within our remembrance. Also he foreshewed that the Turkes and Popes in the latter dayes, should be converted unto Christ. He also declared that one should passe the Alpes into Italy, like unto Cyrus, which should subuert and destroy all Italy. Thereupon Johannes Franciscus Picus, earle of Mirandula, called him a holy Prophet, and defended him by his writings against the Pope. Many other learned men also, defend the innocencie of the said Savonarola. Marsilius Ficinus also in a certaine Epistle doth attribute unto him the spirit of prophecie, greatly commending and praysing him. In the like manner Philippus Cominеus a French Historiographer, which had conference with him, witnesseth that he was a holy man, and full of the spirit of prophecie, forasmuch as he had foreshewed unto him so many things, which in event had proved true.

Ex Ioan. Franc. cif. Mirandula. Ex Marsilio Ficino.

Ex Phil. Comineo.

There were besides these, many other, not to be passed over or forgotten: as Philip Nozice an Irishman, professour at Orford, who albeit he was not burned, yet (as it is said) hee was long time vexed and troubled by the religious rout. But would to God, that such as have occupied themselues in writting of histories, and have so diligently committed unto memorie all other things done in forreine common wealthes, had bestowed the like diligence and labour, in noting and writting those things, which pertaine unto the affaires of the Church: whereby the posteritie might have had fuller and more perfect understanding and knowledge of them.

This Savonarola above mentioned, suffered under Pope Alexander the first, of which pope more leisure and opportunitie shall serue hereafter (Christ willing) to entreat, after that we shall first make a little digression to entreat of certaine cases and complaints of the Germaines, incident in the meane time, which as they are not to be overpast in silence, so can they have no place nor time more convenient to be inserted. What complaints of the Germanies were made and moued unto the Emperour Fredericke against the popes suppressions and exactions, mention was made before pag. 665. where also was declared, how the said Germaines at that time, were twice put backe and forsaken of the Emperour: whereby they continued in the same yoke and bondage, untill the time of Luther. Therefore it commeth now to hand, and we thinke it also good here briefly to declare, how the said Germaines, in the time of Maximilian the Emperour; renuing their complaints againe, delivered unto the Emperour, ten principall grievances, whereby the Germaines have bene long time oppressed: shewing also the remedies against the same, with certaine advertisements unto the Emperours maiestie, how he might withstand and resist the popes subtilities and crafts: The order and tenour whereof here ensueth.

The complaints of the Germans against the popes grievances remised.

The ten greevances of the Germaines.

Ten grievances complained of by the Germains.

1 That the Bishops of Rome, successours one unto another, doe not thinke themselues bound to observe & keepe the Bulles, covenants, priuiledges, and letters, granted by their predecessours, without all derogation: but by often dispensation, suspention and revocation, euen at the instance of euery euery vile person, they doe gainesay and withstand the same.

The people rotten by the Popes Bulle.

2. That the elections of prelates are of tentimes put backe.

3. That the elections of Presidentships are withstood, which the chapter houses of many churches have obtained with great cost and expence, as the Church of Spire and Hasell do well know: whose bull, touching the election of their president, is made structrate, he being yet alive which graunted the same.

4. That benefices, and the greatest of ecclesiastical dignities, are referred for Cardinalls and head notaries.

5. That expectative graces, called voisons, are granted without number, and many of tentimes unto one man: whereupon continuall contentions do rise, and much money is spent, both that which is laid out for the Bulles of those voisons which never take effect, and also that which is consumed in going to law. Whereupon this pestilence is risen, Whosoever will get a voisson from Rome, must have C. or CC. peices of gold laid up in his cheft, for the obtaining of the same, which hee shall have neede of, to prosecute the law withall.

6. That Annates or yearely reuenewes, are exacted without delay or mercy, euen of the bishops lately dead, and of tentimes more exacted then ought to be, through new offices and new servants, as by the examples of the churches of Spentz and Strausburgh, may be seene.

7. That the rule of the churches are given at Rome unto those that are not worthy, which were more fit to keepe and feede Mules, then to have the rule and gouernance of men.

8. That new indulgences and pardons, with the suspension and revocation of the old, are graunted to gather and scrape money together.

9. That tenthes are exacted under the pretence of making warre against the Turke: when as no expedition doth follow thereupon.

10 That the cause which might be determined in Germany, there as there are both learned and iust iudges, are indistinctly caried unto the Court of Rome; which thing S. Bernard, writing to Pope Eugenius, seemeth wonderfully to reprove.

℣ Here ensueth the remedy against the said greevances.

Remedies against the foresaid greevances.

If it shall seeme good unto the Emperour maiestie, let it be declared unto the bishop of Rome, how greevous and intolerable a thing it is unto the Germaines, to suffer continually to great charges and greevances, to pay so great Annates for the confirmation of the Bishops and Archbishops, and especially in such Bishoprickes, where as the Annates by succesle of time, are enhanced, and in many (as it is said) doubled.

The Archbishop Bulle of Mentz what it coseth.

For the Archbishops see of Mentz (as it is said) sometime paid only 10000. florines: which summe, when as one which was chosen there, refused to give, and so continued euen unto his death, he which was afterward elect, being desirous of confirmation, fearing to withstand the Apostolicke se, offered the old summe of 10000. florines: But notwithstanding, he could not get his confirmation, except he would pay the other 10000. which his predecessour before him had not paid.

By this meanes he was compelled to pay 20000. florines, which being inrolled in the regifter of the chamber, hath bene exacted of euery Archbishop since, untill these our dayes: and not only 20000. but also 25000. for their new offices, and new seruants. At last, the summe drew to 27000. florines, which James the Archbishop of Mentz was compelled to pay, as his Commissary did report. So by this meanes, in a little time there was seuen times 25000. florines paid out of the Archbishoprickes of Mentz unto Rome, for the confirmation of the Archbishop. And when this Archbishop James had kept the Archbishoprickes scarce foure yeares, the Lord Uriel was elect after him, who was compelled to pay at the least 24000. or 25000. florines. Whereof a part he bestowed of Pergamits: but to satisfy and pay them againe, he was forced to exact a subsidy of his poore subiects and husbandmen, whereof some haue not yet satisfied and paid the tribute for the Bishops palle; so that by this meanes, our people are not onely tormented and brought to extreme pouerty, but also are moued unto rebellion to seeke their liberty by what meanes soeuer they may, greevously murmuring against the cruelty of the Clergy.

The Popes Bulle dearely bought.

The Pope also should be admonished, how that through diuers and sundry warres and battels, the lands of Germany lie desolate and waste, and through many mortalities, the number of men is diminished, so that for the scarcenes of husbandmen, the fields for the most part, lie untild, the tolles are by diuers meanes diminished, the mines consumed, and the profites daily decay, whereby the Archbishops and Bishops should pay their Annates unto the Apostolicke see, besides their other necessary and honest charges: insomuch that not without suit cause, James the Archbishop of Mentz being euen at the point of death, said, that he did not so much sorrow for his owne death, as for that his poore subiects should be againe forced to pay a grieuous exaction for the Palle. Whereunto he added, that he did not so much sorrow for his death, as for that his poore subiects should be againe forced to pay a grieuous exaction for the Palle. Whereunto let the high Bishop, as a godly father and louer of his children, and a faithfull and prudent pastor, deale more favourably with his children the Germaines, lest that persecution happen to rise against the Priests of Christ, and that men following the example of the Bohemians, do swarue from the church of Rome.

At the least, let him be more favourable, as often, as any Archbishop or Bishop happeth to rule his Church but a few yeares: as it happed to the Bishops of Bamberge, whereof three died within few yeares. The like also might happen by other bishoprickes, whereof (as Aeneas Sylvius witnesseth) there are in Germany to the number of 50. besides Abbats, whereof a great number are confirmed at Rome.

And admit that in Germany there were greater profits and reuenewes rising of the ground, mines and tolles: notwithstanding the Emperour and the other Princes, should lacke treasure and munition of warre against their enemies, and specially the infidels, and to preserue Germany in peace & quietnesse, and to minister iustice unto euery man: for which purpose, the Councell of the chamber being most holily instituted and furnished with great cost and charges, doth this seruice. Besides that, the Emperour hath need of treasure, to suppresse the rebelles in the Empire, to banish and drive away theues and murtherers, whereof a great number are not ashamed to spoyle churches onely, and to robe them of their goods, but also to assaile the Clergy themselues. Finally, our nation and country of Germany, hath needs of great riches and treasure, not onely for the repayring of Churches and Monasteries, but also for Hospitals for children that are laid out in the streets, for widowes, for women with child, for orphans, for the marriage of the daughters of poore men, that they be not debloured, for such as have needs and necessitie, for the old and weak, for the sicke and the sore, whereof (the more is the sorrow) Germany is fully replenished and filled.

Aduertisements vnto the Emperours Maiesty.

The Emperor aduertised of the subtile practises of the Pope, and his pitifull prelates.

Let the Emperours Maiestie foresee and prouide, that the begging Friers do not preach against his Maiestie, which are want to complaine gladly unto the Apostolicke se, fearing to lose their priuiledges, which I would to God, were as well grounded upon Christ, as they are upon profite. Let the Emperours Maiestie also beware, that the Pope do not give commandement unto the Electours, to proceede to the election of a new king of Romains, as he did against Frederick the second, when as the Lantgraue of Thurin, and William Earle of Holland, were elect by the commandement of the Pope. Let the Emperours Maiestie also feare and take heed of all the prelats of the Churches, and especially of the Presidents, which by their oth are bound to aduertise the Pope. Let the Emperours Maiestie also feare and beware that the Pope do not take away from his subiects their obedience, and prouoke the people to bearing upon him, to make inuasion into the Emperours dominions and Archduchie of Austrich: which those men, under colour of shewing obedience unto the Popes commandement, be ready to do.

The Popes practise to winne Peters Church in Rome.

Let the Emperours maiesty also take heed of the Apostolicke censures, from which the Pope will in no case relente. Finally, let the Emperours maiesty diligently foresee and take heed, that the Pope do not perswade the people with most subtile arguments, contrary to the pragmaticall sanction, creeping himselfe, and getting the good will of the simple, alleadging that with great costs and charges, he will repaire the Church of S. Peter in Rome, & build in certaine places against the Turks, and recouer againe the lands and patrimony pertaining unto the church of S. Peter, as he is bound by his office. Therefore, let your maiesty diligently foresee and deliberat, how though your most wise and discreet counsel, sh[illegible] shall require, you will answere to those subtelties of the Pope.

¶ A certaine godly exhortation vnto the Emperours Maiesty.

A supplication or exhortation to Maximilian Emperour, for reformation of the Church.

You Maiesty can do nothing better, nothing more acceptable, or more worthy eternall remembrance, then to moderate the great exactions and oppressions of the Germains: to take away all occasion from the laitie, to persecute the Clergy: also to take away the benefices out of the hands of courtisans, which cause either preach, comfort, nor counsell any man (of which benefices, as Aeneas Sylvius writeth, some are equall to the Bishoprickes of Italy) to encrease Gods honour and worship: and so to bridle the auarice and ungodlines of those courtisans, whereby your maiesty may the better prouide for the children of many noble and famous men and Citizens in Germany; which being brought up from their youth in the Universities, learning both the Scriptures and other humane letters, may without vnquiet berations, and most tumptuous charges and contentions, aspire to the Ecclesiastical promotions, who by their counsell and prayers, may be helps unto the whole Church: For there is no small occasion, why the realme of France should so flourish, having so many notable learned men in it. If the Emperour would abolish this impietie, and release Germany unto their auncient libertie, which is now oppressed with grievous tributes, and with his children the Germaines, lest that persecution happen to rise against the Priests of Christ, and that men follo-would make way for learned and honest men unto Eccles-ecclesiall promotions: then might he truly and perpetually be called of all men, and in all places, the restorer of Germany to his auncient liberte, and the father of his countrey, and should obtaine no lesse glory thereby vnto himselfe, and profite vnto Germany, then if he had by force of armes, subdued any prouince vnto them: And so shall Germany render no lesse thanks vnto the said Maximilian, then vnto all the rest, which hauing translated the Empire from the Grecians vnto Germany, haue raigned many yeares before.

Hereafter ensueth the copy of a certaine letter of the Emperour Maximilian, giuen out in maner of a decree or commandement, against certaine abuses of the Clergy. Whereunto we haue also annexed the answere of Iacobus Seslestadiensis, vnto the Emperours letters, wherein he seemeth also to haue fought advice for the remedy of the like abuses, which we thought good here not to be omitted.

An Edict of Maximilian the Emperour.

WE according to the example of our dearely beloued father Fredericke Emperour of Rome, reuerencing the chiefe Pastour of the Church, and all the Clergy, haue suffered no smal reuenewes of the Ecclesiasticall dignities, to be caried out of our dominion by the Prelats and Clergy that are absent, whose faults committed by humaine frailtie, with Constantine our predecessor, we haue not disdained to hide and couer. But for so much as through our liberalitie, the decay of Gods honour is risen, it is our part to foresee (which are elect vnto the Empire, without any delert) that amongst all other affaires of peace and warre, the Churches do not decay, Religion quaile not, or Gods true worship be not diminished: which we haue manifestly experimented, and daily do perceiue by the infatiable couetousnesse of some, which are neuer satisfied in getting of benefices: through which absence (being but resident only vpon one) Gods honour & worship is diminished, houses decay, churches decrease, the Ecclesiasticall liberte is hurt, learning and monuments are lost and destroied, hospitalitie and almes diminished, and by their vnsatiable greedinesse, such of the Clergie as for their learning and vertue were worthie of Benefices, and their wisedome, profitable in common wealthes, are hindered and put backe. Wherefore according to the office and duety of our estate, for the loue of the encrease of Gods honour, we exhort & require, that no man from henceforth hauing any Canonshipe or Vicarage in one City of our Empire, shall occupie or possesse a prebend in an other Church of the same City, except he giue ouer the first within 2 yeares space vnto some person fit and profitable for the Church: neither that he do by vniust quarels, vexe or trouble any man in getting of benefices, neither that any man doe falsely faine himselfe to haue beene of the Emperors household, which hath not been comprehended within the league and agreement made by the Princes, neither that any man attempt to take away the patronages from any lay man, or aggrauate the small prebends of Curates of Churches, with pensions, neither that they do vse in getting of benefices and Bulles, any fraude, deceite, false instruments, corrupt witnesses, and cloaked Simonie, neither that any man presume to obtaine any regresse, or other thing cōtrary to the sacred Canons, right, honestly, equity and reason, vpon paine of the most greeuous offence of treason: the which we will, that not only they, going so contrary to God and all honesty: but also all their fauourers, which do helpe, counsell, harbour or giue them any thing, all their messengers and writers, proctours, sureties, and other their friends, shall incurre, and receiue condigne punishment for so great offence and contempt of our commandement. From Oenopont, &c.

No man to haue two Benefices or Prebends at once.

☞ Here ensueth the copy of a letter writen vnto the Emperour Maximilian.

¶ To our most victorious Lord Maximilian the Emperour, Iacobus Seslestadiensis, most humble commendations.

MOst victorious Emperour, when I had read your Maiesties Epistle, and receiued instructions of your Secretary, I prepared my selfe with al my whole endeuour, to satisfie your Maiesties desire: For euen from my youth hitherto, I haue applied all my care & study, first for the honour of your Maiesty, & consequently for the amplifying of the Germaine nation, and sacred Romaine Empire. Albeit I know my selfe farre vnable to satisfie your desire and purpose, and there are many which can fulfill this matter much better, which haue greater learning and experience of these common matters. There be also with other Princes, and in the Senates of common wealthes, many excellent learned men, which can exornate and beautifie Germanie, and perswade to reduce all the Clergy vnto a christian discipline, & to an vnitie and peace of the vniuersall church. Wherin not onely your Maiestie, but also your predecessors, as Charles the great, and his sonne Ludouicus Pius, the Othoes, Conrades, Frederickes, and Henrickes, and last of all, Sigismundus, haue with all labour and diligence trauelled, being stirred thereunto, vndoubtedly through the zeale and charity which they bare vnto almighty God, and thankefulnes vnto Christ, for his benefites which he hath bestowed vpon mankinde, and specially for the benefit of his most bitter passion. For Christ became not poore for vs, that we should liue in all riot and wantonnes vpon his patrimony, and shew forth our ambition and couetousnesse: neither did he suffer hunger that we should glut vp our selues: or suffered labors, chastity, and grieuous torments, that we should liue in idlenesse, wantonnes, and all kind of voluptuousnesse. Neither they which were contributers, and benefactours to Churches, induing the ministers thereof with their temporall riches, had any such respect herein, that the Clergy should liue onely in idlenesse, hauing all things at their will, without labour. Surely there was another cause why that they in times past did empouerish themselues and theirs to endow the Church: verily that they might the better attend vnto diuine seruice, without care of want of liuing (which they might easily get & gather out of the fields, woods, meawes, and waters) and to the intent that they should liberally giue almes vnto the poore Christians, Widdows, Orphans, aged and sicke persons. For in the institutions of the canonicall profession, which we suppose was written by the commandement of Ludouicus Pius the Emperour, and allowed by the counsell of the Bishops, thus it is read: The goods of the Church (as it is alledged by the fathers, and contained in the chapters before) are the vowes of the faithfull, and patrimony of the poore. For the faithfull, through the feruentnesse of their faith, and loue of Christ, being inflamed, hauing an earnest desire of that heauenly kingdome, haue enriched the holy Church with their owne goods, that thereby the fouldiers of Christ might be nourished, the Church adorned, the poore refreshed, and captiues according to the opportunitie of time redeemed. Wherefore such as haue the administration of those goods, ought diligently to be looked vpon, that they do not conuert them vnto their owne proper vse, but rather, according to their substance and possibility, they do not neglect them in whom Christ is fed and clothed. Prosper is also of the same minde, affirming, that holy men did not challenge the church goods to their owne vse, as their owne proper goods, but as things commended vnto the poore, to be diuided amongst them: For that is to contemne that which a man possesseth, not to possesse a thing for himselfe, but for others, neither to couet the church goods with couetousnesse, to haue them himselfe, but to take them with a godly zeale to help other. That which the church hath, is common to all them which haue nothing, neither ought they to giue any thing of that vnto them (saith he) which haue of their owne: for to giue vnto them which haue enough, is but to cast things away. Ex Illyrico.

To returne now to the order of Popes where we left before, speaking of Innocentius the 8. After the said Innocentius, next succeded Pope Alexander the 6. In which Alexander, among other horrible things, this is one to be noted, that when Gemes (Peucerus named him Demes) brother to Baiazetes the great Turke, was committed by the Rhodians to the safe custody, first of Pope Innocent, then of Alexander the 6. for whose keeping, the Pope receiued euery yeare 40000. crownes; yet notwithstanding, when Pope Alexander afterward was compelled to send the said Gemes to Charles the eight the French king for a pledge, because the French king should not pursue the great Turkes fauour, by sending his brother Gemes to him to be slaine, he being hired by the Turke, caused the said Gemes to be poysoned, who in his iourney going toward the French king, died at Terracina. Ex Hieronymo Mario.

Pope Alexander 6.

The Pope poysoned Gemes the Turkes brother, being committed to his custody.

Ex Paul. Iouio lib. 3.

Ex Peucero lib. 5.

Ex Hieronym. Mario.

Moreouer, in the said Hieronymus Marius it appeareth, that this Alexander taking displeasure with the foresaid Charles the French king, about the winning of Naples, sent to Baiazetes the Turke, to fight against the foresaid Charles. Ex eodem.

The Pope setteth the great Turke against the French King.

Ex Sab. Marcellico. lib. 2.

Munsterus lib. 4. Cosmog. declaring the foresaid historie of Gemes, touching otherwise, first calleth him Zizymus, and saith that he was first committed by the Rhodians to the French king. And when as Ioannes Hunniades afore mentioned, did labour to the French king to haue him, thinking by that meanes to obtaine a noble victory against the Turke, as it was not vnlike: this Alexander the Pope, thoughe his fraudulent flattery, got him of the French king, into his owne hands, by whose meanes the said Gemes afterward was poysoned, as is in maner before expressed.

Cosmograph.

Vnto these poysoned acts of the Pope, let vs also adioine his malicious wickednes, with like fury exercised vpon Antonius Pancinellus, which Pancinellus being a man of excellent learning, because he wrote an eloquent oration against his wicked maners and filthy life, with other lines, he therefore commanded both his hands and his tongue to be cut off, playing much like with him, as Antonius the tyrant once did with M. Cicero, for writing against his horrible life: at length, as one poyson requiteth another, this poysoned Pope, as he was sitting with his Cardinals, and other rich Senatours of Rome at dinner, his seruants vnwares brought to him a wrong bottle, wherewith he was poysoned, and his Cardinals about him.

Pancinellus writing against the wickednes of the Pope, lost his hands and tongue.

Poyson requiteth with poyson.

The high Angel of the popes palace throwne downe.

Pope Pius 3. Pope Iulius 2.

In the time of this Pope Alexander, also it happened (which is not to be pretermitted) how that the Angell which stoode in the high top of the Popes Church, was beaten downe with a terrible thunder: which thing seemed then to declare the ruine and fall of the Popedome. After this pope, next succeeded Pius the third, about the yeare of our Lord 1503. After whom, came next Iulius the second, a man so farre passing all other in iniquitie, that Vlricius, and such other of his owne friends writing of him, are compelled to say of him, Marti illum quam Christo deditiorem fuisse: that is, that he was more geuen to warre and battaile, then to Christ. Concerning the madnesse of this man, this is most certainly knowne, that at what time he was going to warre, he cast the keyes of S. Peter into the riuer of Tibris, saying, that for as much as the keyes of Peter would not serue him to his purpose, he would take himselfe to the sword of Paul. Whereupon Philip Melanthon, amongst many other writing vpon the same, maketh this Epigramme.

Cùm contra Gallos bellum papa Iulius esset
Gesturus, sicut fama vetusta docet:
Ingentes Martis turmas contraxit, & vrbem
Egressus sanas edidit ore minas.
Iratúsque sacras claues in flumina iecit
Tibridis, hic vbi pons vbi iungit aquas.
Inde manu strictum vagina diruit ensem,
Exclam. insque truci talia voce refert:
Hic gladius Pauli nos nunc defendet ab hoste,
Quandoquidem clauis nil iuuat ista Petri.

Whereupon also Gilbert Ducherius maketh this Epigramme.

In Gallum, vt famaest, bellum gesturus acerbum,
Armat, an educit Iulius vrbe manum:
Accinctus gladio, claues in Tibridis amnem
Projcit, & fauus talia verba facit:
Quum Petri nihil efficiant ad praelia claues,
Auxilio Pauli forsitan ensis erit.

¶ The sense of these Epigrammes in English is this.

VVhen Iulius Pope against the French determined to make warre:
As fame reports, he gathered vp great troupes of men from farre.
And to the bridge of Tibur then,
marching as he were wood:
His holy keyes he tooke, and cast them downe into the floud.
And afterward into his hand,
he tooke a naked sword:
And shaking it, brake forth into this fierce and warlike word:
This sword of Paul (quoth he) shall now defend vs from our foe:
Since that this key of Peter doth nothing auaile thereto.

Of this Iulius it is certainly reported, that partly with his warres, partly with his curssings, within the space of 7. yeares, as good as 200000. Christians were destroyed. First he besieged Rauenna against the Venetians, then Seruia, Imola, Faurentia, Forolimium, Senonia, and other cities, which he gate out of Princes handes, not without much bloodshed. The Chronicles of Iohn Sleidan maketh mention, that when this Iulius was made Pope, he take an oath, promising to haue a councell within two yeares: but when he had no leasure thereunto, being occupied with his warres in Italy among the Venetians, and with the French king, and in Ferraria, and in other countreyes; nine of his Cardinals departing from him, came to Pisiaine, and there appointed a Councell at the City of Pise, amongst whom, the chiefe were Bernardus, Trucetus, Galeinius Prenestinus, Franciscus Constantinus, with diuers others: amongst whom also were adioyned the Procuratours of Bartholian the Emperour, & of Charles the French king. So the Councell was appointed the yeare of our Lord 1511. to begin in the Kalends of September. The cause why they did so call this Councell, was thus alledged, because the Pope had so broken his oth, and all this while he gaue no hope to haue any Councell, and also because there were diuers other crimes, whereupon they had to accuse him. Their purpose was to remoue him out of his seat, the which he had procured through bribes and ambition. Iulius hearing this, grueth out contrary commandement vnder great paine, no man to obey them, and calleth himselfe another Councell against the next yeare, to be begun the 19. day of Aprill. The French king vnderstanding Pope Iulius to ioyne with the Venetians, and so to take their part against him, conuented a Councell at Thurin in the moneth of September; in the which Councell these questions were proposed.

The popes lawe giueth leaue to kill all that be accused of him.

The warres and bloodshed of Pope Iulius 2.

A Councell called to depose Pope Iulius.

The Pope perswaded.

VVhether it was lawfull for the Pope to moue warre against any Prince without cause.

VVhether any Prince in defending himselfe, might inuade his aduersary: and deny his obedience.

Vnto the which questions it was answered, that neither the bishop ought to inuade, and also that it was lawfull for the King to defende himselfe. Moreouer, that the Pragmaticall sanction was to be obserued throwe the realme of France: Neither that any vniust excommunications ought to be feared, if they were found to be vniust. After this, the King sent vnto Iulius the answere of his Councell, requiring him either to agree to peace, or to appoint a generall Councell some other where, where this matter might be more fully decided. Iulius would neither of both these, but forthwith accursed Charles the French king, with all his kingdome. At the length, at Rauenna, in a great warre, he was ouercome by the French king, and at last, after much slaughter and great bloudshed, and mortall warre, this Pope died in the yeare of our Lord 1512. the 21. day of Februarie.

The Pragmaticall sanction established, mentioned before, page 605. Vniust excommunication to be feared.

If it were not that I feare to ouerlay this our volume with heapes of forreine historics, which haue professed chiefely to intreate of Acts and Monuments here done at home: I would adioine after these Popes aboue rehearsed, some discourse also of the Turkes story: of their rising, and cruell persecution of the saints of God, to the great auntoiance and perill of Christendome: yet notwithstanding, certaine causes there be, which necessarily require the knowledge of their order and doings, and of their wicked proceedings, their cruell tyranny, and bloudy victories, the ruine & subuersion of so many Christian Churches, with the horrible murders and captiuitie of infinite Christians, to be made plaine and manifest, as well to this our countrey of England, as also to other nations.

The Turkes doing requisite to be knowne of Christians.

Firſt, for the better explayning of the prophecies of the new Testament, as in S. Pauls epistle to the Thessalonians, and also in the Reuelation of S. John. Which Scriptures as therwhile, without the opening of these historics, can not so perfectly be vnderstood. Of the which Scriptures, we minde hereafter (Christ graunting) orderly, as the course of matter shall leade vs, to make rehearsall.

The first cause.

Another cause is, that we may learne thereby either with the publique Church, to lament with our brethren such a great defection and decay of Christian faith, through these wicked Turkes: or els may feare therby our owne danger.

The second cause.

The third cause, that we map ponder more deply with our selues, the scourge of God for our sinnes, and corrupt doctrine, which in the sequele hereof, may euidently map appeare to our eyes, for our better admonition.

The third cause.

Fourthly, the consideration of this horrible persecution of the Turkes, rising chiefely by our discord and dissention among our selues, may reduce vs againe from our domesticall warres, in killing and burning one of an other, to ioyne together in christian patience and concord.

The fourth cause.

Fifthly, but chiefely, these great victories of the Turkes, and vnprosperous speede of our men fighting against them, may admonish y teach vs, following the example of the old Israelites, how to seeke for greater strength to encounter with these enemies of Christ, then hitherto we haue done. First we must consider, that the wide power of Sathan the prince of this world, goeth with the Turkes. Which to resist, no strength of mans arme is sufficient, but only the name, spirit, and power of our Lord Jesus the Sonne of God, going with vs in our battels; as among the old Israelites, the Arke of Gods ordinance and promise went with them also, fighting against the enemies of God. For so are we taught in Scripture, that we christian men haue no strength, but in Christ only. Whether we warre against the diuell, or against the Turke, it is true that the Scripture saith: Sine me nihil potestis facere. I. without me you can do nothing. Otherwise there is no puissance to stand against the diuell or to conquer the world, Nisi fides nostra: that is, our faith onely: to which all the promises of God (touching saluation) be annexed, beyond which promises we must not go, for the word must be our rule. He that presumeth beyond the promises in the word expressed, goeth not, but wandereth he can not tell whither. Neither must we appoint God, how to saue the world, but must take that way which he hath appointed. Let vs not set our God to schole, nor comprehend his holy spirit within our scalles. He that made vs without our counsell, did also redeeme vs as pleased him. If he be mercifull, let vs be thankefull. And if his mercies surmount our capacity, let vs therefore not resist, but search his word, and thereunto apply our will: which if we will do, all our contentions will come be at a point. Let vs therefore search the will of our God in his word, and if he will his saluation to stand fast to all nations, why do we make merchandise therof? The haue graciously offered his waters to vs, without money or money worth, let vs not hedge in the plenteous springs of his grace giuen vs.

Ammunition to fight against the Turke.

Christian faith necessary to be ioyned with outward force against the Turke.

Gratis vnum datur filij, gratiâ redimamini. Esay 52.

Omnes sitientes venite ad aquas, emite absque argento & cum commutationes. Esay 55.

And finally, if God haue determined his owne Sonne only to stand alone, let not vs presume to admire with his maiesty any of our trumpery. He'p bringeth S. George or S. Denyse as patrons to the field to fight against the Turke, leaueth Reformation of religion requisite before we fight with the Turkes.

Faith getteth victory.

The fifth cause.

Earnest invocation necessary in the Church of Christ.

2. Thess. 2.

The place of S. Paul reprooued.

2. Thess. 2. speaking of the defection to come.

The number of the Apocalyps, cap. 13. expounded.

Another place vpon Apoc. 16. Effecimus, angelus effudit phialam suam, &c.

The time of Mahomet the false prophet expounded.

The number of Christ (no doubt) at home. Now how we haue fought these many yeares against the Turke, though stories keepe silence, yet the successe declareth. We fight against a persecutour, being no lesse persecutours our selues. We warre against a bloody tyrant, and our handes be as full of blood as his. We killed Christs people with the sword, and we burne them with fire. He obseruing the workes of the law, sarketh his iustice by the same, the like also do we. But neither he nor we seeke our iustification as we should, that is, by faith onely in the Sonne of God.

And what marueil then, if our doctrine being as corrupt almost as his, and our conuersation worse, if Christ fight not with us, fighting against the Turke? The Turke hath preuailed so mightily, not because Christ is weake, but because that Christians be wicked, and their doctrine impure. Our temples with Images, our hartes with idolatry are polluted: Our liues stinke before God for adultery, being restrained from lawfull matrimony. The name of God is in our mouthes, but his feare is not in our hartes. We warre against the Turke with our workes, Masses, traditions and ceremonies: but we fight not against him with Christ, and with the power of his glory, which if we did, the field were wonne.

Wherefore briefely to conclude, saying my iudgement in this behalfe, what I suppose: this hope I haue, and do beleeue, that when the Church of Christ with the Sacramentes thereof, shall be so reformed, that Christ alone shall be receiued to be our mediatour, all other religions, merites, traditions, images, patrons and aduocates set apart, the sword of the Christians, with the strength of Christ, shall ouer hand quith the Turkes pride and furie. But of this more largely in the processe of this storie.

The first and last cause, why I thinke the knowledge of the Turkes history requisite to be considered, is this: because that many there be, which for that they be farther from the Turkes, and thinke therefore themselues to be out of danger, take little care and study, what happeneth to their other brethren. Wherefore to the intent to excite their zeale and prayer to almighty God, in this so lamentable ruine of Christs Church, I thought it requisite by order of history, to giue this our nation also something to vnderstand, what hath bene done in other nations by these cruell Turkes, and what detriment hath bene and is like more to happen by them to the Church of Christ, except we make our earnest inuocation to almighty God, in the name of his Sonne, to stop the course of the diuell by these Turkes, and to stay this defection of Christians falling daily vnto them, and to reduce them againe to his faith which are fallen from him. Which the Lord Iesus of his grace grant with speede. Amen.

Before we enter into this story of the Turkes and Saracens, first let vs call to remembrance the prophecy and forewarning of S. Paul writing to the Thessalonians, in his 2. Epistle, in these words: We not moued nor troubled in our mindes, either by preaching, or by writing, or by letter from vs, as though the day of the Lord were at hand: for the Lord will not come except there come a defection first, and the wicked person be reuealed, &c. Of this defection, sundrie minders there be, of sundry expositours: some thinking this defection to meane a falling away from the Empire of Rome: some from the obedience of the Pope. But as Saint Paul little passed vpon the outward glory of the Romane Empire: so lesse he passed vpon the pretie obedience of the Pope. But Saint Paul meant by this defection, the reading of these Turkish stories, and the miserable falling away of these Churches by him before planted, will soone declare.

Another mystery there is in the Reuelation, Apocalyp. 13. where the number of the beast is counted 666. Whereby may seeme by all euidences, to be signified the first origine and springing of these beastly Saracens, as by sequele hereof may appeare by the first rising of this diuelish sect of Mahumet.

Moreouer, an other place there is, cap. 16. Apocal. where we reade, that by powring out of the viall of Gods wrath, of the first Angell, the great flood Euphrates was dried vp, to let in the kings of the East: the opening of which prophecy, may also more euidently appeare, in consider ing the order and maner of the comming of these Turkes into Europe.

Some also apply to the Turkes certaine Prophecies of Daniel, Ezechiel, and other places of the old Testament: which here I omit, for so much as the Prophecies of the old Testament, if they be taken in their proper and natiue sense, after my iudgement, do extend no further, then to the death of our Sauiour, and to the end of the Iewes kingdome. Albeit herein I do not preiudicate to any mans opinion, but that euery man may abound in his owne sense.

As touching the yeare and time when this pestiferous sect of Mahumet first began, hitherto doe not fully consent: Some affirming that it began, An. 622. and in the 10. yeare of Heraclius the Emperour of Constantinople: in which minde is Ioannes Lucilius. As Munsterus counteth, it was in the yeare of our Lord 622. Martin Luther and Iohn Carion referre it to the 18. yeare of the raigne of Heraclius, which is the yeare of our Lord 630. farre disagree, which numbreth the name of the Beast, with three Greeke letters χξϛ, which Greeke letters after the supputation of the Grecians make the number of 666.

In this all writers agree, that this damnable Mahumet was borne in the countrey of Arabia, bordering on the East part of Iewry. His father was a Syrian, or a Persian, his mother was an Ismaelite; which Ismaelites being a people of Arabia were called then Agarens: Which terme Mahumet afterward turned to the name of Saracens. Of this wretched Mahumet mention was made before, page 112. where we shewed, how he making himselfe the highest Prophet of all other, yet denieth not Christ to be an holie Prophet, and next to him, and Moses also to be an other. Moreouer, he denieth not Marie the mother of Christ to be a virgin, and to haue conceiued Christ by the holie Ghost: asserning further that Christ in his owne person was not crucified, but another called Iudas for him. He greatlie commendeth also Iohn the sonne of Zacharie for a virgin: when he himselfe permitteth a man to haue foure wiues, and as manie concubines as he is able to finde: and saith, that whereas Christ & other Prophets had the gift giuen them to worke miracles, he was sent by force of sword, to compell men to his religion.

Sultanes first called.

The first rising of the Turkes.

The prodigious banities, lies and blasphemies contained in his law called Alchoran, are rather to be laught at then recited.

It is thought, that Sergius a Nestorian was a great doer with Mahumet, in contruing of this lying Alchoran, and so it doth well appeare by the scope and patience thereof, which especiallie tendeth to this end, to take the diuinitie from the person of Christ, whom he graunteth notwithstanding to be a most holie man, and also that he is receiued vp to God, and shall come againe to kill Antichrist, &c.

Pahumets Alchoran mingled with diuers lawes.

Moreouer, this ridiculous Alchoran is so blanched and pondered with so diuers mixtures of the Christians, Iewes, and the Gentiles lawes, giuing such libertie to all wantonnesse of flesh, setting vp circumcision, abstaining from swines flesh, and Iudaicall lotions, and so much hardeth vpon Father Abraham, that it is supposed of some, this filthie Alchoran not to be lesse in the sight of Mahumet, but that certaine Iewes had some handling also in this matter, and put it out after his death: and so seemeth first to take his rise about the number of yeares limited in the Apocalyps, as is afore said, where thus it is written: He that hath intelligence, let him count the number of the Beast: for it is the number of a man, and his number is six hundred, six score and six.

The diuersion of the Christians do make the Turke so strong.

The numeration of the Apocal. 666.

After this diuelish Mahumet had thus seduced the people, teaching them that he came not by miracles, but by force of sword to giue his law, and that they which will not obey it, must either be put to death, or else pay tribut (for so be the words of the Alchoran:) and after that he had gathered strength about him of the Arabians, which Arabians had then occasion to rebell against the Emperour, because their stipends were not paid them of Heraclius the Emperors officers: he began to range with force and violence in the parts of Syria bordering neere vnto him, and first subdued Hecha, then Damascus: and further increasing in power, entred into Egypt and subdued the same. From thence he turned his power against the Persians, with whom Cosroes the king of Persia encountring with a puissant army, ouerthrew the Saracens, and put Mahumet to flight. Of these Persians came the Turkes, which afterward ioyning with the Saracens, maintained them against the Christians. Ex Munster.

Damascus subdued of the Saracens.

Mahumet put to flight by Cosroes king of the Persians.

After the death of this beast, which, as some say, was poysoned in his house, succeeded Ebocara, or Ebubecer his father in law, or as Wolfangus affirmeth, his sonne in law, who take vpon him the gouernment of the Saracens, got the City Gaza, and besieged also Hierusalem two yeares. He raigned two yeares, hauing for his chiefe City Damascus.

No imperiall countrie in all the Turkish dominions.

Hierusalem besieged.

After him, followed Omar, or Ahumar, who conquered a great part of Syria, and got Egypt.

The fourth king of the Saracens after Mahumet, was Odmen, then followed Haly, and after him Muhantas: which after the siege of 7. yeares, obteined and got the Christian city of Tesarea: also ouercame the Persians, with their king Dirmada, and subdued that country to his law.

Tesarea got of the Saracens.

The kingdome of the Persians subdued to the Saracens.

The wicked Saracens in the space of 30. yeares, subdued Arabia, got Palestina, Iahenica, Syria, Egypt, and Persia, which came directly to the 666. yeares, prophesied of in the Reuelation of S. Iohn, as is afore said. And not long after, they proceeded further, and got Africke, and then Affa, as in the processe of their story shall appeare the Lord willing.

Arabia, Palestina, Iahenica, Syria, Egypt, and Persia, subdued of the Saracens.

Not long after Heraclius Emperour of Constantinople, succeeded Constance his nephew, who in the 13. yeare of his Empire, fighting vnluckily against the Saracens in Lycia, was ouerthrowne of Mohanias afore said, in the yeare of our Lord 655. Which Constance, if he were not prospered by the Lord in his warres, it was no great marueil, considering that he had slaine his brother Theodosius before at home: moreouer, liued in continuous matrimony also, being inclined to certain new sects, could not abide the contrary teachers, but slew them which admonished him therof. The said Constance going afterward to Italy, was also ouercome of the Lumbards, &c. The Saracens after this victory spoiled also Rhodes.

Although

Although these cursed Saracens in these their great victories and conquests were not without domesticall seditions and diuisions among themselues, yet the princes of the Saracens, being called then Sultans, had in their possession the gouernment of Syria, Egypt, Africke, and of a great part of Asia, about the yeare of 400. yeares (till at length the Saracen king which ruled in Persia, fighting against the Saracen of Babylon, sought aide of the Turkes, to fight with him against the Sultan of Babylon. The which Turkes by little and little surpsized vpon the Sultan of Persia, and not long after putting him out of place, vsurped his kingdom of Persia: which afterward went further, as ye shall heare the Lord willing. And this is the first beginning of the Turkes dominion.

These Turkes after they had thus ouercome great countreys and prouinces, and made their power large and mighty both in Asia, and Europa, began to diuide their kingdomes, and countreys amongst themselues. But when they could not agree, but with deadly warre contended for the bounds of those kingdomes and dominions, in the meane time 4. of the principall families conquering and subduing all the rest, parted the whole Empire amongst themselues. And yet they also not so contented, fell to such cruell hatred, contention, warre, and slaughter, (no doubt by the iust iudgement of God against his blasphemous enemies) that there was no end therof, vntill the remnant of the ancient Turkes was vtterly rooted out.

The Turkes dominions parted into 4. families.

Pahumets Alchoran with diuers lawes.

The dissension of the Christians do make the Turke so strong.

For it is euident, that there are fewe now remaining which are Turkes indeed by birth and blood, and that the state of that great Empire is not vpholden, but by the strength and power of soudiors, which haue bene Christians, and now are turned to Mahumets religion: so that euen their owne naturall language is now out of vse amongst them, sauing in certaine families of their nobilitie and gentlemen.

These 4. families aboue mentioned, with their Captaines and armies, about the yeare of our Lord 1330. went raging throughout all Asia and Europa, and euery one of them conquered some part of the countreys where they passed.

The causes of these great inuasions and victories, were the dissention and discord, falsehod, idlenesse, inconstancie, grediue auarice, lacke of truth, and fidelity among Christian men of all estates and degrées, both high and low. For by the wilfull defection and backsliding of the Christians, the Turkish power did exceedingly increase, in that many desiring the licentious life and liberty of warre, and allured with the prosperous successe of things, forsooke the Church of God, and made themselues bondslaues to Mahumet and his diuelish sect: both because that fleshly liberty is delighting to all men, and partly also because as fortune fauoureth, so commonly the willes of men incline: And againe, such as be prophane, and without the feare of God, (whereof there is an infinite number in the Church) in all ages, are wont commonly to iudge of religion, according to the successe of realmes and kingdomes. For many, not only for the variety of opinions, but also for the diuersitie of euents and fortune amongst men, haue enquired and do inquire, whether there be any Church of God distinct from other nations: what it is, and where it is: especially, for so much as the greatest part of men, both in the old time, when as the foure Monarchies flourished in order, was ignorant of this doctrine, which is peculiar to the Church alone, and now also the barbarity of Mahumet preuaileth and raigneth in the most part of the world. And how knoweth this with mans reason, that a small number both miserable and also feebled and broken with many battailes, should be preserued and kept of God, and the other flourishing in all wealth, prosperitie, victories, authoritie and power, should be reiected and despised of God, seeing there is no power and authoritie, but by the ordinance of God? Albeit therefore, the power of the Turkes hath bene for these two hundred yeares, of greater force, then any other Monarchy of the world besides, yet is there no Imperiall dignity to be esteemed in that Turkish tyranny, but amongst those nations onely, where the heauenly doctrine of the Gospell is preached, and other disciplines necessary for the Church of God, and the common life of man maintained and regarded: where the lawes of God, and other honest and ciuill ordinances agreeable to the same, do flourish and reigne: there lawfull iudgement is exercised: where vertue is honoured and rewarded: where sinne and wickednes is punished: where honest families are maintained and defended.

Mahumet put to flight by Cosroes king of the Persians.

Inward warre among the Turkes.

These things are not regarded amongst the Turkes, the enemies of the Sonne of God, and all lawfull Empires: because they dissolue and reiect all godly societies, honest discipline, good lawes, policies, righteous iudgements, the ordinance of matrimony, and godly families. For what hath the Empire of the Turkes beene hitherto, but most deadly, cruell, and perpetuall warre, to worke all mischiefe, destruction and desolation: to subuert good lawes, Cities, kingdomes, policies, and to enlarge their cruell power and dominion? The stay and strength whereof, is not one and fauourable proceeding of vertue and iustice, as in Iuliolall and well gouerned Empires: but feare, violence, oppression, swarmes, and infinite thousands of barbarous and most wicked people, ministers of Satans malice and fury. Which kinde of dominion and tyranny hath bene condemned by the voyce of God many yeares ago: the testimonies whereof, the Lord would haue to remaine in the Church, lest the godly being moued with the power and successe thereof, should fall away and forsake the Sonne of God.

The time comming vp of Ottomannus

Wherefore, let vs not seeke for any Imperiall state in that barbarity: but let vs be thankefull, and acknowledge the great benefite of God, for that he hath reserued to vs certaine remnants of the Romaine Empire: And let vs call vpon him daily with heartie petitions and prayers, and with zeale and loue to the house of God, that this Turkish power ioined with the malice of Sathan, against the Sonne of God, preuaile not against the poore congregations and little remnant of his Church, as it hath hitherto done against these strong and noble Christian kingdoms and churches, where now see the Turkish tyranny to raigne, and Sathan to haue taken full possession. Whose state was once farre better then ours is now, and more like to continue without such horrible ouerthrowes and desolation. Oh that we might foresee a little the great danger that hangeth ouer our heads! For though the Turke seemeth to be farre off, yet do we nourish within our breasts at home, that may some cause vs to feele his cruell hand and woorse, if woorse may be, to ouerrunne vs: to lay our land waste: to scatter vs amongst the Infidels, the enemies and blasphemers of the Sonne of God.

The Christian Kingdoms and churches destroyed by the Turkes, are a warning for vs, whom God hath yet spared.

Now, although these foure families aboue mentioned, long continued together in bloudie warres, and deadly hatred, yet one of them passed the rest in all crueltie and tyrannie, and subduing the other three families, take vpon him the gouernment alone, and so became the first Monarch, or Emperour, that reigned among them, called Ottomannus, of whom all that raigned after him, were called Ottomanni. Who succeeding orderly of his line, haue occupied the same dominion and seate of the Turkes, from the yeare of our Lord 1300. vnto this present time, which haue been to the number of 12. Of the which 12. in such order as they liued and raigned, I intend (Christ so permitting) seuerally and compendiously something to intreate, briefly abstracting out of prolixe and tedious writers, such specialties, as for vs Christians shall be chiefely requisite to be knowne.

Foure principall families of the Turke.

The family of Ottomannus.

¶ Ottomannus the first great Emperour, or Tyrant of the Turkes.

Ottomannus the first Empyre of the Turkes.

THis Ottomannus was at the first of poore estate, and obscure amongst the common sort of men, comming of a base progeny, and of rusticall parents: but through his valiantnes and actiuitie in warre, he got him a great name amongst the Turkes. For he being a man of fierce courage, refusing no labour, and delighting in warre, and gathering together by great subtiltie a multitude of common soldiers, began to make warre, and by conquests and victories, to auaunce himselfe and his familie. First, hee began to rob and spoyle with a great band of rouers, and afterward he attempted to set vpon all men. Neither did he here end destroy the Christians onely, but set vpon his owne nation also, and sought all occasion to subdue them wholly vnto him. For now the Princes and Captaines of the Turkes, inflamed with ambition and desire of rule, began to fall out and contend among themselues, in so much that they fell to domesticall and inward warre, with all the power they could.

Ottomannus hauing this occasion very fitte and meete to accomplish that, which he long had sought for, gathering vnto him all such as he thought to be giuen to robbing and spoiling, and set all vpon mischiefe, in short time began to grow in authoritie, and first set vpon certaine townes, as he saw opportunitie to serue him: Of which townes, some he take by force, some by yeelding, other some he spoyled and ouerthrew, to terrifie the rest, thus laying the first foundation of his rising. In the meane time, the discord which was among the Christians, was no small aduantage to this Ottomannus, by occasion thereof, he within tenne yeares space subdued Bythinia, and all the Prouinces about Pontus: Also Natolia, which comprehendeth all the dominion of the Turkes within Asia: Ancyra a City in Phrygia: Synope a City in Galatia: and Sabastia a City in Cappadocia: and thus still preuailing, he increased in short time to a mighty power, either through the secret iudgement of God against that nation, or els because God would haue them so farre and so cruelly to preuaile, for the punishment of the sinnes of other nations, like as it was prophecied before, that such a kingdome there should be of Gog and Magog.

Bythinia, Natolia, Ancyra, Synope, Sebastia subdued.

This Ottomannus, after he had raigned 28. yeares, in the yeare of our Lord 1327. died, and departed to his Mahumet, leaning behind him three sonnes, of whom Orchanes being the youngest, killed his two brethren, whilest they were at variance betweene themselues.

Orchanes the second Emperour of the Turkes, after Ottomannus.

ORchanes, the youngest of the sonnes of Ottomannus, after he had slaine his two brethren, tooke the regiment of the Turkes after his father. Who after he had atchiued to him the hearts of the multitude, such as had their dispositions set vpon the licentious life of warre, conuerted his power further to enlarge his fathers dominion, winning and subduing Pysfia, Lydia, Lycaonia, Phrygia and Caria: All which countreys, being within the compasse of Asia, vnto the sea side of Hellespontus, and the sea Euxinus, he added to the Turkish Empire. Also he wanne Prusia, which was the metropolitane city of Bithynia, which then he made the chiefe seate of the Turkes Empire. Besides these moreouer, he conquered Nicea and got possessed all which were before Christian Cities and regions. Yet for all this could not make the Christian Princes in Greece, forcease their ciuill warres, and to vnite and accord among themselues: Such debate, and variance was then betweene Cantacuzenus on the Greekes part, and Paleologus the Emperour of Constantinople. By reason whereof, the Turkes aide was sent for out of Asia, to helpe our Christians one to kill an other, and at length to get all those parts of Europe from them both. Who if they had according to their profession, so well ioyned in brotherly vnitie, as they did in cruell hostilitie present, neither had Orchanes so preuailed in getting Prusia from the Grecians, neither had the Turkes so soone presumed into Europe as afterward they did. Orchanes after the victories, which he had atchiued 22. yeares, was stricken, as some say, with a dart in the shoulder, at the siege of Prusia. The opinion of others is, that he fighting against the Tartarians, where he lost a great part of his army, was there also slaine himselfe. An. 1349.

¶ Amurathes the 3. after Ottomannus.

The Greeke writers doe holde that Orchanes had two sonnes, Solimannus and Amurathes. Of which two, first Solimannus raigned, albeit not long. After him, followed Amurathes, who after that Asia now was subdued by his predecessors, sought by all meanes and waies how to procede further, and to inuade Europe. To whose ambitious purpose the domesticall warres of the Christians gaue vnpossessed occasion, which occasion is thus declared: Certaine discord fell betweene the Princes of Greece (whose Captaine was Cantagurenus) and Paleologus Emperor of Constantinople. Whereupon Paleologus, for that he was not able to make his parte good with the Grecians, made himselfe sent for Amurathes to helpe him. Who being glad to haue such an occasion offered, which he so long had sought, sent to aide him 12000. Turkes into Thracia: but first bred all delayes he could of craftie policie, to the intent that the Greekes first should waste their strength and power vpon themselues, whereby he might be more able afterward to set vpon them, and to accomplish his conceited desire.

The Turkes first warre against the Christians

Before conflict in Albania, and Bosna. In which regions, when he had subdued a great part, and had led away innumerable multitude of captiues, he inuaded further to Walachia and Seruia, vpon hope to conquere all Pannonia.

Despot reigned at the same time in Seruia a certaine prince named Georgius Despota, who made great sute to the Turke for truce and peace, promising to giue his daughter to marriage: for by the Turkes law they may marrie as many wiues as they list. It was not long after Amurathes had married the daughter of Despota, but hee contrary to his league and promise, made warre vpon Despota his father in law, and expelled him out of his kingdome, taking from him diuers cities, as Scopia, Banemonte, Sophia, and all Bysia. Georgius himselfe fled into Hungarie, leauing behind him his sonne to defend the towne of Smiderenia. Amurathes vnderstanding of the flight of Despota his father in law, compassed the city of Smideroma with a strong siege, which when hee in few daies had ouercome, he tooke his wiues brother, sonne of Despota, and without all regard of mercy and affinity, after the barbarous tyranny of the Turkes, put out his eyes, with a basen red hot set before his eyes, and after that led him about him in derision and despite of his cowardly father. Ex. Chrikof. Richerio Gallo, & Gasp. Peuc. et alijs.

Belgradum besieged by the Turke.

Seruia being thus won and gotten, Amurathes thinking to go further into Hungarie, besieged the city called Belgradum, and no doubt had also suppressed the same, had not the prouidence of God found meanes, that partly through slaughter of his men, partly for lacke of victuall and other forage, he was compelled to raise his siege and retire.

Ioannes Huniades, Vaiuoda.

In the meane time Ioannes Huniades (of whom mention was made before, pag. 662.) had got great victories against the Turkish power, and had recouered part of Seruia, and all Walpauia: against whom Amurathes the Turke, with a mightie armie, moued into Pannonia. But Huniades with the power and aide of Ladislaus king of Polonia (but especially by the power of the Lord) did soone infringe the puissance of the Turke, and gaue him the ouerthrow, recouering into the christians the greatest part of Seruia and Bulgaria.

Foure victories of Iohn Huniades against the Turke gotten in one day.

In this battell Huniades had fiue sundrie conflicts with the Turkes vpon one day, and with fiue victories put them to the worse, and toward night did so discomfite and ouerthrow the great captaine of Amurathes, called Wala, the duke of Anatolia (which is otherwise named Asia Minor) that he slew of the Turkes that day, to the number of thirtie thousand. Amurathes, although he was not a little therat discouraged, yet dissembling his feare, with stout countenance sent for Carambeius his principall stay and captaine, with a new power brought out of Asia, to assist him in his warres. This Carambeius, in the dolours of Transiluania, Ladislaus the forsaid king of Polonie (the Lord so working) through the industrie of Ioannes Huniades, so receiued and with such celeritie oppressed him vnprouided, that all his stout and sturdie armie either was slaine downe right, or else put to slight and dispersed. Carambeius the captaine being himselfe taken prisoner in the same field.

The victorie of Huniades against Carambeius the great captaine of the Turkes.

The great Turke brought in a great distresse.

These victories of Huniades stroke no little terrour to Amurathes, in so much that for difficulty of mind he was ready to destroy himselfe (as some do write) but being confirmed by Helebeus Bassa his counseller, he kept himselfe within the streites of the mount Rhodope. Who then hearing that Caramannus inuaded the same time the countrie of Bithinia and Pontus in Asia: was glad to take truce with Ladislaus and Huniades vpon such conditions as they liked to make themselues: which conditions were these, that Amurathes should depart cleerely from all the region of Seruia, and should remoue from thence all his garrisons, which were placed in the castles and forts of the same: Also he should restore George Despota (which is to say) prince of Seruia vnto his possession, and set his children free, whom he had in captiuitie, and restore vnto them their inheritance. Item, that he should make no more claime nor title to the countrie of Polponia aboue mentioned, nor to that part of Bulgraria which he had lost: and that he should desist hereafter from all wrongs and iniuries against the Christians. Vpon these conditions the Turke being agreed, so was truce concluded on both parts for ten yeeres, and with solemne oth betweene them confirmed.

Amurathes his agreement with Helebeus Bassa.

Truce betweene the Christians and the Turkes for ten yeeres.

This done, Amurathes the tyrant addresseth himselfe toward Asia, to resist the invasion of Caramannus aforesaid. At what time pope Eugenius so soone as he heard the Turke to be returned into Asia, sendeth Iulianus Cæsarinus his cardinall (whose storie is before touched, page 615.) vnto Ladislaus the foresaid king, with full dispensation and absolution to breake his oth and league with the Turke, promising moreouer great hope of aid, if he would go in armes stoutly against the tyrant.

The pope sendeth Iulian his cardinall priuily vnto the king of Polonie.

¶ Where by the way is to be noted, that as there is no truth of promise in that pestilent see of Rome, neither was there euer any warr prospered, which was taken in hand by the popes counsell: so was there neuer any counsell of the pope that brought with it more detriment to Christianitie, then this

But the pope beside thought, that as he might lawfully breake promise with Iohn Hus, and with other Christians, so also he needed not to obserue any league or truce taken with the Turk: but it turned much otherwise then the popes blind braines imagined, as by the sequell is to be seene. For Ladislaus being thus egged by the vnadusied and sinister instigation of pope Eugenius, contrary to the truce stablished a little before, set out with his army from Sedolmus, and so proceeding to Walachia and Burgaria, came to Varna, a towne of Bulgary, where he fell sicke.

Nothing prosperously that is taken in hand by the popes setting on.

The pope procureth truce made betweene the Christians and the Turke.

It was not long but the Turk hauing thereof intelligence, left his warres begun with Caramannus in Asia, and with great iournies made haste into Europe, passing ouer by the straits nære to Callipolis; where all the Italian nauie still looking on, and whether of purpose, or whether for cowardlinesse, would not stirre one oar to stop the passage of the Turkish army. When Amurathes was come to Andianopolis in Thracia, lining such celeritie as no man looked for, within 8. daies he was in Burgaria, and there encamped himselfe against Ladislaus. The day of battell being set, the armies approched on both sides. Huniades was himselfe there present, but all the matter was ruled by Iulianus the Cardinall, and the popes clergie. The fight continued three daies and three nights together, with great courage and much bloudshed on each side: insomuch that the field did stand with lakes of bloud. It seemed at the first to incline to the Christians, by breaking the first rankes of the Turkes. But the priests and prelats which were at the field (which had been more fit to haue been in the Church) seeing the Turkes to begin to flie, vnskilfully left their array to pursue the enemie, to that they leauing the other standings of the Christians naked, gaue great aduantage to the Turkes, with their darts and shot to disturbe the Christian ranks. By the which occasion, Amurathes inclosing the Christians with his army round about, obtained the victorie. In the which field, Ladislaus the young king of Polony, hauing his horse first killed vnder him, was stricken downe, and slaine. The popes bishops flying to saue themselues, fell into the marishes, and there were destroyed, sustaining a durtie death condigne to their filthie falshod and vntruth. Iulianus the Cardinall, which with the pope was the chiefe doer in breaking the league, in the warr was found dead, being full of wounds, and spoiled to his naked shirne. Of the rest of the army that escaped by flying, part was deuoured in the marishes, some perished miserably for hunger, some for cold, watching and ranging in the woods. Huniades hardly escaped the danger, by the mercifull prouidence of God, being reserued to the further profit and commodities of Christendome.

This John Huniades is reported of 20. battels with the Turke, to lose but two.

This John Huniades the worthy warrior was borne in Walachia, being earle of Wistrice, of all captaines that euer went against the Turks, most famous and singular, prudent in wit, discreet in counsell, expert and politike in warr, prompt of hand, circumspect before he attempted, quick in expedition: in whom wanted almost no good property requisite in a warlike captaine. Against two most mighty and fierce tyrants, Amurathes and Mahumetes, through the Lords might, hee defended all Pannonia, and therefore was called the thunderbolt and terrour of the Turks. Like as Achilles was vnto the Grecians, so was he let vp of God to be as a wall or bulwarke of all Europe against the cruell Turks and enemies of Christ, and of his Christians. Neither was there any king or prince that euer atchieued such noble victories, either so many in number, or so profitable for the publike vtility of all Europe, as did he, and that not only in the daies of this Amurathes, but also of Mahumetes his successor, as hereafter remaineth further to bee seene. This battell of Amurathes against the Christians at Varna in Bulgaria, was fought in the yere of our Lord, 1404.

Amurathes returneth against the Christians.

Amurathes returneth by reason of his victorious ouerthrow against the christians, surprised with no small pride, directed his iourny incontinent toward the Grecians, where Cassriotus was, & otherwise called Scanderbeius. And first, comming to Peloponesus, and breaking downe the wall about the straits of Corinth, encountred with the brother of the emperor of Constantinople, whom with his sudden comming he oppressed, with all the Greeks armye, ere they were prouided. Paleologus the emperor after that, did build vp the wall againe: but at the Turks bidding he was compelled to vndoe it againe: which wall afterward the Venetians did repaire. After the demolition of the wall, Amurathes entring into Peloponesus, tooke diuers townes and cities, as Cyrcione, and Patris, and moreouer made all the parts of Thessalia and Achaia tributaries vnto him.

Amurathes returneth his voyage against the Grecians.

Peloponesus Cyrcione, Patris, with all the parts of Thessalia & Achaia, brought vnder the Turke.

The nert yere after this battell of Amurathes fought against the christians at Varna, the Turke being now about the parts of Grecia, purposed to bend all his force and maine against the country of Epyrus belonging to Georgius Castriotus Scanderbeius. Of this Scanderbeius mention was made before, how hee was brought vp in the Turkes court, from whence we declared also how subtilly he conueied himselfe, and came to the possession of his owne patrimony of Epyrus. Also when Amurathes himselfe with his whole puissance, had enuironed about the city of Croia, with cruell siege and ordinance out of measure, yet notwithstanding the said Scanderbeius (through the power and blessing of the Lord) beat him out of the field, and repulsed him from the siege.

Seuen captaines of the Turkes ouercome by Castriotus Scanderbeius.

Amurathes renounced his promision, and made himselfe a Turkish monke.

After this discomfiture, the saying is, that Amurathes, to keepe his vow made before, after his victory at Varna, gaue himselfe vnto a religious order, liuing a contemplatiue life with certaine other priests ioyned vnto him, in the forrest of Bithynia, renouncing the gouernment of his realme to the hands of Haly one of his princes (so thou must vnderstand, good Reader, that the Turkes also be not without their sundry sects of religion, no more then wee christians are without our friers and monks.)

Haliabeus a traitor to his master.

In the meane time while Amurathes this Turkish tyrant was cloistered vp in his monkish religion, Ioannes Huniades in the kingdome of Hungarie, and Castriotus Scanderbeius in Grecia, kept great warre against the Turkes. Wherefore Amurathes was taken against from his monkish vow and profession, and brought against into the field: For first Huniades had relieued the whole countrie of Hungary: and had prepulsed moreouer all the might of the Turkes farr from Seruia. And although the pestilent practise of Georgius prince of Seruia, had oftentimes disclosed his counsels vnto the Turkes, whereby twice hee was brought in danger, yet not withstanding (through the Lords gratious protection) he was preserued and deliuered by the said George vnto the Hungarians againe, and after that manfully vanquished the Turkes, so that they had no resting place about those parts of Seruia and Bulgaria, so long as he liued.

On the other side in Grecia, Castriotus Scanderbeius so foiled the Turke in defence of his countrie Epyrus and Macedonia, and kept Amurathes so short, that not onely he was not able to winne any great towne in all Epyrus: but also comming from Epyrus in the straites, was so intangled by Castriotus, that he was forced to giue battell: In the which battell he was so vanquished, and most part of his armie slaine, that for griefe and sorrow conceiued, he falling into a raging sickines, was transported out of his pauilion into Andianople, and there in furie and madnes died, after he had raigned 34. yeares, which was about the yere of our Lord 1450.

This Amurathes first obtained the order of the Janizaries. Which were the men children of such Christians as he conquered and tooke captiue: whom he forced to renounce the faith of Christ, wherin they were baptized, and brought them vp in Mahumets law, and exercised them in the same feates of war as he did his own people, and after that they came to mens estate, he named them Janizari (that is to say) souldiers of a straunge countrey, and made them to guard his person. They weare on their head in stead of an helmet, a white attire made of the grossest sort of woll, and in so many folds about their head, that it cannot be pierced with a sword. It hangeth downe on the backe with a taile, and before on the forehead it is garnished with gold and siluer. They were wont to vse bowes and launces in the field, but now they vse daggers as our horsemen do.

The fury of Mahumet the Turke against the city and schoole of Athens.

At the first institution there were but 5000. in their garrison, but now they be twice so many. This of all bondage and seruitude that the Christians suffer vnder the Turke is most intolerable, and greatly to be of all true Christians lamented. For what can godly minds behold more to their griefe, then to see their children pulled from the faith of Christ, wherein they were baptized, and by whose blood they should eternally be saued, and to be instructed and nourished with the blasphemous doctrine of Mahumet, and so be professed enemies of Christ and his church, to make warr against it heauen, and to perish euerlastingly? And finally, what a lamentable thing is it, to see and behold our owne children borne of our owne bodies, to become our mortall and cruell enemies, and to cut our throats with their owne hands? This seruitude of mind is far greater then death it selfe: which if our princes would well consider, it would cause them the rather to agree, and bend their whole force and power against this cruell enemie.

✠ Mahumetes second, the ninth after Ottomannus.

Mahumetes the ninth Turke after Ottomannus.

AMurathes left behind him three sonnes, Mahumetes borne of the daughter of Despota, prince of Seruia, being twentie yeeres of age, the second sonne called Turcines, the third named Calepinus. This Turcines being an infant, and but eight scene monethes old, was strangled at the commandement of the Turke, by his seruant Dosses, himselfe being there present, and beholding the horrible murther. And when Moses the executor of the murther had desired him not to pollute his hands with the blood of his brother, hee answered, that it was the maner of all the Ottoman Turkes, that all the other brethren being destroyed, none should be left aliue but one to gouerne the empire. Wherefore Moses was commanded by the tyrant, there presently, and in his sight, to kill the infant. This horrible fact when the mother of the child vnderstood, shee crying out, and almost mad for sorrow, cursed the tyrant to his face. But he to mitigate the rage of his mother, al her request, being desirous to be reuenged vpon the executor of her sonnes death, deliuered the said Moses bound into her hands, who then in the presence of the tyrant, thrust him to the heart with a knife, and opening his brest tore out his liuer, and threw it to the dogges to be deuoured.

The tyranny of Mahumet in murthering his brethren.

The third sonne called Calepinus, which was but fiue months old, the foresaid Amurathes his father commended to the custodie of Halibassa one of his nobles, who to gratifie and please the tyrant, betraied the infant, and brought him vnto him, and thereupon he at the tyrants commaundement was strangled. Some affirme, that in stead of Calepinus, another child was offered vnto the tyrant, and that Calepinus was conueied to Constantinople, and after the taking of Constantinople, was carried to Venice, and then to Rome to pope Calixt, where he was baptized, and afterward came into Germanie to Frederiche the emperor, and there was honorably entertained, and kept in Austrich during his life. Thus note how the mercifull prouidence of God, whom he list to saue, can fetch out of the diuels mouth. And note moreouer touching the foresaid Haliabassa the betrayer of the infant, how he escaped not vnreuenged: For Mahumet vnderstanding him to be a man of great substance & riches, through forging of false crimes, with great torments put him to death to haue his riches: for this tyrant was giuen to insatiable auarice. Thus this bloody Mahumet began his regiment with horrible murther, after the example of other cursed tyrants his predecessors.

Although this Mahumet, notwithstanding that he came of a Christian mother, being the daughter of Despota prince of Seruia, and by her was brought vp and instructed from his childhod in the precepts of Christian religion and manners, yet he soone forgetting all, gaue himselfe to Mahumetes religion, and yet so, that he being addicted to neither religio, became an Atheist, beleeuing and worshipping no God at all, but only the goddesse of good fortune, scrifing and mocking the minds and iudgements of men, which beleeue that God by his prouidence, gouerneth and regardeth the state of humain things on earth.

Ex Leunclauio Pandect. lib. 2. rerum Turcicarum.

After that this Mahumet heard of the victories and conquests of other his predecessors, and had vnderstanding how Baiazetes lay eight yeeres about Constantinople, and could not win it: he disprasing Baiazets, and disdaining that so long time should be spent about the siege thereof, and yet no victory gotten, bent all his studie and deuice how to subdue the same. But first hauing a priuie hatred against the Citie of Athens, and hauing his hands lately imbrued with the blood of his brethren, this murthering Mahumet first of all taketh his voiage to Athens: and destroy the citie aforesaid, being a famous Schoole of all good learning and discipline. Against the which citie he did so furiously rage for the hatred of good letters, that he thought he ought not to suffer the foundation thereof to stad, because that city was a good nurse and fosterer of good Arts & Sciences: therefore, he commanded the citie to be raced and vtterly subuerted: and wheresoeuer any monuments or bookes could bee found, he caused them to be cast into durty sinkes and the filthiest places of the citie, or put to the most vile vses that could be deuised, for extirping and abolishing of all good literature; and if he vnderstood any to lament the ruine and ruine of that noble place, those hee greeuously punished and put to death.

Athens described.

Thus the fameius and auncient Schoole of Athens being destroied and ouerthrowne, he returned his army and power into Thracia, where in all haste he gathering his power together both by sea & by land, with a mighty multitude compassed the citie of Constantinople about, and began to lay his siege against it, in the yeare of our Lord 1452. and in the 54. day of the said siege it was taken, sacked, and the Emperour Constantinus slaine. As touching the cruelty and fiercenesse of the Turkes in getting of this citie, and what slaughter there was of men, and women, and children, what calamitie and misery was there to be seene, for asmuch as sufficient relation, with a full description thereof, hath beene made before, pag. 651. it shall be superfluous now to repeate the same. This only is not to be omitted touching the principall causes of the ouerthrow of this citie: whereof the first was the filthy auarice of those Citizens, which hiding their treasures in the ground, would not employ the same to the necessary defence of their city. For so I find it in story expressed, that when the Turke, after the taking of the citie, had found not so much treasure as he looked for, suspecting with himselfe (as the truth was) the treasures & riches to be hidden vnder the ground, commanded the earth to be digged vp, and the foundations of the houses to be searched: where when hee had found treasures incredible. What (quoth hee) how could it be that this place could euer lacke munition and fortification, which did flow and abound with such great riches as heere is, and plenty of

of all things. The second cause was the absence of the navie of the Venetians, which if they had beene ready in time, might have beene a safegard against the invasion of the enemies. A third cause also may be gathered upon occasion incident in stories, either for that the city of Constantinople fifteene yeeres before did yeeld to the bishop of Rome, as is before to bee seene pag. 644. or else because (as in some writers it is ment) that liuinges were there receiued and maintained in their churches, and by the Turkes the same time destroyed.

Ex Bara. Arrogance of the Venetians in Constantinople.

Ioannes Ramus writing of the destruction of this city, amongst other matters maketh relation of the image of the Venetians being there in the high temple of Sophia; which image the Turke tooke, and writing this superscription vpon the head of it: Hic est Christianorum Deus. i. This is the God of the christians, gaue it to his souldiers to bee stoned, and commanding the said image with a trumpet to be carried through all his army, made euery man to spit at it most contumeliously. Wherein thou hast good Reader (by the way to note, what occasion of slander and offence wee christians giue vnto the barbarous Infidels by this our vngodly superstition, in hauing images in our temples, contrary vnto the expresse commandment of God in his word. For if saint Paul writing to the Corinthians, saith: We know Christ now no more after the flesh: how much lesse then is Christ to bee honoured of vs in blind stockes and images set vp in our temples, seruing for none other purpose, but for the Infidels to laugh both vs and our God to scorne, and to prouoke Gods vengeance: which by the like example (I feare) may also fall vpon other cities, where such images and Idolatrous superstition is maintained; whereof God grant Vienna to take heede betime, which hath beene so long, and yet is in such great danger of the Turke, and polluted with so many images, and plaine Idolatry.

What offences be risen to the Infidels by images in christian churches.

Vienna admonished.

In summa, to make the storie short, such was the cruelty of these Turkes in winning the city, that when Mahomet had giuen licence to the souldiers three daies together, to spoile, to kill, and to doe what they liked, there was no corner in all Constantinople, which did not either slaw with christian blood, or else was polluted with abominable abusing of maides, wiues and matrones, without all reuerence of nature. Of the which citizens, some they martyred, some they rosted vpon spits, of some they sleyed off their skin hanging them vp to consume with famine, of othersome they put salt into their wounds, the more terrible to torment them, in so much, that one of them contended with another who could deuise most strange kinds of new torments and punishments, exercising such cruelties vpon them, that the place where the cities was before, seemed now to be no cities, but a slaughter house or shambles of Christian mens bodies. Among the dead bodies, the bodie also of Constantine the emperour was found; whose head being brought to Mahumet, he commanded to be carried vpon a speare through the whole cittie for a publike spectacle and derision to all the Turkish armie. And because he would diminish the number of the captiues, which seemed to him to be verie great, he neuer rose from his table, but he put euerie day some of the nobles to death, no lesse to fill his cruell mind with blood, then his bodie was filled with wine: which he vsed so long to doe as any of the nobles of that citie was left aliue: And of the other sort also, as the stories doe credibile report, there passed no day, in the which he did not ordeine slay more then three hundred persons, the residue he gaue to his rascall souldiers to kill, and to doe with them what they would. Where is to be noted, that as Constantinus the sonne of Helena, was the first emperour of Constantinople, so Constantinus the sonne also of Helena, was the last emperour thereof.

The bloodie cruelties of the Turke against the christian captiues.

A lamentable destruction of the citie of Constantinople.

Not farre from the said citie of Constantinople, there was another little citie called Pera, and once called Galatia, situated by the sea side: who hearing of the miserable destruction of Constantinople, and seeing the citie flaming with fire, sent certaine of the chiefe men with speed to Mahumet, declaring vnto him that they neither had sent any helpe to the citie of Constantinople, neither yet wrought any detriment to anie of his armie: wherefore they desired and prayed him, that as they would gladlie yeeld vnto him, so he would be fauourable vnto them and spare them, and not to punish the guiltles with the guilty. Mahumet although he was not ignorant that for feare, rather then of any good will, they submitted themselues, and that they would rather resist him if they had been able, yet he receiued em that time, the submission of the messengers: but sending by them his ambassadour into the citie, he commanded also his armie to followe withall, and to enter with him into the citie, which, although it was greatly suspected and misliked of the citizens, yet they durst no otherwise doe, but suffer them to enter: which being done, the ambassadour gaue a signe to the souldiours, euerie man to doe his office: but he was bidden of whom some ran to the walls, some to the temples and churches, some to the streetes and houses of the citie, plucking all things vnwrie to the ground, sacking and ranging with no lesse furie and abominable filthinesse, then they had done at Constantinople before, sauing only that they abstained from murther: but the same day letters came from Mahumet to the Ambassadour, that hee should spare none, but destroy and murther all that euer were in the citie: which message because it seemed to the Ambassador to bee to cruell, for asmuch as they had yeelded themselues, he staied his hand a little vntill night came. In the meane time, drunken Mahumet comming something to himselfe (whom drunkennes had before ouercome) sent his second letters to reuoke the first. Where againe is to be noted the mercifull prouidence of God towards his people in their deserued plagues, by staying the hands, and bridling the fury many times of their enemies, when otherwise the case seemeth to be past all remedie.

Drunken Sclauonic faith of promise.

The mercifull prouidence of God in saueing his people.

Mahumet thus being in himself not a little aduanced and eleuated by the winning of Constantinople, where he had now made the imperiall seat of the Turkish dominion, the third yeere next following, to aduenture more matteries, he set out to the siege of Belgradum, a citie of Hungarie, lying neere to the banks of Danubius, thinking to haue the like successe there, as hee had in the winning of Constantinople, albeit through the Lords disposing, it fell out much otherwise. Within the Citie of Belgradum the same time of the siege thereof, was Ioannes Huniades, the valiant captaine, of whom in diuers places mention hath been made before, who with a sufficient strength of picked souldiers, albeit in number nothing equall to the Turkes army, valiantly defended the city with great courage, and no lesse successe. In the which siege great diligence was beholden, and many of the Turkes slaine. Among whom also Mahumet himself: being stricken with a pellet vnder the left arme, was faine to bee caried out of the field for half dead, and the rest so put to flight, that of the Turkes the same time were destroyed to the number, or not much vnder the number of 40. thousand, besides the losse of all their ordinance, which the Turkes in hall of their flight, were forced to leaue behind them.

40000. Turkes slaine at the siege of Belgradum.

Hieronymus Ziegler. Ex Hier. Ziegler. in lib. de illustrib. viris Germaniæ. pag. 98.

Hieronymus Ziegler. writing of the siege of this Belgradum, addeth moreouer, that when Mahumet was at the siege thereof, seeing the towne to be so final and weak of it selfe, that it could not be vanquished at his great multitude, he flaring and raring like a mad man, commanded all his basier seruice to be laid, to batter downe the walles and towers of the towne: So that the Christians within the walles were behemently distressed, for the siege continued both night and day without intermission. Among the rest of the Christians which defended the towne, Hieronymus Ziegler us maketh mention of a certaine Bohemian, much worthie of his condigne commendation: Who being vpon the walles, and seeing a Turke with a banner or ensigne of the Turkes to bee gotten vp, by the sight whereof the whole towne was in danger to be conquered and taken, runneth into the Turke, and clasping him about the middle, speaking to John Capistranus standing below, asking him, whether it were any danger of damnation to him, if he of his voluntary mind, did cast himselfe with that begge (so he termed him) downe headlong from the wall to be slaine with him: what should become of his soule, and whether he might be saued or not? To whom when the other had answered, that hee should be saued without doubt, he embowes tumbleth himselfe with the Turke, downe of the wall, where by his death he saued the same time, the life of all the Citie. Mahumet being so wounded and in despaire of winning the Citie, was caried (as ye heard) out of the field. Who at length comming againe to himselfe, partly for feare and partly for shame, was ready to kill himselfe. And thus was the towne of Belgradum at that time rescued through Gods prouidence, by the meanes of Ioannes Huniades and this good Bohemian.

The towne of Belgradum valiantly defended from the Turke.

This siege of Belgradum began in the yeare of our Lord, 1456. and endured 46. daies. At the which siege were numbred of the Turkes 200. thousand. Of whom more then 40. thousand (as is aforesaid) were slaine: where the victorie fell to the Christians through the prosperous successe giuen of God to Ioannes Huniades, and Capistranus. Which Huniades not long after the said victorie, through the impostune labour & trauaile in defending the said towne, was taken with a sore sickenes & thereof departed, to whose valiant prowesse and singular courage, stories do giue great laud and commendation.

The decease of Ioannes Huniades.

Mahumetes the Turke after this done in Europe, returned into Asia to warre with Vsumcassanes a Persian, one of the Turkes flocke, with whom he had three battailes. The first was about the River Euphrates, where the Turke lost tenne thousand men, and was put to the worse. In the second field likewise he was discomfited. The third battaile was at Arsenga, where through the terrible noise of the brasen pieces the Persian horses disturbed the campe, and so was Vsumcassanes ouercome.

The Turke vsurper against Vsumcassanes.

The Turke again ouercomed against the Christians. Sypoye, Paphlagonia. Trapezuntine, enemies of the Turkes.

From thence the Turke reduced againe his power against the Christians, and first subdued vnto him Sypoye and all Paphlagonia: Also the kingdome of Trapezunce, which he besieging both by land and water, wanne from the Christians, and sent Dauid the king of the same with his two sonnes and Calos his vncle, vnto Constantinople, where they were miserably and cruelly put to death, and all the flocke of the Conment, which were of the kings flocke, by the Turke were destroyed. Which was about the yeare of our Lord, 1459. at which time this this mischieuous Mahomet was first saluted emperor.

Not long after, he got from the Grecians Cosinthus and Mitylene, not without great slaughter of christian men: insomuch that the whole citie of Mitylene was vtterly to the ground almost destroyed. The cities also of Lemnus and Lesbos he wanne from the Venetians: in the which Iland of Lesbos is the citie of Mitylene aforesaid.

Cosinthus, Mitylene, Lesbos, Lemnus subdued of the Turke.

Not farre from this Ile of Lesbos and Mitylene, there is a countrie in Asia toward the sea side bordering next to Europe, called Sylla, or of some called Mœsia, wherein stood the citie of Troy. This countrie Mahomet comming to winne rather by policie and falshood, then by doubtfull danger of warre, secretly sent for the prince thereof to come to speake with him for certaine causes (as hee pretended) which should concerne the profit and commoditie of them both. Which when the king of Sylla, either for shame would not, or for feare durst not denie, he came to him as to conferre vpon necessarie affaires in common to them appertaining. Mahomet when he had brought it that to passe which he would, he caused the king to bee apprehended, and cruelly to bee slaine, or rather toine in peeces: and so inuading the land of Sylla, exercised the like tyrannie vpon all his kindred and affinitie.

The falshood of the wretched Turke against the prince of Sylla.

The cruelty of the Turke against the king of Sylla.

This Sylla by fraud being taken and lost, Mahomet fleeth againe toward Europe, where hee assailed the Iland of Euboia, otherwise called Negroponte, making a bridge of a marueilous frame ouer the sea Euripus, to conuey ouer his armie out of Grecia, and there laid his siege to the citie Chalcis, which at length in thirtie daies he ouercame, not without a great slaughter of his armie: who in the siege thereof is said to haue lost 40. thousand of the Turkes. But the slaughter of the christians was greater: for when the citie was wonne, the tyrant commanded most cruelly, none to be spared without the whole citie, but to be put to the sword, whosoeuer was in the whole citie, but to be put to the sword, whosoeuer was aboue the age of twentie yeeres. This cruelty was shewed of the barbarous tyrant for anger and furie, because such a number of his Turkes were slaine at the siege thereof, being reckoned (as is said) to 40. thousand. In the fierce siege of this citie, it is memorable that is in stories recoded, how that the women of that citie, seeing the men to beginne to faint, and the citie to lie in present danger, tooke the matter themselues in hand, and playing the men, went to the walles, and there defended the citie with no lesse trouble to the enemy, then the men had before done, and so for a space continued. So long as any mans strength and diligence could do any good. A great cause of the losse of this citie and Iland, is imputed to the cowardly timiditie of the Venetians nauie: who being there present, and hauing prosperous winde, yet durst not, or would not aduenture vpon the Turkes bridge, which if they had done, the Iland of Euboia and Chalcis, had not so soone been ouermatched of the Turkes.

Thus all the East parts of Grecia being subdued to the Turkish tyrant, with all Achaia, Attica, Acarnania, and Euboia, shortly after followed also Peloponesus, brought in like subiection to the Turke. Within this Peloponesus were these prouinces contained, Achaia, Messenia, Laconia, Argolica, Arcadia, christian prouinces in Grecia, subdued of the Turke.

Peloponesus, Achaia, Messenia, Laconia, Argolica, Arcadia, christian prouinces in Grecia, subdued of the Turke.

Long it is and more lamentable to recite all the victories of this Mahumet gotten against the christians both by land and sea: who after he had ouercome the Ile Lesbos aboue mentioned, and had cruelly slaine Nicolaus Catalusius the prince thereof, turning his armie toward the sea of Pontus Euxinus, got the countrie of Capha from the Genuans. Before was declared how truce was taken betweene Georgius Scanderbeius, and the Turke for ten yeeres: which truce being expired, Mahumet leauing no time vnspent, no diligence vnsought, but matieth all his power to Cyprus and Albania, which he after long tract also at length ouercame and subdued. In the which tract also he warred from the Venetians, Scodza, Epsion and Dinidrum. Notwithstanding, when Scanderbeius the valiant captaine had done against the Turk what in mans strength did lie, yet being ouermatched with power and multitude, seeing no possibilitie to make his partie good, was forced to depart his countrie as an exile, and went to Italie, and there being sent for by the popes letters, openly declared not to be possible otherwise to resist the furious rage of the barbarous Turkes by the strength of any one king or prince, vnlesse all Europe, with one consent should ioyne their power and force together. And thus Georgius Scanderbeius, a man of puissant courage, being driuen out of his countrie, continued his age in exile. Whose courage and behemencies reported to haue been such; that in fighting against the barbarous enemie, for verie eagernesse of spirit, his blood was

The death of Mahomet.

Mahumetes afore said had three sonnes: of the which, Mustapha the eldest, through voluptuousnesse and carnall lust, died before his father. The other two were Baiazetes and Demes, otherwise called Zizimus. About whom, great controuersie arose amongst the Turkes, which of them should succeede in their fathers kingdome: For neither of them was present at Constantinople when Mahumetes died: Baiazetes being in Cappadocia, and Demes in Peloponesia; wherefore when great dissention was among the nobles for the succession, and great strife and bloudshed for the matter, the Ianizarites, which were the Turkes garde, did proclaime Baiazetes Emperour: others in the absence of Baiazetes the father, did chose Cozcuthus his sonne. Baiazetes the father coming at length from Cappadocia, partly through perdning, partly by corrupting with money, got Hwils of the Ianizarites, and was made Emperor. Demes the other brother being in Peloponesia more neare, although he made no little speede in his comming, yet was preuented of Baiazetes, and excluded out of Constantinople. Wherefore he being put backe from all hope of his kingdome, incited by some of his friends, moued warre against his brother, who being ouercome in three battailes by Acomates Baiazetes captain, who had got Hyzuzum before,

Mahumetes the father of Baiazetes and Demes.

Of these Ianizarites read before pag. 681.

Baiazetes slaieth his bid brethren and mother, and his two nephewes.

78. Baiazetes second, the 10. after Ottomanus.

MAhumetes afore said had three sonnes: of the which, Mustapha the eldest, through voluptuousnesse and carnall lust, died before his father. The other two were Baiazetes and Demes, otherwise called Zizimus. About whom, great controuersie arose amongst the Turkes, which of them should succeede in their fathers kingdome: For neither of them was present at Constantinople when Mahumetes died: Baiazetes being in Cappadocia, and Demes in Peloponesia; wherefore when great dissention was among the nobles for the succession, and great strife and bloudshed for the matter, the Ianizarites, which were the Turkes garde, did proclaime Baiazetes Emperour: others in the absence of Baiazetes the father, did chose Cozcuthus his sonne. Baiazetes the father coming at length from Cappadocia, partly through perdning, partly by corrupting with money, got Hwils of the Ianizarites, and was made Emperor. Demes the other brother being in Peloponesia more neare, although he made no little speede in his comming, yet was preuented of Baiazetes, and excluded out of Constantinople. Wherefore he being put backe from all hope of his kingdome, incited by some of his friends, moued warre against his brother, who being ouercome in three battailes by Acomates Baiazetes captain, who had got Hyzuzum before, did die to the great master of the Rhodes, leaning in a place called Carra, his mother and two yong children, whom Baiazetes slue.

This Gemes being with the master of the Rhodes, was desired first of pope Innocent the 4. then of Ludouicus the 2. French king, but especially of Matthias Corninus, king of Hungarie, intending by him to obtaine great victorie against Baiazetes. But in conclusion the knights of the Rhodes sent him to the bishop of Rome, where hee being kept, and afterwards sent to Charles the 8. French king, for an hostage of pope Alexander the 6. was poysoned by the way at Terracina, by the said pope Alexander, as is before declared. After whose death Baiazetes, to requite the foresaid Aconates for his good seruice, put him to the halter, partly misdoubting his power, partly for lucre sake to haue his treasure: Whose death redounded to the great profit of the christians, forsomuch as hee was euer an vtter enemie to the religion and name of Christ.

Baiazetes thus being confirmed in his tyrannie, made his first expedition against Wallachia, ther he subdued two great forts, one called Lithoslonus, the other called Pontacastrum. From thence he removed his power, taking his voyage into Asia, thinking to be reuenged of the Sultane of Egypt, which had discouered and entertained before his brother Gemes against him; where he lost two great battels, the one sought at Aconia, the other at Tarsus: but especially at the field at Tarsus the armie of the Turke toke such a wound, that of a hundred thousand brought into the field, scarce the third part remained vnslaine. But as touching the Rhodians, although they were succourers of Gemes aforesaid, yet Baiazetes, (whether for feare, or for subtiltie, abstained to prouoke them with war, but rather entred with them the league of peace; requiring the master of the Rhodes to keepe his brother safe vnder his custodie, promising for his yerely salary, to be payed vnto him euery yeere in the moneth of August, 45000. duckets.

Thus Baiazetes being ouerthrowne and terrified with euill lucke, fighting against the Sultane of Egypt, removed from Asia, and directed his armie into Europe, where hee got Dyrrachium neere vnto Uclona, and had a great victorie ouer the christian armie in the countrie of Croatia, where he got Dyrrachium, Pannonians and Croatians ioyning their power together encountred with the Turke and lost the field, about the yeere of our Lord 1492.

From thence the Turke leading his army against the Venetians had with them diuers and doubtfull conflicts, where the Turke sometimes was put to the woorse, and sometimes again preuailing, out of Zahra and diuers other cities about Dalmatia caried away great multitudes of christians into captiuitie, which was about the yeare of our Lord 1498.

Two yeeres after this, which was the yeare of our Lord 1500. Baiazetes with 150. M. armed men, entred into Peloponesus; which although Pahumet had expugned before, yet the Venetians had defended Methone, otherwise called Modon, all this while against the Turkes. Which Methone the Turke besieged with three armies, hauing about the walls fiue hundred great brasen cannons, whereof twentie two were most violent and hurtfull, wherewith he battered the citie both day and night: but the citizens, which were within the citie committing themselues to God, defended their citie as well as they could, rather chusing to die then to yeeld vnto the Turkes tyrannie. But the Turke preuailing, and they not able to withstand the siege, the Christians consented together into a certaine house prepared for the purpose, both men, women and children; where they setting the house on fire, gane themselues rather to bee burned, then to come into the tyrants handes. Certain women also with their children, cast themselues headlong into the sea, by that meanes to auoid the Turkish captiuitie. Some writers there be which affirme that the Methonians, seeing fire great ships of the Venetians comming with men and victuals toward them, fledde betome from the walls to the sea side to receiue them; which were all taken captiues, being aboue the number of a thousand: which all being tied with long ropes, were brought before the tyrant, and in his sight torrentiuelly slaine, except certaine nobles, whom Cherseogles, sonne in law to Baiazetes, got to be pardoned, amongst whom was Andreas Gritto. The citie of Cozon, and also Pilus, cities in Greece, being terrified with the example of the Methonians, yeelded themselues to the power of the Turkes. Trissenum otherwise called Caput Sancti Galli, was expugned by Cherseogles, by force of guns.

These things thus atchieued, although Baiazetes went away victor into Constantinople, yet notwithstanding the Venetians, through the help of the kings of France and Spaine, had won from the Turke Cephalenia an Iland very commodious for their trafficke: Also had gotten other two Ilands, Leucas and Nericus, otherwise called Sancta Maura, slaying all the garrison of the Turkes. But afterward peace being taken betweene the Venetians and the Turkes, by the counsell of Andreas Gritto aforesaid, the Turkes so agreed, that Leucas and Nericus the Ilands aboue said, should be rendred into the Turkes, and the Venetians should keepe still the possession of Cephalenia.

Vnto this league the Turke did the rather condescend, for that he had to maintaine warre against Ismael Sophus in Asia, king of Persia: Which Sophus was stirred vp by Gods prouidence to warre with this Baiazetes, whereby the Christian Churches in Europe might haue some breathing time, and freedome from the Turkes cruell tyrannie and bloudshed. This Sophus was a valiant Turke, who with great power and victories had ouercome a great compasse of the East parts of Asia: then passing from Assyria into Media, and returning againe into Armenia, he made warre against the Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, and from thence comming into Asia Mine, encountred with Cocuthus Baiazetes son, and afterward comming to Bithynia, fought with Caragius Walla, Baiazets captaine, whom hee ouercame and put to flight, and afterward tooke him aliue and his wife prisoners. Afterward hee was encountred by Halibalia another captaine of the Turks, whom Techelles one of the said Sophus captaines meeting in the plaine of Galatia did withstand, and lo by the way slue Caragius the captaine, and hanged him vpon a pole in the sight of Halibalia, which Halibalia shortly after was slaine in war, and his army scattered and put to flight.

Thus through the admirable example of Gods iustice and prouidence, were these Turkes kept occupied, and became it to passe, that these Barbarians being blasphemous against the name of God, should thus horrible run one to the destruction of another, being worthily punished with mutuall slaughter and bloudshed for their impietie and blasphemy against Christ and his religion, whereby in the meane time some rest was giuen to the Christians.

Baiazetes partly by these victories discouraged, partly vnlcased and languishing of the gout, and partly also broken with age, finding himselfe vnsuteable to the regiment of that tumultuous kingdome, began to haue talke with his nobles about the dealing of one to succeede him. The occasion whereof misstred much matter of inward warres amongst the Turkes. This Baiazetes had in all 6. sonnes, whereof three died before him, and three yet were left aliue, to wit, Acomates, Cocuthus and Zelymus: Baiazetes himselfe had much mind to Acomates, but the chiefest of his nobles did fauor rather Zelymus: who through their traiterous incitation prouoked him to stirre warre against his father: and notwithstanding that he was ouercome in warre, yet through intercession he was reconciled againe to his father, and afterward practised against Emperour against his fathers will, though the bribe and fauour of the gouernors, entring the first beginning of his kingdom, with the murthering of his owne father. The story whereof in some authors is thus declared.

After that the Ianizarites had perswaded with Baiazetes, for that he himselfe was bruteliy, therfore he should do well to constitute some successor, and that he had assigned Acomates to succeede him, the Ianizarites being offended with the said Acomates, because he would not enlarge their stipends and bribe them, compassing about the kings palace with their poyniards which they had vnder their garments, with a raughty crie required Zelymus to be appointed for their Emperor. Vnto whom when Baiazetes had answered, that he had assigned Acomates, they refused him, because he was fat, grosse, and vnable ther vnto: but needes would haue Zelymus, which was stout and warlike, to bee made Emperour: and without delay drew out their swoords, crying Zelymus, Zelymus. Then Baiazetes giuing place to their fury, shewed himselfe content to giue them Zelymus: whom the Ianizarites receiuing, brought him into the palace: vnto whom Baiazetes his father giuing place, willed him not to be so hastie and furious in his doings, but to be modest and take heede what he did, and not to follow his fury, but to giue place vnto time, which reuealeth all things, and thinke himselfe to be a man subiect to dangers and temporaries as other men are: and thus speaking, he resigned his imperiall throne and seat vnto him, and went away all heauy, entring into a certain order of their religion. Whereupon followed great exclamations of the people saluting Zelymus as Emperor. Who then taking the rule vpon him, began with great cruelty to gouerne, destroying many of his nobles, such as had stood against him, some with poyson, some by other cruel means, and aduancing his owne side with great honors and promotions.

Not long after that Zelymus was thus setled in his kingdome, Baiazetes his father intending to see and proue how he behaued himselfe in his gouernement, first entred into the treasure house, where he found all his riches to be scattered and gone. Afterward he came into his armorie, where all the spoiles gotten by warre were likewise wasted: then entring into the iewell house, where all his plate and gifts sent from Kings and Princes were kept, which likewise were dispersed and giuen away. At length he came into the stable, where also he seeing his principall horses to be lacking, fighting with himselfe, crying vengeance vpon him, he prepared himselfe with the residue of the treasure which was remaining, to take ouer into Natolia vnto his eldest sonne, and passing by an Orchard neere to the sea side, where he had appointed to take ship, in the meane time whilest the ships were in furnishing he late downe vnder a tree, and began to curse his sonne, and to alke vengeance vpon him, for that he had so despised his father and was become so vnpious a wretch.

Zelymus vnderstanding of his fathers departure, came into the orchard where his father was, seeming to be very hearie, and much lamenting that his father would so priuilie depart and go away, seeing that he desired not the gouernment of the Empire, but was contented only with the title thereof. O father (said he) doe not thus priuilie depart away: do not procure this shame to your sonne, who so tenderlie loueth you. Let me haue but the name onelie, and be you the Emperour indeed. The end of your naturall life most patientlie I shall expect, which I pray God may long continue. And thus vsing many faire & flattering words to his father, he commanded a banquet with many daintie imbets to be brought vnto him, but tempered and infected with poyson. Which alsoone as Baiazetes had begun to taste of, and felt the strength of the poyson working in his bodie, he tooke his last farewell of his sonne, and going out of the citie accompanied with a great retinue of men yelling and crying out in the streetes, in the middle of his iourney fell downe and miserablie died, in the yeare of our Lord, 1512. Here mayst thou see, good Reader, a cursed brood of this Turkish generation, where the father dieth in curling the sonne, and the sonne raigneth by poysoning his father.

Zelymus the 11. after Ottomannus.

After that this wretched Zelymus had exercised his barbarous cruelties vpon his father, with like impietie he seeketh the destruction of his brethren and their children, first beginning his murther with the fiue children his nephewes, which were the sonnes of his dyas brethren before departed. Which done, then remained his other two brethren yet aliue, Acomates and Cocuthus with their children, likewise to be destroyed. Of whom the one had three sons, whom the father sent to Zelymus his brother, and their vncle, with faire and gentle words to entreat him to be good vnto their father, offering to him their dutie and seruice in all things, honouring him also as Emperour. But cruell Zelymus commanded forthwith his said Nephewes to be strangled. The father hearing of the cruell murther of his sonnes, leauing house and home, went and hid himselfe in mountains, where he liued for a space with heardes and wild beasts, but being betrayed by one of his men, was brought to Zelymus, and so was strangled.

Chylliopherus Richerius, writing of these matters, seemeth something to differ from other stories, and saith, that Zelymus after the death of his brother Cocuthus, came to Burlia, where he, vnder the colour of making a great triumph, ordeined a feast for his friends and kinsfolke, whereunto were called especiallie his nephewes: who then at the end of the feast calling his nephewes aside (as vnder the pretence of conferring with them secretlie about his necessarie affaires) committed them to his seruants to be strangled & put to death. All this while Acomates his other brother, through the helpe and instruction of his mother, was kept out of the tyrants hands, till at length, after great labour and search made how to get him, certaine forged letters were cast abroad, wherein was contained that Acomates, to reuenge the great impietie and subdue the tyranny of Zelymus his brother, should then himselfe abroad. Which if he would doe, he should find friends enow to take his part. Acomates circumuented with these subtill traines, partly for hope of reuengement, partly for desire of the Empire, shewed himselfe abroad with such power and strength as he had: who being set vpon incontinent by Zelymus his brother, was ouercome in battell, and falling from his horse, being a man corpulent and grosse, and his horse falling vpon him, was so ouerpressed and slaine.

Touching the death of this Acomates, Spondeus some what differing from this narration, addeth moreouer & saith, that he was not killed with the fall from his horse, but sitting all dismaied vpon a stone, and seeing no other remedie but death, desired the Captaine, taking his rings from his fingers, to deliuer the same to his brother, desiring him that hee might not be put to any extreme cruelties of death, but that he gentlie would suffer him to be let blood in the bath, and so to die. But Zelymus being not ignorant of this, subiected his tormenters, who binding his hands behind him, with their feet call him downe vpon the ground, and so diuiding his neck with a corde, did strangle him. This Acomates had two sons, who hearing of the death of their father, did flie to Ismael Sophus, who hearing of the death of their father, did flie to Ismael Sophus, who hearing of the death of their father, did flie to Ismael Sophus

The reigne of this Turke was but short in number of yeares; but in number of his murders and cruell bloudshed it might seeme exceeding long, which lived more like a braff then a man; for he neuer spared any of his friends or kindred. His father first he poysoned, his brethren and all his cosens he quelled, leauing none of all his kindred aliue. Moreouer, his chiefe and principall captaines for small occasions he put to death, as Mullapha, Calogere, Cerdeme, Bollaig his sonnes law, and Iuntabassa.

The cruelty of Selymus put to death his brethren.

It is said moreouer that he intended the poysoning of his owne sonne Solyman, sending vnto him a shirt infected with poyson, because he feared something fearly to speake against the cruell deuiseme of his father: But by the meanes of his mother, the gift being suspected, was giuen to another which was his chamberlaine, who putting on the shirt, was stricken with the poyson thereof, and therewith all died.

As touching his Turke Selymus, by the way here may be noted how the secret prouidence of the Lord kept him occupied with his Turkish warres at home, while that the reformation of Christian religion here in Europe the same time begun by Martin Luther, might the more quietly take some rooting without disturbance or interruption. For so it appeareth by the computation of time, that in the dayes of this Selymus, Martin Luther first began to write against the popes indulgences, which was in the yeare of our Lord, 1516.

Dayes of Selymus the Turke, wherein the reformation of religion began.

Solymannus the 12 after Otthomanus.

Solymannus the only sonne of Selymus succeeded after his fathers death, who in the first beginning seemed to some to be simple and sheepish, and not meete for the Turkish gouernment. Wherefore certaine of his nobles consulting how to depose him, intended to set vp another Emperour. In which conspiracie, especialie are named Cairbeius and Gazelles. This Cairbeius was he that betrayed before Camplan the Sultan of Egypt to Selymus, as is aforesaid: who now also being in consultation with Gazelles and other about this matter, detected them all vnto Solyman. Whereupon the said Gazelles and his fellowes being thus detected, were put to death by Solyman, declaring thereby that he was not so sheepish as he was thought of them to be, and as also by his acts afterward did more appeare.

Solymannus, after this execution done vpon the conspiratours, taking his voyage into Europe, first besieged Belgradum: which being a citie in Hungarie, was the strongest fort of all the Romaine Empire, and the chiefe defence at that time, of all Christendome: which also being assaulted before time by Amurathes the 2. was valiantly defended by Joannes Huniades as is aboue specified. But here now lacked such a one as Huniades was: For the kingdome of Hungarie at that time, lay vnder the gouernment of Ludouicus a young king, vnexpert and of a simple wit. Whom other Princes, and specially the couetous churchmen did so pill and poll, that they left him nothing but onlie the bare name and title of his kingdome: whereby he being vnfurnished both of men and money, was vnable to match with such an enemie.

Solymannus againe besieged Belgrade. See before pa. 682.

Another vantage also the Turkes had in besieging of Belgrade: For the christian princes at that time were in ciuill dissension and variance amongst themselues: and the pope with his churchmen also were so busie in suppressing of Luther, and of the gospell then newly springing, that they minded nothing else, except it were to maintaine the wealth of their owne belies. Which pope if he had set his care (as his dutie was) so much in stirring vp princes against the common enemie, as he was bent to deface the Gospell, and to persecute the true professors thereof: some might be haue brought to passe, not only that Belgrade might haue beene defended against the Turk, but also that to be recouered againe which was lost before: and moreouer might haue stopped the great dangers and perilles which now are like to fall vpon the religion & church of Christ: which the Lord of his great mercy auert and turne away.

Discord amongst Christian princes, the cause of the losse of Belgrade.

The popes Clergie in Saints, Lawes, Decrees, Councels, Glosers, Decretals, Canons of Christendome.

Cerres what soeuer the pope then did, this had been his dutie, letting all other things apart, to haue had an earnest compassion of so many miserable and lost captiues, which were fallen from their faith and religion, into the miserie and slauerie of the Turke: and withall, to haue set all meanes possible to haue reuoked them, as lost sheepe into the folde againe: Which then might some haue been done, if prelates and princes ioyning together in christian concord, had vsed so well the publicke glorie of Christ and soules of christians, as they tendered their owne priuate, worldly, and friuolous quarels. And admit that the pope had conceiued neuer so much malice against Luther, his quarell also being good: yet the publike church standing in such danger, as it then did by the inuasion of the Turke, reason would, nature leode, religion taught, time required, that a good prelate forgetting lighter matters, should rather haue laid his shoulder to the releuding of so great a danger, as then was imminent both to himselfe, and the vniuersall church of Christ: But vnto his quarell being vntuft, and the cause of Luther being most iust and godly, what is to be said or thought of such a Prelate, who for bearing the Turke, whom in a time so dangerous he ought chiefly to haue resisted, persecuted the truth, which he should specialie haue maintained: But Christ for his mercy sake for his church and sic by zealous princes and prelats, if not to recouer that that is lost, yet at least to retaine that little which is left.

Turne compasses lacking in the Pope.

Solyman therefore taking his occasion, and vsing the commoditie of time, while our princes were thus at variance betwixt themselues, without any resistance or interruption, brought his armie into Belgrade, in the yeare of our Lord, 1521. Which citie being but sleenderly defenced, the Turke through his vnderminers, guns and other engines of warre, without great difficultie, and with little losse of his souldiours, some subdued and ouercame.

The citie of Belgrade won of the Turke.

After this victorie, Solyman resting himselfe a while here, and calling in his mind how to make all sure behinde him, for feare of enemies to come vpon his backe, thought it expedient for his purpose if he might obtaine the Iland of Rhodes: for that only remained yet Christian betwixt him and Asia: therefore the next yere following, he brought his armie of 450. ships, and 300. M. men, to the besieging thereof. This Rhodes was a mightie and strong Iland, within the sea called Mare mediterraneum. The inhabitants whereof at the first did manfully resist the Turke, sparing no labour nor paines for the defence of themselues and of all Christendome: But afterward being brought to extremitie, and pinched with penurie, being also no able to come from the Christians, some that began to languish in themselues. The Turks in the meane time casting vp two great mountaines with strength of hand, two miles off from the citie, like rolling trenches caried them before them neere vnto the citie, in the tops whereof they planted their ordinance and artillerie to batter the citie. The master of the knights of the Rhodes was then one Philippus Villadamus a Frenchman, in whom no diligence was lacking that appertained to the defence of the citie. The Rhodians likewise so valiantlie behaued themselues vpon the walls, that with their shot all the ditches about the citie were filled with the carcasles of dead Turks. Besides this, such a disease of the bloudie flixe raigned in the Turks campe, that 30. M. of them died therof: and yet for all this, Solyman would not cease from his siege begun: who at length by vnderminers cast fire vnder the bamures and vttermost parts of the citie, man ground fell more and more vpon the Rhodians, and with mortarie peeces so battered the houses, that there was no free place almost standing in all the citie. And thus continued the siege for the space of fiue or sixe moneths, and yet all this while came no helpe vnto them from the Christians. Wherefore they being out of all hope, through the aduice of Villadamus yeelded themselues vnto the Turke, vpon condition that he would spare them with life and goods: which conuention the Turke kept with them faithfullie and truelie.

Rhodes besieged.

Thus Solyman with his great glorie and vtter shame to all Christian princes and also ruine of all Christendome, got the noble Ile of Rhodes, although not without great losse and detriment of his armie: insomuch that at one assault 20. thousand Turkes about the walles, were slaine with fire, smoke, stones, and other engines. Whereby it may be coniectured what these Rhodians might or would haue done, if succor had come to them from other Christian princes as they looked for. This citie was won vpon Christmas day, An. 1522.

Rhodes won of the Turke.

This conquest of Rhodes obtained, Solyman the 4 yeare after bringeth backe his armie againe into Hungarie, where he found none to resist him but onely Ludouicke the young K. who being accompanied with a small armie, and nothing able to match with the Turke, yet of a hastie rashnesse and vaine hope of victorie, would needes set vpon him: who if he had staid but a little, had prospered the better. For Joannes Claunoda being a capitaine well exercised in Turkish wars before, was not farre off, comming with a sufficient power of able souldiours. But Paulus the archbishop of Colott, a Franciscane Frier, a man more bold then wise, with his temeritie and rashnesse troubled all their doings: For the whole summe of the armie of the Hungarians, contained in all but onely foure and twentie thousand horsemen and footmen, who at length comming vnto the battel, and being compassed about with a great multitude of the Turkes armie, were brought into great distresse. The Turks twice shot off their peeces against the Christian armie: yet scarce was any Christian touched with the stroke thereof: which was thought it to be done of purpose, because they were Christians which had the ordering of the guns, for then the speciall gunners of the Turkes were Christians, whom for the same cause, Anno. 26. Then the Turkes horsemen comming vpon the backe of the Christians armie, compassed them about, and by reason of their multitude, ouercharged their horsemen. Amongst whom was slaine the same time the archbishop frier abouesaid, with the bishops of Strigone and Varadine and many other nobles beside. Also the King himselfe being destitute of his necessarie aide and succour, was compelled to flie into a marish, where he falling from his horse, being heauie laden with his harnesse, was not able to rise againe, but there miserablie perished.

Ferdinandus of Hungarie.

After the decease of Ludouicke, Ferdinandus succeeded in the the kingdome, being duke of Austria and king of Hungarie. Then Solyman setting contention betwixt Joannes Clauoda and Ferdinandus for the kingdome of Hungarie, sped his voyage to deface rite of Buda, which also in short time he made to be yeelded vnto him, vpon condition that they should escape with their liues and goods: which condition some say he kept, and some say he did not. Besides Buda diuers places and munitions the said Turke, contrarie to his league made before, did spoile and waste, as Varadinum, Quinque Ecclesias, and other forts and munitions moe, bordering about the confis of Hungarie.

Buda, Varadinum, and the citie called Quinque ecclesiæ taken of the Turk.

Contention betweene Ferdinandus, and Clauoda.

Clauoda flieth to the Turkes.

In the yeare of our Lord 1529. Ferdinandus king of Hungarie aforesaid, recouered diuers holds gotten of the Turke before, and also warring against Joannes Clauoda his enemie, with whom he had variance (as ye heard before) expulsed him out of his kingdome. Whereupon Clauoda fiying to the Turke, desired his aide. The Turke glad to take that occasion, with great preparation addressed himselfe to returne into Hungarie, where he recouering again the citie of Buda, which Ferdinandus has gotten from him a little before, remoued his armie into Austria, spoiling and destroying by the way all that came to his hands, shewing many examples of great cruelties and tyranny most lamentable to heare & vnderstand.

Horrible examples of the Turkes cruelty.

For of some he put out their eyes, of some he cut off their hands, of some their eares and noses, and of their children he cut off their priuie members. The maydens he corrupted, the matrones had their breasts cut off, and such as were with childe, were ript and their children cast into the fire. And these examples of horrible and barbarous tyrannie, this wretched Turke perpetrated by the way comming toward Vienna a noble citie in Austria, besides the captiues which he tooke by the way and led into seruitude most miserable, mounting to the number of thirtie thousand.

Among other holds by the way as the Turke came, there was a castle called Altenburch, strongly by nature situated, and by art defenced; which castle the Turke intending not to ouerpasse, because he would make all things sure behind him, began to make his assault, and lay his ordinance against it. The warders and keepers of the castle, so soone as the Turke began to lay siege against them, making no resistance, of a womanlie cowardlines, sent their messengers to the Turke, to yeeld themselues readie to doe his commandement, and further him with their victuall. Amongst whom were three hundred Bohemians, who were commanded to follow the host, that the Turke by them might learne what strength was in the citie of Vienna: also where the king was, and what was to be done for the winning thereof.

The castle of Altenburch yeelded to the Turke.

Of whom when the Turke had vnderstanding how all things stood, and how that there were but twentie thousand men in Vienna able to beare armor, and that other cities of Austria would some yeeld if that were gotten, and that Vienna was victualled but for two monethes, and that the king was of late in Boheme; thus the Turke of all things being certified, hauing no doubt in his minde of victorie, made speed toward Vienna: and first comming to Neapolis a citie but 8. miles distant from Vienna, he required them to yeeld themselues: who notwithstanding withstood them, and repulsed them valiantlie. Then the Turkes assigned a place for the pitching of their tents; which because it seemed something too little for such a great multitude, they tooke in more ground to the compasse of seuen miles circuit. The multitude of his armie, which he there planed, is accounted of some to extend to 250 thousand souldiours. The Turke thus being planted, made daille excursions ouer all the countrey of Austria, specially about the citie of Vienna, wasting & spoiling with great cruelties and murther amongst the poore Christians.

Neapolis besieged of the Turke.

The Turkes army of 250. thousand souldiors.

Moreouer, to make all things more sure toward the preparation of the siege, scoutes were sent abroad, & ambushments were laid about the riuer side of Danubius, to prouide that no aide nor victuall should be brought to Vienna. So it pleased the prouidence of the Lord (who disposeth all things) that three daies before the comming of the Turke, Fridericus the Earle Palatine, which was then assigned by the Empire to take the charge of Vienna, was come downe by the riuer of Danubius with 14. M. and with a certaine troope of horsemen well appointed and picked for the purpose. After the comming of this Fridericke, prouision also of victuall was appointed to follow those lie after, by the said riuer of Danubius.

Vienna besieged of the Turke.

In the meane time, they which had the carriage and transporting thereof, hearing how the wayes were laid, and all the passages 10. miles about Vienna, stopped by the Turkes, although they knew the citie to stand in great need of victuall, yet seeing there was no other remedie, rather then it should come to the enemies hand, thought it best to sinke their boats with their carriage, & so they did. Whereby albeit the Christians wanted their releefe, yet were the Turks disappointed of their prap & purpose. The captains which had the keeping of the citie, which were chiefly Fridericus Earle Palatine, Guilielmus Rogendo; filius, & Nicolaus earle of Salme, seeing themselues to haue no counsell against their expectation, although they had great causes to be discouraged, yet calling their courage vnto them, they consulted together for the best way to be taken:

Fridericus earle Palatine, & William Rogendorffius.

Nicolaus earle of Salme, captaine of Vienna.

Seeing that the little citie Neapolis (aboue mentioned) being eight miles distant from them, so valiantlie withstood the Turks, that in one day they sustained seuen greuous assaults against all the maine force of the Turkish armie: by their example and manfull standing, being the more animated and encouraged, thought to abide the vttermost before they would giue ouer; and first plucking downe all the suburbs, and buildings without the walles, whereby the enemie might haue any succour, they willed all the farmers and inhabitants about the citie to haue themselues, and to bring in their goods within the walles. Such places as were weake within the walls, they made strong. About the towers and munition of the walles, they prouided rampiers and bulwarks distant 80. foote one from another, to keepe off the shot; and euery man had his place and standing awarded to him vpon the wall, and his office appointed what to doe: but especialie that side of the citie which lieth to the riuer of Danubius, they fortified after the best wise: for that way only now remained for victuall to be transported from the Bohemians vnto them. Wherefore 8. enfignes were assigned to the keeping of the bridge, and in the plaine, which was like an Iland inclosed within the riuer, a sufficient garrison of horsmen were placed, lying within the gunshot of the citie, to the intent that if any graine or victuall were sent from the Bohemians, they might preuide the same safelie to be brought into the citie.

Diuision within the citie of Vienna, against the Turke.

Bridges made to transport victuall.

These things thus being disposed and set in order, L. William Rogendorffe, to assay the strength of the Turkes, made diuers rodes out with his horsemen, albeit much against the minds of the Austrians: who knowing the maner of the Turkes, thought it better to suffer them, while either with time they might be ouerwearied, or for lacke of victuals consumed. Among many and sundry skirmishes which the Christians had with the Turkes, one especialie was to our men purposerous: in which certaine of the horsemen espying a small troope of the Turkes scattering abroad from their company, made out after them, who suddenly and guilefullie were inclosed and circumuented by the Turks, before they could recouer the gates of the citie, and so were all taken aliue: Of whom three were sent from the Turkes into the citie, to declare to the Viennians what strength they had seene in the campe of their aduersaries, and to solicite them to yeeld their citie for feare of punishment which would follow: The residue they reserued to torments and punishment, whom in the sight of the whole armie, and of the Christians (which should tell the same to the citizens) they caused euery man to be bounde with soure horses a peece, and so to be dismembred and pluckt asunder.

Good counsell and experience refused.

Rash hardinesse of our Christians and inconsiderate dealing with the Turke.

The wretched cruelty of the Turkes against the Christian captiues.

After this done, the barbarous Turke immediatlie sent his Herald to talke with the captaines of the citie, whether they would yeeld the citie vpon honest conditions, or else would abide the arbitrement of warre. If they would gentlie submit themselues, they should haue all gentlenesse to them shewed: If they would be stubborne, and stand to their defence, hee would also stand to his siege begun, so that he neither would spare man, woman, or child. To this the captaines answered againe, that they were contented, Solyman to stand to his siege begun, and to doe his vttermost, what he would, or what he could. As for them, they were at appoint to defend themselues and their citie so long as they might: the euent and fall of victorie to be doubtfull, and many times so to happen, that they which begin the warre, are wearied sooner then they which be prouoked: neither againe, that they were so vnmindfull either of themselues, or of their countrey, but that they did remember well what they are, and what they be called, named to be Germaines: who vse alwaies first to allay the aduersarie, what he is able to do, and not rashlie to commit themselues into their enemies hands.

The message of the Turke to the Viennians.

The answere of the Viennians to the Turke.

Solymannus not a little disdaining at this answer, first burning and consuming all the villages, houles, and places round about the citie, inserting also the springs and fountains which gaue water into the citie, and so stopping all passages, that no victuall should haue way into them, began with angrie mood to approch more neere to the citie, with three great camps; sending them word in scorne and contumelie, by one of his captiues, that if they stood in need of help of soulditors, he would send vnto them the 300. Bohemians (mentioned a little before) to aide them in their defence. To whom the Palatine directed answer againe, that they had more soulditours in the citie then they needed. As for the Bohemians which had reuolted themselues, he might doe with them what he would, for Vienna stood in no great need of them.

Solymannus approcheth Vienna with 3. great armies.

In the meane time a messenger comming from Ferdinandus, was priuilie let in by night into the citie, which brought word that they should play the part in keeping out the enimie a while: for it would not be long, but both Ferdinandus and Carolus his brother, with the strength of all Germanie, should bee readie to releue them. At which message the hearts of the soulditors began somewhat to be chearer, and to contemne the huge multitude of the aduersaries, being so great as they neuer did behold, nor did euer almost heare of before. The largenesse of whose armie, extended to no lesse in compasse (as is aboue said) then of seuen miles rounde about the citie walles.

A messenger let in from Ferdinandus to Vienna.

The siege of Vienna begunne.

Long it were to recite the whole order of this terrible siege, with all the parties and circumstances thereof. Briefly to touch so much as shall suffice for this historie, with fewer words then were stropes given at the siege thereof: this is to be iudged and confessed, whosoever beholdeth the number and fiercenesse of the Turkes, the absence of king Ferdinandus, the lacke of prouision and victuall within the citie, the noise of the guns, the violence of the shot, the terros of the fight, and yet no succour sent vnto them: that the custodie of that citie was no mans doing, but the arme only of the Lord God of hosts, according to the true saying of the Psalme: Vnlesse the Lord doe keepe the citie, the watchmen watch in vaine, which watch to saue it: Vnlesse the Lord doe build the house, the builder striueth in vaine, which labour vpon him to build it. Experience thereof in keeping this citie may well appeare.

The Turkes power and ignorance in keeping the strength of Austria.

First Solymannus bending his shot and ordinance against the citie, beat downe to the ground the bannures with all the vttermost suburbs of the citie, and that in such a short moment of time, that the harts of the Viennians a little before refreshed, were nowe as much appalled against with feare, misdoubting which themselues, lest the Turke with the same celerite and violence, would haue preuailed against the inward walles, as he did in beating downe the outward bannures. And no doubt the same time the Turke had put the city in great hazard, had not night comming on, broken off the siege for that day.

The slaughter of the Turkes about the walles of Vienna.

In the meane time the citizens laboured all night in repairing and refreshing the walles, to make all things sure against the next assault. The next day early in the morning, the Turkes approching the citie against with a new assault, thinking to scale the walls, were repulsed and manfully resisted by the Germanes, that vnneth any pitches about the walles could be seene for the bodies of the dead Turkes, wherwith they were replenished: so that the Turkes were faine to fight standing vpon the bodies of their which were slaine. By the which calamitie the force of the enemie was not a little abated.

The manfulnesse of captaine Rogendorffius against the Turkes.

It happened the same time, that a company of the Turkes being spied out of the citie wandring out of order, the captaine Rogendorffius with two legions of horsmen issuing out of the citie gate called Sa[illegible]maria, and so pasling closelie vnder the hils side, did set vpon them, that they slewe a great number of them: the rest being driuen to take the riuer, vpon swift staues and that likewise they destroyed, and so retired backe into the citie againe. By this victorie the captaine Rogendorffius began to be terrible to the Turks. For in the same skirmish (as after was knowne) were slaine of them so many, that of 5000. and three hundred horsmen and footmen, scarse 140. escaped alive.

Another assault of the Turkes against Vienna.

Solyman disdaining at this repulse, thought to proue another way, and so bringing his power toward the gate called the kings gate, there making his trenches and bulwarkes, planted his ordinance, with the violence whereof the walles were so battered and shaken, that no man was able there to stand. Wherefore the Turk hauing 2. great breaches made in the wall, commanded his soldiors couertlie in the darke smoke of the gunpowder to preasle into the citie. The like also was done at the Scotish tower, whereby the citie was inuaded in 2. sundry places at one time. The Viennians at the first freshly began to withstand them, new soldiors still comming in the place of them that were slaine and hurt: and so this assault continuing more then six houres together, our men began at length to languish and faint, not only in strength but also in courage: wherby the citie had been in great danger of losing, had not the two aforesaid captaines Rogendorffius in the one place, and the Earle of Salme in the other place, manfullie encouraged the soldiors to abide the brunt, and to beare out a while the violence of the Turkes, promising that immediatlie they should haue aide from Ferdinandus.

Another repulse of the Turkes.

In the meane time the Turks came so thick for the greedines of the victorie, scaling, climing, and fighting vpon the walles, that had it not bin for the preale and throng of the great multitude of the Turks, comming so thicke that one of them could not fight for another, Vienna that same day had bin taken and vtterlie lost: But by the policie of the captaines giuing a signe within the citie, as though new soldiors were called for, our men began to be encouraged, and the Turks hearts to be discomfited.

Vienna vndermined by the Turkes.

When Solymannus saw his armie the second time repulsed, he began to attempt a new way, purposing by vndermining to ouerthrowe the citie: in the which worke specially he vsed the helpe of the Illyrians, of whom he had a great number in his campe, expert in that kind of feat. These Illyrians beginning to breake the earth at the gate Carinthia, and comming nere to the foundations of the Tower, which they by strength of hand attempted to break, could not worke so closelie vnder the ground, but they were perceiued by certaine men aboue, which were skilfull and expert in that kinde of matter who contrariwise vndermining against them, and filling their trenches as they went, with gunnepowder, so conueied their traine, that when fire should be set vnto it, the violence thereof should brast out by the trenches of the enemies: which done, suddenly the ground beneath made a great shaking, so that the tower did cleane asunder, and all the vnderminers of the Turks working in their trenches, were smothered and destroyed: which came to the number (as it was supposed afterward) of 8000. persons: insomuch that yet till this day a great number of dead mens sculs are found in the ground.

Another assault of the Turkes against Vienna.

When Solyman saw that this way also would not serue, & had prouie intelligence that the walles about the gates of Stubarium were negligentlie kept, and that he might haue there more easie entrance: secretlie he conueyeth about 10. garrisons of fresh soudiors, in such sort as the townesmen should not perceiue them: who came so suddenly vpon them, that they had filled the ditches, and were vpon the top of the fortresses & munitions, before that our men were aware of them, or could make themselues readie to resist them. For although there was no lacke of soudiors within the citie, yet for so much as the whole brunt of the siege did lie, specialli at the 2. gates afore said, from whence the soudiors which were there warding, could not bee well remoued, for a theft the rescuers (which within the citie were readie for all sudden aduentures) were sent to the walls: by whose comming, those few which kept the enemies off before, being sore hurt and wounded, were succoured and sent to surgerie: and thus the said assault continued terrible and doubtfull vntill the darke night comming vpon them, they could not well know the one from the other. In this bickering were counted of the Turkes to be slaine, more then fiue thousand.

The Turkes repulsed.

Then the captaine Rogendorffius commanding the valiant standing of his soudiors, misdoubting with himselfe (as it happened indeed) that the Turks would not so giue ouer, but would set vpon him the next day with a fresh assault, preuenting with all diligence for the purpose, made vp the breaches of the walles, and prepared all things necessarie for resistance. The next morning following, which was Saunching tarke and mistie, the Turkes thinking to preuent our men with their sudden comming, began a sundie to bicker vpon the toppe of the walles.

It would require a long tractation here to describe the great distresse and danger that the citie those three dayes following was in. During all the which time, there was no rest, no intermission, nor diligence lacking, either in the enimies, fighting against the citie, either in our men in defending the same. For the Turkes besides the multitude of the great ordinance, wherewith (as with a great tempest of gunshot) they neuer ceased, still battering the walles and beating the munitions of the citie, sent also such heaps and multitudes of the Turkes, to the scaling and climing of the walles, that vnneth with all the ordinance & shot of the citie, either the violence of them could be broken, or the number of them diminished: till at the last the soudiors of the Turkes, perceiuing themselues able by no meanes to preuaile, but only to run in danger of life, & to do no good, began to wrangle among themselues, grudging and repuning against their dukes and captaines, imputing the whole cause only to them, that the citie was yet vntaken, seeing there was in them neither diligence nor good will lacking: and so ceased the siege for that time.

Another assault of the Turkes repulsed.

Solymannus perceiuing his soudiors thus dailie to go to wracke, of whom he had lost alreadie more then eightie thousand, and that with long tarying he could do no good, being also in lacke of forrage, for that the countrey about him was wasted: beginneth to consult with his captaines and counsellors, what remained best to be done. Of whom the most part aduised him to raise his siege, and better to prouide for himselfe. Which to doe, many causes there were that moued him.

The Turkes at variance amog themselues.

After this, when Solymannus had purposed in himselfe with his last and strongest siege, to try against the citie the vttermost that he was able to doe, and had encouraged his soudiors to prepare themselues in most forcible wise thereunto: the soudiors shewed themselues much vnwilling to returne againe from whence they were so often repulsed before: by reason whereof great commotion began to rise in the Turks camp. The rumor thereof when it came to Solymans eares, hee fiercelie bis grand capitaine, to keepe all the soudiors in order and obedience: or if they would be stubborne, to compell them whether they would or not, to accomplish his commandement. Who comming to the soldiors, shewed to them the great Turks message; and to animate and encourage them, declared that the opportunitie of the time present was not to bee neglected, neither could they now without great shame giue ouer, after so many assaults attempted: Who if they would sustaine but one brunt more, the victorie were in their owne hands. The townesmen he said were wasted, and their victuals spent: and the more to inflame their minds, he promised them not onelie great thanks and reward of their Emperour, but also the whole spoile of the citie, in recompence of their trauell.

The Turk and his soudiors could not agree.

The Turkes encreately his soldiors.

But when all this could not stir vp the sturdie stomacks of the tired Turkes, vsing compulsion where perswasion would not serue, he appointed a number of horsemen to be set at their backes, whereby to inforce them, either to goe forward, or if they denied, with guns & speares to destroy them. The Turks seeing themselues in such a strait, that whether they went or taried, it was to them like perill, yet would they not set forward except the captaine would take the venture before them. Who warding forward in his arraie, thus spake vnto his fellowes, saying: Doe you forsake your faith and allegiance, and betray the Emperour of Constantinople vnto the Christians if you will: but I will discharge my dutie towards the Romain wealth and my Emperour, and with that word aduanced his ensigne, making toward the citie walles. Whom when other followed and still mo and mo pressed after, so it came to passe that whole routs of them were ouerthrowne and slaine of our men vpon the walles, before it was known what they meant.

Compulsion of men seeruth not where the Lord defendeth.

The slaughter of the Turkes at Vienna.

Other terrified by their example, gaue backe and left their araie, and winding themselues by by-waies and vnder couert of hils, returned againe into their tentes, and so came it to passe, that the strength of the enemies daile more and more decreasing, they had lesse hope euerie day more then other of obtaining the citie. For besides the innumerable slaughter of Turkes vpon the walles, the townesmen also watching the forragers and purueyers of the Turkes, as they ranged about for victuall for the campe, euer as occasion serued them, did compasse them about, & so encountred with them by that way, that of a whole Legion, scarlie the tenth part returned againe to their fellowes aliue, by meanes whereof the courage of the enemies began greatlie to faint. Whereby such a marueilous alteration happened, that as our men began to receiue more hope and courage, so the Turkes began still more to dispe and to languish with despaire, so that at length scarce durst they appeare without the bounds, where they were entrenched, but onelie in light skirmishes, when they were prouoked by our men to come out, and to shew themselues.

The Turke beginneth to take counsell to retire.

Solymannus perceiuing his soudiors thus dailie to go to wracke, of whom he had lost alreadie more then eightie thousand, and that with long tarying he could do no good, being also in lacke of forrage, for that the countrey about him was wasted: beginneth to consult with his captaines and counsellors, what remained best to be done. Of whom the most part aduised him to raise his siege, and better to prouide for himselfe. Which to doe, many causes there were that moued him.

Solymannus his departure with great shame and losse.

First, the losse of his men, which daily were cut from him by great numbers, besides them which lay in his camp wounded, or sicke, or famished. Secondlie, lacke of victuall. Thirdlie, the approching neare of winter. But the chiefest cause was, for that he heard Frederike Palatine aboue mentioned, comming with a great army at Ratisbone towards Vienna, and there had done great molestation to a great number of the Turkes forragers, whom by the way hee preuented and so enclosed in the woods, that he slew them. Wherefore when Solyman had intelligence, thinking it not best to abide the coming of the Palatine, made hast with bagge and baggage to remoue his campe and to retire: and first sending away his carriage before him, made speed himselfe with his armie, to follow hastilie after.

Solymannus moouerth and raiseth his siege from Vienna.

The Viennians, when they heard of the remouing away of the Turkes, although at the first they scarlie beleeued it to be true, being afterward certified out of doubt, both of their remouing, and also of the order thereof, how it was in a manner of a flight or chase, were greatly desirous to make out of the citie after them. Wherein, albeit the presence of the Palatine with his armie, if he had beene there present, might haue stood them in great stead, yet notwithstanding they tooke the opportunitie of the time present, and issuing out of the citie, in most speedie wise, set after them with their horsemen: and first ouerpassing the tents (where the Turks had pitched their stations or pauilions) for hacke of the lawe: they made such pursuite after them, that within little time they ouertooke the rereward or latter end of the armie, whereof they made such hauocke and destruction, that (as the author reporteth) there was neuer a shot of the pursuers, nor weapon drawne, nor stroke striuen, which light in vaine. Which was no hard thing for our men to doe: For as the Turkes in their flight went scattered out of order and array, neither would they in the rereward for any thing to farre off from ieopardie) returne backe to helpe their fellowes, it was easie for our men, without resistance, to come vpon their backs as they would. Yet notwithstanding in long pursuite, when our men could not for the carriage of the Turkes, which was wont in armies to come alway behind after the host; and suspecting (as truth was) some ambush to be left in priuie waite behind them, to come betwixt them and home: called themselues to retrait, and consulted vpon the matter, thinking good, first to send out certaine scouters, to espie and bring them word, where the enemies laie, and what was the number of them. Whereof when intelligence was giuen them, that the remnant of the Turkes armie was remaining in the tents behinde, wood was sent to their fellowes in Vienna, to issue out, and to ioyne also with them against the taile of the Turkes, which had entrenched themselues within the campe. Other were appointed to followe the chase, lest peraduenture the Turkes seeing our men to recule back, might returne againe vpon them and helpe their fellowes. Which things being thus ordered and appointed, in the meane time, while part of the Viennians were bouncing after the maine armie, the rest encountred with them that were left in the campe. Who seeing themselues ouermatched, first defenced their campe with a deepe Ditch and bulwarke, to delay the time, vntill some helpe might come to them from the armie. Secondly, they directed messengers to the Christians, to intreat for peace. Thirdly, they conueyed their priuie letters vnto Solyman for spedie aide and reseue. But all the waies and passages being stopped by the Christians, their letters were intercepted, and so the miserable Turkes being destitute of all hope and succour, seeing no other remedie, made out of their campe, to hasard and proue the vttermost for their defence: but in conclusion, in their desperate venture they were enclosed about by our men on euery side, and there put to the sword and slaine, a few onelie creeped, who escaping out very hardlie by secret passages, shifted after the rest of their fellowes, as well as they could. Their carriage and other furniture left behind them in their tents, was distributed amongst the soudiors, onelie such things reserued as might serue for the publike vse and commoditie of the citie.

The Turkes flaine.

The Viennes of the Turkes flaine in the campe.

Thus through the mercifull protection and benefit of almightie God, Austria was deliuered from the fierce and barbarous hostilitie of the cruell Turkes: not withstanding that neither Ferdinandus the king, nor the Emperor his brother were there present, but onelie the power of God, through the valiantnesse of the worthie Germanes, defended that citie, in defence whereof consisted the safetie and deliuerance (no doubt) of all these west parts of Christendome. For the which immortall praise and thankes be vnto our immortall GOD in Christ our Lord, according as he hath of his most gratiousnesse and worthie deserued. Wherein by the way take this for a note (gentle Reader) how and after what manner Gods blessing goeth with the true reformers of his religion, and so much the more is it to be noted, for that the Turkes in so many battels and sieges heretofore, were neuer so repulsed and foiled, as at this present time in incountring with the protestants and defenders of sincere religion. This citie of Vienna was besieged and deliuered the peare of our Lord 1529. The assaults of the Turke against the citie, are numbred to be 20. and his repulses as many. The number of his armie which he first brought, was 250000. whereof were reckoned to be slaine 80. thousand & aboue. During the time of his siege, he led away out of the countrey about many captiues, virgins & matrones he quelled, and cast them out naked, the children he sticke vpon stakes.

God his blessing goeth with the maintainers of true worship and religion.

Solymannus thus put from the hope of victorie of Vienna, after he had breathed himselfe a while at home, the second peare after, which was an. 1531. repairing his host, returned againe into Hungary, with no lesse multitude then before: where first he got the towne called Gunza, being but sleuderlie kept with a small Garrison. By reason whereof the townesmen and soudiors yelding themselues vnto the Turke, were constrained to agree vpon vnreasonable conditions. Ex Ioanne Rano.

Melchior Soiterus in his second booke writing De bello Pannonico, touching the foresaid towne of Gunza, or Gunzium, differeth herein something from Ranus; declaring how this Gunza, being a small towne in Hungarie, and hauing in it but onelie a hundred soudiors (or as Wolfgangus Dichsterus in his chronicle repeateth, at the most but 200. soudiors) vnder the valiant captaine Nicolas Jurefchitz, defended themselues so manfully and wonderfully, through the notable power of God, against the whole puissance of 200. thousand Turks, that they being notwithstanding distressed with lack and penurie of purueiance, and suddenly of the Turks inuasion, yet with pure courage and promptnesse of hart, sustained the vttermost force and violence of his assaults of that great multitude, for the space of 25. dayes together.

Ex Melch. Soit. lib. 1. de bello Pannonico.

Nicolaus Jurefchitz a valiant captaine.

Although the narration of the author may seeme to some incredible, yet thus he writeth, that what time the great Ordinance and battering peeces of the Turkes were planted vpon two mountaines much higher then the towne, whereby they within the towne were oppressed both before and behinde, insomuch that eight Ensignes of the Turks were already within the towne: yet by the reason of women and children, and other impotent persons, who in the middle of the towne were congregate in an house together, such a noise and clamor went vp to heauen, praying and crying to God for helpe, that the Turkes within the walles, supposing a new army of freshe soudiors to be sent into the towne, for sudden feare, voided the towne, and leaped downe from the walles againe (which before they had got) whom no man either pursued or resisted: for neuer a soudiar almost was left on the walles, which was not either slaine or else wounded with the Turkes ordinance. At what time through the Lords prouidence it so happened, that one Ibzahimus Balla, nere about the Turke, seeing both the towne to be small, and the great destruction of the Turkes in the siege thereof, and that the captaine in no case would yeeld, perswaded to the Turke, declaring how the towne being so little, was not worth the losse of so many men, in the winning whereof there was no gloire, and if they were repulsed, great dishonour might follow: whereby the Turke being perswaded, did follow his counsell, which was this: that Nicolaus the Christian captaine being called vnto him, vnder pledges and safe conduct, should receiue the towne as of his hand and gift, with condition that he should doe no violence to his soudiors left behind and wounded, but should procure such meanes as he could for the recuring of them: and so hee raising his siege departed. Another cause might be also, which moued him so suddenly to raise his siege, for that he heard the Palatine not to be far off in pursuing after him, and therefore taking his flight by the mountaines of the Noricians, he returned with much spoile of Christian mens goods vnto Constantinople. Ex Melchiore Soit. lib. 2. de bello Pannonico.

troublie of Religion betweene the Protestants and the Papists, was referred and set off, to the next generall Councell) that Charles the 5. and Ferdinandus his brother, hauing vnderstanding of the Turke, thus ranging in Hungarie, should collect of the Germaines, Hungarians, and Spaniards, and others, an able armie of eight thousand footmen, and three thousand horsemen to repulse the invasions of the Turke. But Solymannus hauing intelligence of this preparation of the Christian power comming toward him, whether for feare, or whether to espie further opportunitie of time, for his more aduantage and our detriment, refused at that time to tarie their comming, and so hyeding his returne vnto Constantinople, retired with much spoile and pray first before him, as is aboue premised: which was in the yeare of our Lord, 1532.

The Turke warreth against the king of Chaldee. Chaldee vanquished again by Charles 5 Emperour.

Not long after, being the yeare of our saluation, 1534. Solymannus intending two wars at once, first sent Coradinus Barbarossa the Admirall of his Nauies into Africke, to warre against the king of Tunece: whom the Barbarossa also dispossessed and deprived of his kingdome: but Charles the Emperour, the next yeare following, ann. 1535. restored the said king againe into his kingdome, and deliuered in the same voiage 20. thousand captiues out of seruitude.

The same time the Turke also sent another captaine into Hungarie, to warre against Clauioda, while he himselfe taking his course to Persia, planted his siege against the citie Tauris, which he in short space subdued and expugned. Albeit he long enioyed not the same: For Thamas king of the Persians, suddenly comming vpon the Turkes vnprepared, slew of them two, and thousand, and tooke his concubines, to the great foile and reproch of the Turke.

Corcyra the 7. Iland wasted & spoiled by the Turkes.

Two yeare after this, which was the yeare of our Lord, 1537. Solymannus, who could not be quiet at home, nor rest in peace, returning againe out of Asia into Europe with 270. ships, great and little, set vpon Corcyra, another Iland belonging to the Venetians, which he besieged ten dayes, wasting & burning the Townes and fieldes as bee went, besides the destruction of much people therein, whom partlie he slew, partly led away captiues. From thence he sailed to Zacynthus and Cythara, another Iland not far off from Corcyra, bordering nere to the coastes of Cyprus and Grecia. There he suddenly by night inuading the husbandmen in villages and fields, sleeping and mistrusting no harme, drew them out of their houses and possessions, men and women, besides children, to the number of nine hundred, whom he made his bondslaues: burning moreouer their houses, and carying away all the goods and cattell being without the said cities of Zacynthus and Cythara. From thence these helhoundes turned their course to the siege and spoile of Guina, a rich and populous Iland, lying betweene Grecia and Asia. Where first the Genuians did manfully in battaile resist them, and were like to haue preuailed: but being wearied at length and oppressed with innumerable themselues of fresh Turkes, which still were sent in, to relieue the other which were ouercome before, were compelled to flie into the city of Guina. Which city the cruell Turkes (or rather Diuels on earth) with much labour, and violence of their great ordinance set out of their ships, subuerted and cast downe to the ground: the Citizens vnlesse they would be slaine, and after they had burned their houses, and ransacked their goodes, commanded to bee slaine and killed euery one. The women both noble and vnnoble, with their infants, were giuen to the mariners to be abused, and from thence being shipped vnto Constantinople, were led also to perpetuall misery and slauerie, which was in the yeare of our Lord 1537.

This done Solymannus directed his Nauy vnto Apulia, where he set on land 2. thousand footmen, and 2000. horsemen, which spoiled likewise and wasted those parts while the Emperour, the Pope, and the Venetians, were together in war and dissention. Furthermore, the next yeare following, ann. 1538. great attempts began in Stiria; but by the resistance of the inhabitants, the force of the barbarous Turks was repulsed, notwithstanding great slaughes of men and cattell were carried from thence, and the country miserably spoiled. In the which yeare also the Turke turning into Hungary, gaue battaile vnto the Christians in Saua: where though the fraudulent falshod of the captaine Taffianerus (Wolfegangus named him Calcianus, being (as they say) corrupted with money, our men were put to the worse, an. 1538.

After that the Turkes had inuaded the Iland of Corcyra aboue said, the Venetians with Solyman the Turke had ioyned truce for a certaine time, for the which they gaue the Turk 300. thousand crowns, with the citie Neapolis, and Malualia, in the borders of Macedonia. But within 4. or 5. yeares, the Turke to get anew reputed of the Venetians, brake his league, and inuaded their dominions: whereby they were enforced to enter new conditions against him.

In the yeare of our Lord, 1540. the restles Turke making his returne toward Hungarie, by the way passing by Dalmatia, lay against the towne called Newcastle, being defended by the Spaniards. In the which towne because they refused to yeeld themselues, all the inhabitants and souldiors were put to the sword and slaine euery one. This Novum Castellum, or Newcastle, was a strong fort of the Christians, which being knowne in the Turkes power, he had great aduantage ouer all those quarters of Dalmatia, Stiria, Carinthia, and Hungaria. From thence hee proceeded further, keeping his course into Hungarie, where he planted his power against the citie of Buda.

The contention in Hungary betweene Ferdinandus & Clauioda and his successors.

This Buda was a principall citie in Hungarie, about which great contention had bene (as pe haue heard before) betweene Ioannes Clauioda, and Ferdinandus. By reason whereof the Turke occasioned by Clauioda, came into Hungaria and deliuered the citie to Clauioda. This Clauioda liuing not long after, left behind him a sonne, whom being an infant, he committed to the gouernance of one Georgius Monachus, who being left tutor vnto the infant, reduced all Transsiluania, Buda, Iesella, with other parts of Hungarie, which belonged to Clauioda before, to the subiection of the child. Ferdinandus hearing thereof, in a great haste and anger, leuied an armie to recouer his lands in Hungarie, and so laid siege to Buda. Monachus seeing his part weake, first sent his Legat to Ferdinandus, desiring him to talke and conferre with him vpon matters, as he pretended, pertaining to p behoofe of them both. Whereupon both the parties being agreed, the place and manner of their conuention was appointed, and also the day and time assigned. Thus the parties (according to the agreement) conuenting together with their armies, withdrawing a little aside, as they were entred in communication, suddenlie among Ferdinandus men, happened a dag to be heard, which by the heate of the day (as is thought) losing of his owne accord, gaue a cracke. The sound whereof comming to the eares of Monachus, he supposing the same to haue beene discharged against him, in great anger doeth out his swoorde, bidding Ferdinandus auaunt with his doubling dissimulation, saying that he would neuer any more trust the promises of Christians, and immediatlie vpon the same sent to Solymannus the Turke, for aide against the Christians, promising that he would surrender to him free possession of Hungarie, if hee would come and banquish the armie of Ferdinandus lying about the siege of Buda. The Turk maketh no long tarying, but taketh the occasion, and with a mightie power, sheth into Hungarie, and eftsones discharging the hoft of Ferdinandus, and putting them off from the siege of Buda, getteth the city into his owne handes, commanding the sist of Clauioda with his mother to followe after his campe.

Ex epist. Mart. Stellæ, de succes. sionis Turcarum, &c.

In the historie of Ioannes Ranus it followeth, that when Solyman the Turke had thus preuailed against the citie of Buda aforesaid, and against other parts more of Hungary, by the assent of the Empire, one Ioachimus Duke of Brandenburg, Prince Elector, was assigned with a puissant armie of chosen souldiors of all nations collected, to recouer the Citie of Buda from the Turke, and to deliuer the other parts of Christendome from the feare of the Turke, Anno 1542. Which Ioachimus at his first setting forth, appeared so courageous and valiant, as though he would haue conquered the whole world: but this great heate was so slaken in short time by the Turke, that before any great ieopardie was offered vnto him, hee was glad to bee discharged out of the voiage, and with shame enough returned home againe: and would God he had left behinde him in the fields, no more but his owne shame. For the enemies hauing intelligence before of his cowardlie departure, thinking to worke some point of martiall victorie before his going, did set vpon the right wing of his armie (which chiefly consisted of Dutchmen of low Germany) out of the which they tooke away with them aboue 500. strong and valiant souldiors, not killing them, but carying them away aliue. For whom it had beene much better to haue slaine them with their weapon and to haue died manfullie vpon the Turkes, then by yeelding themselues to bee disgarnished of weapon and armour, and so to be left to the cursed courtesie of the foule Turkes. To whom what curtesie was shewed, by the sequele did appeare. For after the Turkes had led them out of Hungarie into their owne Dominion, after a most horrible and beastlie sort they disfigured and mangled them, and so sent them abroad through all Grecia to be witnesses of p Turks victorie. Their kinde of punishment was thus: First they had their right arme thrust through with an yron red hot, whereby they should be vnable and vnmeet to all labour and warrefare. Secondly, their heads were shauen to the verie sculles, after the manner of our Friers and Monkes, when they are newly shauen. Thirdlie, they had all their priuie members cut off from their bodies, to the intent to make them vnfruitfull for propagation; which wound was so grieuous vnto them, that the greatest part of them died thereupon, the few that recouered the torment thereof, led a life more bitter and more miserable then death it selfe. And this kinde of cruelty was executed in order vpo them al: In much like sorte did cruell Pharao exercise his tyranny against the people of God in Egypt: who to destroy the generation of them, caused all the male children to bee drowned in the riuer. Wherefore it is the more to be hoped, that seeing the tyranny of this Turkish Pharao is come to such an extremity, the mercifull goodnesse of God will the more shortly send some Moses or other vnto vs for our speedy deliuerance. This was by the cruell Turkes done, An. 1542. witnessed by Ioannes Ranus, which not only writeth the story, but by the testimony also of his owne eyes recordeth the same to bee true, beholding with his eyes some of the same number in the city of Vienna, who hauing wife and children in Bruselles, either for shame or sorowe had no mind to returne home to his owne house. The falsenesse of the Turkes in keeping no promise with the Christians.

But to returne againe to the city of Buda, from whence we haue digressed, here is not to be pretermitted, what falshod and what cruelty the Turkes vsed toward the Christians there, after their victorie. For after that Solyman the Turke vpon pardoning and submission of the men of Buda, had giuen to them his promise of safety and life, within short time, the said Turke picking a quarrell with them for selling Oxen vnto the Christians, and for bargaining with them, fine all the Magistrates of the said city of Buda like as in all other cities, where former the Christians yeelded vnto him, be neuer, or very rarely kept his promise with them, neither did euer any Christians before neither with the Turke, then they which most constantly did resist him.

An horrible example of the bealtly cruelty of the false Turkes.

And as his promise with the Magistrates of Buda was false and vngodlie: so his cruelty with the souldiers thereof was much more notorious and abominable. For in the expugnation of Buda amongst the rest which were slaine, two Cohorts or bands of Christian souldiers came alue to his hands. To whom, when he seemed at the first to grant pardon of life, he commanded to put on their armor againe, and to dispose themselues in order and battell array after the warlike maner of the Christians. Which when they had accomplished readily, according to his commandement, and hee riding about the ranke of them, had diligently viewed and beholden them a certaine space, at length hee commanded them to put off their armour againe. Which done, certaine of the tallest and strongest of them he picked out, the residue he commanded by his souldiers comming behind them, with swoords to bee cut in peeces and slaine. Of the other, whom he had cleaued and chosen, some he set for markes and buts to be shot at: some he appointed to his two sons, for them to skall with their swoords and trie their strength, which of them could giue the deeper wound, and (as they termed it) the fairer blow, whereby the most blood might follow out of their Christian bodies. The castle of Walpo won of the Turkes.

After the winning of Buda, the Turke purposing not so to cease before he has subdued and brought vnder his obedience all Hungarie, proceeding further with his armie first brought vnder a strong hold of p Christians named Pest or Pesta, where a great number of Christian souldiers partly were slaine, partly were led away to more cruell affliction.

Then he came to another castle called Walpo situate in the confines of Bosna, Croatia, and Hungarie. Which fort or castle he besieged three monthes, while no rescue or aid was sent vnto them, neither from Ferdinandus king of Hungarie, nor from any other Christian prince or princes. Whereupon at length the fort was giuen vp to the Turke, but more through the false treacherie or cowardly heart of the souldiers then of the captaine. Wherein is to be noted an example of Gods iudgements lighting vpon themselues, which meane faithfull toward the innocent.

Sclauonia a towne in Hungary subiours of the Turkes.

Sclauonia was Sclosia. The towne at the first inuasion of the Turkes was won, sacked, and fierced. The castle within the towne, did something hold out for a time, and first requiring truce for 14. daies, to see what aid should be sent, vnto them, to deliberate vpon the conditions that should bee proposed vnto them, after the 14. daies expired, they (trusting to the situation and munition of the place, which was very strong) began for a certaine space stoutly to put backe the enemie: But afterward seeing their walles to bee battered, their foundations to shake (for p Turk had set xij. thousand vnderminers vnder the ditches of the castle) and their strength to diminish, and vndoubting themselues not to be able long to hold out, agreed in like manner to yeld themselues, vpon condition to escape with life and goods. Which condition of sauing their goods, was the losing of their liues, especially of the richer sort. For the Turks perceiuing by that condition, that they were of wealth and substance; omitting the inferiour or baser sort, fell vpon the wealthy men for their riches, and slue them euery one, an. 1543. ibid.

The Turke keepeth no promise.

In the which his historie this is also to be noted, that during the time while the castle of Sclosia was besieged, the villages and pages round about the same, came of their owne accord, submitting and yeelding themselues vnto the Turke, bringing in (as they were commanded) all kind of victuall and forage, into the Turkes campe. Which done, Solyman the Turke commanded all the head men of the pages to appeare before him: which humble obeyed and came. Then the Turke warned them to repaire against the next day after, exercrie one bringing with him his inferiour retinue, and household seruants. Which when they had with like diligence also, according to his commandement accomplished, the Turke immediately commanded them euery one, in the face of his whole armie, to be slaine, and so was this their reward. Which reward, the more that it declareth the bloudie cruelties of the Turke: the more incourage it may minister to our men, the more constantlie to withstand him. Ex Martino Stella.

Strigonium a citie in Hungarie belonging to the Turke.

Another strong towne there is in Hungarie named Strigonium, distant from Buda abouesaid, the space of fiue Dutch miles, against the which the Turkes made great preparation of ordinance, and all other instruments of artillerie necessarie for the siege thereof. Which citie in like manner began also to be compassed and inclosed by the Turkes, before it could be sufficientlie prepared and garnished of our men, but that the archbishop onely of Strigon priuily conueied vnto them 200. men. Such was then the negligence of Ferdinandus king of Hungary, which so slenderlie looked vnto the necessarie defence of his townes and cities. Moreouer, such was the discord then of Christian kings and princes, which in their ciuill dissention and warres were so occupied and hot in needlesse quarrels, that they had neither leisure nor remembrance, to helpe in time there, where true need required. Which slender care, and cold zeale of the christian rulers, not in tendring the publicke cause, while they contended in priuate trifles, hath caused the Turke to come so far as he hath, and yet farther is like, vnlesse the mercie of the Lord doe helpe more, then our diligence. One of the chiefe captaines within the citie, was Spartinus Lascanus, a Spaniard.

Negligence of Christian princes in publicke defence.

The Turkes in the beginning of the siege began first to attempt the citizens with faire wordes, and accustomed promises to yeeld and gently to submit themselues. But they not regarding of the Turkes promises while he refused, and manfullie stood so long as they could to the defence of their city: now and then skirmishing with them in out corners, and killing certain numbers of them: sometime with their shot disturbing their munitions, and breaking the wheeles of their gunnes, &c.

The Strigonians refuse to yeeld.

Three speciall meanes the Turkes vse in winning great forts and cities: great multitude of souldiors: great ordinance and mortary peeces: the third is by vndermining. All which here in the siege of this citie lacked not. This siege continued vehement a certaine space: in which the Strigonians had bozne out foure strong assaults, and slue many thousands of the Turkes, till at length the Turkes either departing away, or els seeming to depart into Buda, the people at last being so perswaded and made to beleeue of some chiefe rulers of the citie (peraduenture not the truth ones) the citizens hoping erected lusth hope and comfort, and singing Te Deum, as though the citie had bene free from all danger, suddenly, by whose counsell it is vnknowne) conueied themselues all out of the citie. 300. horsemen also passed ouer the riuer and departed. The Italians which were vnder Franciscus Salamanca a Spanish captaine hardly could be perswaded by him to abide, which were in all scarse 600.

The Christians of Strigonium retyred out of the citie.

Within three daies after, 300. Germaine souldiours, with two ships laden with shot, pouder, and artillery, were pmitte let into the towne: So that of our men all there were scarse 1300. souldiors. Who seeing the small quantitie of their number, burning and casting downe the towne and suburbes, tooke them to the castle: from whence they beat off the Turks baliantlie with their ordinance, a good space, and with like fire destroied great companies of them, till at last they seeing their walles to faile them, and the whole castle to shake by undermining, but especiallie by the working of a certaine Italian tion surnamed Prodeyner, they gaue ouer. This Italian (whether for feare or falshood, secretly vnknowing to the rest of the feathers, accompanied with two other coniured himselfe downe from the walles, and being brought into the tents of the next captaine vnto Bassa of the Turkes, there in the name of all his fellowes, consented with the Turkes, to giue vp to them the Castle: whereupon the Turkes were bid to cease the shooting. This Italian shortly after with two other Turkes was sent backe to Salmanca his captain, with the Turkes message. The going out of this Italian being prime to the rescue of his fellowes, contrarie to the lawes and discipline of warre, although it seemed to come of his owne head: yet forasmuch as the other souldiers were not sure, but rather suspected lest the other Italians his countrymen had beene in some part of consent therein, and would take his part: neither durst offer him any harme for that his doing, nor yet could well admit with themselues what was best to doe, for feare of panic conspeeracie within themselues.

Thus while Lascarus the chiefe captaine of the Christians aforesaid, with his fellow souldiers, were in a maze what to do or not to doe: in the meane time came out enuning, who giuing a signe both to the Christians and to the Turkes, to hold their hands and weapons, for that it was against all law of warre to fight after peace and truce taken: our men, as they were commanded, went into the inward Tower. The Turkes in the meane time, had got into the Castle, and occupied all the vtter parts. Then was Salamanca by the consent of the rest, sent out to the Turke, who there being staied that night, the next morrow the Turkes hall ot warrant was sent into the Castle, permitting free libertie to the Christians to depart with bag and baggage. Who nam being ready to depart: first were commanded by the Turkes compelling them to vnlode out of all from them their daggers, launces, and battell axes, into the trench. Then comming to the gate to goe out, their spoiles were taken from them, looking then for nothing but present death.

At last when they were come a little further, other were sent to them to discharge them of their helmets, their tergats, curets, and whatsoeuer piece of harnesse was about them. Whereupon great feare came vpon them, lest some great cruelty should be shewed vpon them. Solyman after he had long deliberated with himselfe, whether to kill them or not, at last contrary to all expectation granted their liues: but before they should be dismissed, hee first caused them, in derision of Christianitie, to be bayed with scarues and nookes through out all the Turkish army: and so the next day commanded them being stript out of their coats and apparell, to be rendred againe into the castle by companies, setting ouer them certaine Turkes with cudgels and bats to lay vpon their backes and sides, causing them to burie the dead carcases, and to gather vp the rubbish broken downe from the castle walles, and to secure the ditches. Which done, the next day following he demanded of them by an interpreter, whether they would enter wages with him, and take horse and armour to serue him in his warres: Which condition diuers for feare were contented to take, seeing no other remedie to auoid present death. Some neither by menacing words, nor for ante feare of death, could be compelled thereunto, of whom certaine which stood stoutly in refusing thereof, were presently slaine, whom Turny worthily reckt in the number and catalogue of holie martyrs.

Of the foresaid Christians, part were carried ouer the riuer of Danubius, not without great villanie, and consumelie inough despitefull. For some had their wiues taken from them and carried away, some had their wiues rauished before their face: and such as made or shewed any reluctance thereat, had their liues by vse brought from them cast into the riuer and drowned: also their infants mayoong children, being appointed by the Turkes to the abominable order of the Ianizaries, mentioned before pag. 581. their parents not consenting thereunto, were priuily stole and conueied into the riuer and drowned. All which things are testified by Iohn Martinus Stella, in his epistles in print extant, written to his two brethren, William and Michael, &c. Which Martin Stella moreouer shewes addeth and affirmeth, that he himselfe being the same time at Vienna, did see one of the foresaid wiues, who being holden fast by the haire of the head, yet notwithstanding hauing her haire pluckt off, cast her selfe into the riuer Danubius, for the singular loue to her husband, and so swamme to the ship where he was. And thus this miserable company of Germaines, Spaniards and Italians met together, macerate with labours, with hunger pined, with watchings, dolours, and sorrow consumed, came at length to Schinda.

When the tidings thereof was noised at Vienna, partlie with feare and dread, partly with indignation, all mens hearts were moued and vered diuerslie. Some thought them not worthie to be receiued into their citie, shewing themselues so dastardly and cowardlie. Others thought against that mercie was to be shewed vnto them, and commended their fact, for that they being so few, and vnfurnished of aid, neither able to match by any meanes with such an innumerable multitude of the Turker, kept themselues till better time might serue them. But howsoeuer the matter was to bee thought of, the captaines brought the poore remnant of that rufull company, vnto Posidonium, where the said captaines were laid fast, and there kept in durance, to render account of the whole matter, how it was wrought and handled. And thus haue ye the lamentable storie of Strigonium.

The Turke proceeding in his victories, conducted his armie next vnto Tath, and to the parts lying neere about Comarou. This Tath was also a strong hold in Hungarie, wherein were placed certaine garrisons, partly of the Germans, partly of the Italians. The chiefetain of the Italians was one Annibal Tasso, conditute by Philippus Torsellius. This Tasso was a man well expert in prowesse of warr: but of a filthie corrupt life, and also a foule forcarer, and horrible blasphemer of God and his saints. To make the storie short, this fort of Tath, before any siege was laid vnto it, was yeelded and giuen vp to the turkes: vpon what conditions, or by whose meanes, the author theiwrth not: thus much he theiwrth, that the said Annibal shortly vpon the same, returning into Italie, was commanded by Torsellius aforesaid, to be apprehended and beheaded.

After the turks had subuerted and destroyed the fort of Tath, they turned their power against Alba, surnamed Regalis, for that the kings of Hungary haue been allwaies wont there to bee crowned and buried. This Alba is a little well compacted cite in Hungary, hauing on the one side a marish somewhat foggish or fenne, which made the towne lesse assaultable. But nere to the same was a wood, from the which the Turks euery day with 1000. carts, brought such matter of wood and trees felled for the same purpose, into the marish, that within lesse then 12. daies they made it apt, and hard to their feet, which the townes men thought neuer could bee gone vpon, but only in the hard frosts of winter. At the first beginning of the siege, there stood a little without the munitions in the front of the citie, a certaine Church or Monasterie, which the citizens pretending to maintaine and keepe against the turkes, had priuilie conueighed light matter easilie to take flame, with powder, in secret places thereof, and had bid also fire withall. Which done, they (as against their willes being driuen backe) withdrew themselues within the munitions, awaiting the occasions, when this fire would take. Thus the turkes hauing the possession of the Church, kindeste the fire comming to the powder, raised vp the church, and made a great scatter and slaughter among the barbarous turks. This was not so soone espied of them within the towne, but they issued out vpon them in this disturbance, and slue of them a great number: Among whom diuers of their nobles also the same time were slaine, and one Bassa an Eunuch, which was of great estimation with the turks. Moreouer, in the same skirmish was taken one of those gunners which the French king is said to haue sent to the Turke a little before. Which if it be true, let y christian reader iudge what is to be thought of those christian princes, which not onelie forsaking the common cause of Christs Church ioyned league with the turke, but also sent him gunners to set forward his warres to the destruction of Christs people, and to the shedding of their blood. For whom they knew the blood of Christ to be shed. If this be not true, I shew mine author: If it be, then let the pope see and marke well how his title of Christianissimus, can well agree with such doings.

But to let this matter slepe, although the Turkes (as yee heard) had wonne the fenne, with their policie and industrie, against the citie of Alba, yet all this while the Albanes were nothing inferiour to their enemies, through the valiant helpe and courageous indeuour of Demianus Serrzatus, a captaine of Galane. By whose prudent counsell and constant standing, the vnlie enterprises of the Turkes did little preuaile a long time: till at length, suddenly arose a thick fogge or mist vpon the citie, where as round about beffes, the same did shine bright. Some said it came by Art Magicall, but rather it may appeare to rise out of the fenne or marish, being so preled downe with mens feete and other matter laid vpon it.

The Turkes vsing the occasion of this misty darkenesse in secret wise approching the walles, had got vp to a certaine fortresse, where the Germaines were, before our men could well perceiue them: where they prelled in so thick, and in such number, that albeit the christian souldiors standing stronglie to the defence of their liues, did what valiant men in cases of such extremitie were able to doe: yet being ouermatched with the multitude of the Turkes, and the suddennesse of their coming, gaue backe, seeking to retire into the inward walles. Which when their other fellowes did see to recule, then was there flying of all hands euerie man striuing to get into the citie. There was betweene the outward walles & bannres, and inward gate of the citie, a strait & narrow passage, cast vp in manet of a bancke or causey, ditched on both sides: which passage or ingresse happened the same time to be barred and stopped. By reason whereof the poore souldiors were forced to cast themselues into the ditch, thinking to swimme as well as they could, into the citie: there many of them sticking in the mud, were drowned: one prelling vpon another: many were slaine of their enemies comming behind them, them, they hauing neither hart, nor power to resist. A few which could swim out, were receiued into the city: but the chiefe captaines and warders of the towne were there slaine.

The citizens being destitute of their principall captaines and warriors, were in great perplexitie and doubt among themselues, what to doe, some thinking good to yeeld, some counselling the contrary. Thus while the minds of the citizens were distract in diuers and doubtfull sentences, the magistrats minding to stand to the Turkes gentlenesse, sent out one of their heads vnto the Turke, who in the name of them all, should surrender to him the citie, and become vnto him tributaries, vpon condition they might enioy libertie of life and goods; which being to them granted, after the Turkish faith and assurance, first the souldiers which were left within the citie, putting off their armour, were discharged and sent away. Who being but only 300. left of 4. millyons of Italians, & of a thousand Germaines, by the way were laid for by the Tartarians, for hope of their spoile: so that they scattering asunder one one way, an other an other to saue themselues as well as they could, fled euery one what way hee thought best. Of whom some wandering in woods and marishes fainted for famine: some were taken and slaine by the Hungarians, a few with bare and emptie, and withered bodies, more like ghostes then men, escaped and came to Vienna. And this befell vpon the souldiers.

Now vnderstand what happened to the yeelding citizens. So in flop it followeth, that when the Turke had entred the towne, and had bitten the lepulche of the kings, for thee or tome daies he pretended much clemencie toward the citizens, as though he came not to oppresse them but to bee revenged of Ferdinandus their king, and to deliuer them from the seruitude of the Germanes. On the fourth day all the chiefe & head men of the city were commanded to appeare before the Turke in a plaine, not far from the city, where the condemned persons before were wont to be executed, as though they should come to sweare vnto the Turke. At this commandement of the Turke, when the citizens in great number, and in their best attire were assembled, the Turke contrary to his faith and promise, commanded suddenly a generall slaughter to be made of them all. And this was the end of the citizens of Alba.

In the meane time, during the siege of Alba, the Hungarians meeting sometimes with the horsemen of the Tartarians, which were sent out to stop their victuals from the citie, slew of them at one bickering three thousand Turkes. In which storie is also reported and mentioned of mine author, an horrible sight and example of misery, concerning a certaine captiue (a Christian belike) who comming into Vienna, was found to haue in his scrip 02 satchell the halfe of a yong child of two yeares old, which remained yet vneaten, the other halfe being eaten before, an. 1543. ibid.

Not after this was expugned the castle of Pappa, by the Turkes. Let the castle now of Papa take heed, lest one day it follow after.

The like fidelitie the Turkes also kept, with the fort of Wizigradum and the souldiers therof. This Wizigradum is situate in the mid way betweene Buda and Strigonium. Of the which fort 02 castle, the highest tower so mounteth vpon the hill, that vnlesse it be for famine and lacke of water, they haue not to dread any enemie. Notwithstanding so it happened, that the lower piece being won, they in the higher tower abiding foure daies without drinke, were compelled with liberate grant of life and goods, to yeeld themselues. But the diuelish Turks keeping no faith nor promise, slew them euery one, only Petrus Amandus the captaine of the piece, excepted: who priuily was conueyed by the captaine of the Turkes, out of the slaughter, an. 1544.

To these moreouer may be added the winning of Nouum Castellum in Dalmatia, where he slew all that were within, both souldiers and other, for that they did not yeeld themselues in time. Thus the Turke, whether they yeelded to him or not, neuer spared the people and locke of Christ.

As the false and cruell Turke was thus raging in Hungarie, and intended further to rage without all mercie and pitie of the Christians, and easily might then haue preuailed and subdued the whole: but that Charles the emperour and Francischus the French king were the same time in warre and hostilitie, and also other Christian princes, as Henrie duke of Brunswike, against Iohn Fredericke duke of Saxonie, also princes and rulers were contending among themselues: behold the gratious prouidence of our Lord and God toward vs, who seeing the miserie, and hauing pitie of his poor Christians, suddenly as with a thunderclap reuiued this raging beast: and brought him out of Europe into his owne countrie againe, by occasion of the Persians, who were then in great preparation of war against the Turkes, and had inuaded his dominion. By reason whereof the Turkes were kept there occupied, fighting with the Persians a long continuance. Which warres at length being atchieued and finished, (wherin the said Turke lost great victories, with slaughter of many thousands of his Turkes) he was not only preuented by the instigation of certaine euill disposed Hungarians, but also occasioned by the diuelond of Christian princes, to returne againe into Europe, in hope to subdue all the parts thereof vnto his dominion. Where into when he beheld no armie inuincible of such a multitude of Turks, as the like hath not hitherto been heard of, set against the mercifull prouidence and protection of our God toward his people. As the Turke was thus intending to set forward with this innumerable multitude against the Christians, the hand of the Lord sent such a pestilence through all the Turks armie and dominions, reaching from Bithynia, and from Thracia, to Macedonia and also to Hungarie, that all the Turkes possessions almost seemed nothing else, but as an heape of dead coses, wherethe his voiage for that time was stopped, and hee almost compelled to seeke a new armie.

Besides this plague of the Turks aforesaid, which was worse to them then any warre, other lets also and domesticall calamities through Gods prouidence happened vnto Solymannus, the great rouer and robber of the world: which staied him at home from vexing the Christians, especiallie touching his eldest sonne Mustapha.

This Mustapha being hated and partlie feared of Rossa mus the chiefe counsellour about the Turke, and of Rossa the Turkes concubine, and after his wife, was diuers times complained of to his father, accused, and at length so brought into suspition and displeasure of the Turke, by them aforesaid: that in conclusion his father caused him to bee sent for to his pauilion, where 6. Turks with visours were appointed to put him to death: who comming vpon him, put (after their manner) a small cord or bow-string full of knots about his necke, and so throwing him downe vpon the ground, not suffering him to speake one word to his father, with the watch thereof thotled and strangled him to death, his father standing in a secret corner by, and beholding the same. Which fact being perpetrate, afterward when the Turke would haue giuen to another some of his and of Rossa, called Gianger, the treasure, horse, armour, ornaments, and the province of Mustapha his brother; Gianger crying out for sorrow of his brothers death: Fie of thee, saith hee to his father, thou impious and wretched dogge, traitour, murderer, I cannot call the father, take the treasures, the horse and armour of Mustapha to thy selfe: and with that taking out his dagger, thrust it thorow his owne bodie. And thus was Solyman murderer and parricide of his owne sonnes: which was in the yere of our Lord 1552.

Wherein notwithstanding is to be noted the singular prouidence and loue of the Lord toward his afflicted Christians. For by this Mustapha as he was couragious and greatly expert in warre, and exercised in all practise of warre: so had he a cruell heart, maliciously set to shed the bloud of Christians: Wherefore great cause haue we to congratulate, and to giue thankes to God, for the happy taking away of this Mustapha. And no lesse hope also and good comfort wee may conceiue of our louing Lord, hereby ministred vnto vs, to thinke that our merciefull God after these sore afflictions of his Christians vnder these 12. Turkes afore recited: now after this Solyman intendeth some gratious good worke to Christendome, to reduce and releale vs out of this so long and miserable Turkish captiuitieas may be hoped now by taking away these yong impes of this impious generation, before they should come to worke their conceiued malice against vs: the Lord therefore be glorified and praised: Amen.

Moreouer, as I was in writing hereof, opportunitie came to my hands a certaine writing out of Germanie, certifying vs of such newes and victorie of late atchieued against the Turke, as may not a little increase our hope and comfort vs, touching the decay and ruine of the Turkes power and tyrannie against vs. Which newes are these: that after the Turkish tyrant had besieged with an armie of 50000. men, the famous and strong towne and castle of Iula in Hungarie lying 40. miles beyond the riuer Danubius, which citie had, by the space of fiue weekes sustained many greuous assaults: God through his great mercie and goodnesse so comforted the said towne of Iula and the poore Christians therein, at their earnest praiers, that the Turke with all his host was driuen backe, by the handes of the Generall called Isarettshim Lasko and his valiant company: who not onely defended the said towne, but also constrained the Turkes to retire, to their great shame and confusion, with a great slaughter of the Turkish rable: For the which the euerlasting God be praised for euer.

The maner of the ouerthrow was this. As the foresaid generall did see his aduantage with captaine George, and other horsmen of the Sclauians and Hungarians, they set on the rereward of the Turkes and killed about 8000. of them, & take also some of their artillarie and followed them so fast, that the Turks were constrained to flie into a marish ground, and to breake the wheeles of the rest of their artillary, to saue themselues, and there with they got a very rich bootie, rescuing besides and taking from the Turkes a great number of Christian prisoners. Like thinkes also are to be giuen to God, for the prosperous successe giuen to Magotichie the Bassa of Natolia, who hauing ioyned his power with the Persians, and comming to the citie of Erzia, who making toward the Turkes, and encountring encountring with the Tartarians, slue of them about 8. hundred.

Not long after this, it happened through the like prouidence of our God, a Turkish captaine called Begen, accompanied with a thousand fresh footmen came newly out of Turkie, to goe toward the citty named Quinque Ecclesiæ, or Fünfkirchen: with whom the earle of Serin by the way vndercountred, and in the night setting vpon him, killed the captaine and tooke eight Camels, and eight Moyles laden with treasure, and also got two red Guidons, with a whole great piece of rich cloth of gold, and with another faire and strange iewell. The heele of this foresaid Turkish captaine, was betrapped and decked most richly. The saddle whereof had the pommell and the back part couered ouer with plate of fine Arabicke gold, and the rest of the sadde, before the sitting place, was plated with siluer very faire gilded. The seat of the saddle was couered with purple veluet: the trappers and bridle set with little Turkettes and Rubies: which horse was sent to Vienna vnto the emperour Maximilian for a present.

Although the earle would very faine haue saued the captaine, not knowing what he was, yet the Tartarites labouring to carie away their captaine, so stiffely defended themselues, that the earle with his company, was constrained to kill both them and their captaine. From whom the said earle of Serin the same time got 15. thousand Turkish and Hungarish Ducates: which money was brought for the payment of the Turkish Souldiers in the towne aforesaid of Fünfkirchen, &c. All which his good beginnings of greater goodnesse to be hoped for hereafter, though the grace of Christ our Lord, especially of our Christian rulers and potentates, first the churchmen and prelates for their parts: then the ciuill powers and princes for their parts, withholding their affections a little, will turne their bridles and bariance, into brotherly concord and agreement: which the Lord of peace put in their minds to doe. Amen. Or otherwise if it will so please the Lord, that the Turke come further vpon vs, so as he hath begun, for our punishment and castigation, his grace then giue to the flocke of his poore Christians constancie of faith, patience in suffering, and amendment of life: For so I vnderstand by publike fame, although vncertainly rumored by the voice of some, that the Turkes power of late, this present yeere of our Lord 1566. hath pierced the parts of Apulia within Italie, wasting and burning the space of an hundred miles toward Naples. Which if it be certaine, it is to be feared, that the Turke hauing thus set in his foot, and feeling the sweetnesse of Italie, will not so cease before he get in both head and shoulders also so far into Italie, that he will display his banners within the walles of Rome, and do with old Rome the like as Mahumet his great grandfather did with new Rome, the citie of Constantinople, and as the Persians did with Babylon.

The Turke in feare to inuade Italie.

Conie ctures why it is to be feared that the Turke shall get Rome.

The causes why we haue so to iudge, be diuers: first, that the see of Rome hath been defended hitherto, and maintained with much blood; and therfore it may seeme not vncredible, but that it will not long continue, but be lost with blood againe, according to the verdict of the Gospell: He that striketh with the sword, shall perish with the sword, &c. Another cause is, the fulfilling of the eighteenth chapter of the Apocalyps: where is written, that great Babylon shall fall and be made an habitation of diuels, and a den of vncleane spirits, and a cage of filthie and vncleane birds: the fall whereof shall be like a millstone in the sea, that is, which shall not rise againe. And this to come before the day of iudgement, the text of the said chapter doth openly declare: where the words do follow, shewing that the kings of the earth, and the merchants which had to do with the wealthy citie, standing a far off for feare of the heat, and beholding the smoke of the said citie flaming and burning with fire, shall lewaile and rue her destruction and desolation, &c. What citie this is, called great Babylon, which like a millstone shall fall and burne, and be made an habitation of vncleane spirits, and beasts, let the Reader coūsell. This is certaine and plaine by these her kings and merchants standing a far off for feare, and beholding her burning, that the destruction of this citie (what citie soeuer it be) shall be seene here in earth before the comming of the Lords iudgement, as may easily be gathered by these their circumstances, that is, by the standing, the beholding, and bewailing of her merchants. By the which merchants and kings of the earth, peraduenture may be signified, the pope, the rich cardinals, the great prelats and fat doctors, and other obediencies of the Romish see: who at the coming of the Turkes, will not aduenture their liues for their church, but will flie the citie (no doubt) and stand a far off from danger: and when they shall see with their eyes, and heare with their eares the citie of Rome to be set on fire and consumed by the cruell Turkes, the sight thereof shall seeme to them pitious and lamentable, to behold the great and faire citie of Rome, the tall castle of Saint Angell, the popes mightie see (where they were wont to sith out such riches, dignities, treasures, and pleasure) so to burne before their eyes, and to come to such bitter desolation, which shall neuer be recouered againe, but shall be made an habitation of diuels and vncleane spirits, that is, of Turkes, and heathen Sultans, and barbarous Saracens, &c.

The prophecie of the 18. chap. of the Apocalyps expounded.

This I (say) peraduenture may be the meaning of that prophetical place of the Apocalyps: not that I haue here any thing to pronounce, but only giue my gesse, what may probably be conceiued. But the end at length will make this and all other things more plaine and manifest. For mysticall prophecies rightly are neuer so well vnderstood, as when the euent of them is past and accomplished.

The third cause. Ex Paulo Iouio.

Another cause concurring with the causes aforesaid, may be collected out of Paulus Iouius, who writing of the subuersion of Rhodes, which was, as yee heard, an. 1522. vpon Christmas day, saith, that it chanced suddenly the same day in Rome, that as pope Hadrian the vi. was entring into the Church to his seruice, suddenly ouer his head the vpper frontier or top of the chapell boore, which was of marble, immediatly as the pope was entring, fell downe and fiue certaine of his guard waiting vpon him. Whereby peraduenture may be meant, that the ruine of Rome was not long after to follow the losse of Rhodes.

The fourth cause. Ex Ioan. Auentino Annal. lib. 3. fol. 30.

The fourth cause I borrow out of Ioannes Auentinus, who in his third booke alleaging the names, but not the words of Hildegardis, Brigit, and other prophetical men hath these words: Si vera sunt carmina & vaticinia D. Hildegardæ, & Brigittæ, Sibyllarum Germaniæ, & Bardorum fatidicorum, qui ea quæ nostro æuo completa vidimus, longo ante tempore nobis cecinerunt: Agrippinensis Colonia, nōlimus, velimus, Turcarum caput erit, &c. That is, If the sayings and prophecies of Hildegard, of Brigit, and of other prophetical persons bee true, which being foretold long before, wee haue seene now in these our daies accomplished: the towne of Coleu will bee, nill wee, must nēds bee the head citie of the Turks, &c.

Apoc. 16. The cruelty of the furious Turkes described.

A prophecie.

And this I write not as one pronouncing against the citty of Rome, that will happen, but as one fearing what may fall. Which if it come to passe (as I pray God it doe not) then shall the pope well vnderstand, whither his wrong vnderstanding of the Scriptures, and his false flattering glosers vpon the same, haue brought him.

A counsel to the bishop of Rome, if he be wise.

Therefore o my counsell is to the pope, and all his popish maintainers and vpholders, to humble themselues, and to agree with their brethren betime, letting all contention fall: lest that while the bishop of Rome shall striue to be the highest of all other bishops, it so fall out thereby, that the bishop of Rome shall be found the lowest of all other bishops, or peraduenture no bishop at all.

Two things to be noted in the Turkes: how many victories they haue got, and how cruelly they haue vsed their victories.

Ex Paulo Iouio.

Whereunto also another cause may bee added, taken out of Hieronymus Sauonarola, who prophecieth, that one shall come ouer the Alpes like vnto Cyrus, and destroy Italy. Whereof see more pag. 672.

This Solymanus, if he be yet aliue, hath now raigned 46. yeares, who began the same yeare, in the which the Emperour Charles the v. was crowned, which was an. 1520. and so hath continued by Gods permission, for a scourge to the Christians, vnto this yeare now present 1566. This Solyman by one of his Concubines, had his eldest sonne called Mustapha. By another Concubine called Roxa, he had foure sonnes, Mahumet, Baiazetes, Zelymus, and Gianger. Of the which sonnes, Mustapha and Gianger were slaine (as yee heard before) by the meanes of their owne father. And thus much concerning the wretched tyrannie of the Turkes out of the authors hereunder written.

¶ A notice touching the miserable persecution, slaughter, and captiuitie of the Christians vnder the Turkes.

Persecution vnder the Turke.

HItherto thou hast heard (Christian Reader) the lamentable persecutions of these latter daies, wrought by the Turkes against the people and seruants of Christ. In the reading whereof, such as sit quietlie at home, and be farre from ieopardie, may see what miserie there is abroad: the knowledge and reading whereof, shall not be vnprofitable for all Christians earnestlie to weigh & consider, for that many there be, which falslie deceiuing themselues, imagine that Christianitie is a quiet and restfull state of life, full of pleasure and solace in this present world, when indeede it is nothing lesse, testified by the mouth of our Sauiour himselfe, who rightly defining his his kingdome, teacheth vs that his kingdome is not of this world, promouncing vs also before, that in this world wee must looke for affliction, but in him wee shall haue peace. Examples hereof in all parts of this history thorough all ages are plenteous and euident to be seene, whether wee turne our eyes to the first terme persecutions in the primitiue church, during the first three hundred yeeres after Christ: or whether we consider the latter three hundred yeeres in this last age of the church, wherein the poore flocks of Christ hath been so afflicted, oppressed and vexioured, that it is hard to say whether haue been more cruell against the Christians, the infidell Emperors of Rome in the primitiue age of the church, or else these barbarous Turkes in these our latter times of the church now present.

Comparison betweene the persecutions of the primitiue church and of the latter church. Three speciall enemies of Christs church.

Vide supra, pag. 182. Ex Bernardo Breydenb.

Thus from time to time the church of Christ almost hath had little or no rest in this earth, what for the heathen emperours on the one side, what for the proud pope on the other side, on the third side what for the barbarous Turke: for these are and haue been from the beginning the three principall and capitall enemies of the church of Christ, signified in the Apocalyps by the beast, the false prophet, and the false prophet, from whom went out three foule spirits like frogges, to gather together all the kings of the earth to the battell of the day of the Lord God almighty: Apocalyps. 16. The cruelty and malice of these enemies against Christs people hath been such, that to iudge which of them did most excede in cruelty of persecution, it is hard to say: but that it may bee thought that the bloodie and beastly tyrannie of the Turkes especially aboue the rest, incomparable surmounteth all the afflictions and cruell slaughters that euer were seene in any age, or read of in any story: Insomuch that there is neither historie so perfect, nor writer so diligent, who writing of the miserable tyrannie of the Turkes, is able to expresse or comprehend the horrible examples of their vnspeakable cruelty and slaughter exercised by these 12. Turkish tyrants, vpon poore Christian mens bodies, within the compasse of these latter three hundred yeeres. Whereof although no sufficient relation can be made, nor number expressed: yet to giue to the reader some generall gesse or view thereof; let vs first perpend and consider what dominions and empires, how many countries, kingdomes, prouinces, cities, townes, strong holds and forts, these Turkes haue surprised and wonne from the Christians. In all which victories, being so many, this is secondly to be noted, that there is almost no place, which y Turks euer came to and subdued, where they did not either slay all the inhabitants thereof, or led away the most part thereof into such captiuitie and slauerie, that they continued not long after aliue, or else so liued, that death almost had been to them more tollerable.

Like as in the time of the first persecutions of the Romane emperours, the saying was, that no man could step with his foot in all Rome, but should tread vpon a martyr: so here may be said, that almost there is not a towne, citie, or village in all Asia, Grecia, also in a great part of Europa, and Aphrica, whose streets haue not flowed with blood of the Christians, whom the cruell Turkes haue murthered. Of whom are to be seene in histories, heapes of soulders slaine, of men and women cut in peeces, of children ricked vpon poles and stakes, whom these detestable Turkes most spitefully and that in the sight of their parents) vse to gaze to death: some they brag at their horse tailes and familly to death: some they teare in peeces, tying their armes and legs to foure horses: other some they make markes to shot at: vpon some they erect their swords, hold deepe they can cut and slash, as we before haue read, page 691. The aged and feeble they treade vnder their horses: women with child they spare not, but rip their bodies, and cast the infants into the fire, or otherwise destroy them. Whether the Christians yeeld to them, or yeeld not, all is a matter. As in their promises there is no truth, so in their victories there is no sense of manhood or mercie in them, but they make haueche of all.

A briefe recitall of Christian slaughters done vpon Christians by the Turkes and Saracens.

Ex Marino Barletio de Scodr. expugnat. lib. 2.

So the citizens of Croia, after they had yeelded and were all promised their liues, were all destroyed and that horrible. In Syria, after the king had giuen himselfe to the Turkes hand, hauing promise of life, Mahumet the Turke slew him with his owne hands. The princes of Rasia had both their eyes put out with burned hot set before them. Theodosia, otherwise called Capha, was also surrendered to the Turke, hauing the like assurance of life and safetie: and yet contrarie to the league, the citizens were put to the sword and slaine. At the winning and yeelding of Lesbos, what a number of young men and children were put vpon sharpe stakes and poles, and so thrust thorow? At the winning of the citie of Buda, what tyrannie was shewed and exercised against the poore Christians, which had yeelded themselues, and against the two dukes, Christophor Bisserer and Ioannes Tranbinger, contrarie to the promise and handwriting of the Turke, is to be seene in the storie of Melchior Soiterus, de bello Pannonico.

The cruelte of the Turke against the Citizens of Constantinople. Vide supra pag. 653.

The like also is to be read in the storie of Bernardus de Breydenbach, who writing of the taking of Pydnuntum, a citie in Apulia, testifieth of the miserable slaughter of the young men there slaine, of old men troden vnder the horse feet, of matrons and virgins rauished, of women with child cut and rent in peeces, of the priests in the Churches slaine, and of the archbishop of that citie, who being an aged man and holding the crosse in his handes, was cut asunder with a wooden saw, &c. The same Bernardus also writing of the cruelty of Nigropontius, otherwise called Chalcides, an. 1471. deliuereth the like terrible slaughter, which there was exercised: where the Turke, after his promise giuen before to the contrarie, most cruelly caused all the youth of Italie to be picked vp on sharpe stakes: some to be dashed against the hard stones, some alone to be cut in sunder in the middest, and other moe with other kinds of tormentes to be put to death: insomuch that all the streetes and waies of Chalcides did flow with the bloud of them, which were there slaine. In which historie the forsaid writer recordeth one memorable example of maidenly chastitie, worthie of all Christians to bee noted and commended. The storie is told of the Prætors daughter of that Citie, who being the only daughter of her father, and noted to be of an exceeding singular beautie, was saued out of the slaughter, and brought to Mahumet the Turke, to be his concubine: But the denying to consent to his Turkish appetite and filthinesse, was commanded therewith to be slaine and murthered, and so died she a martyr, keeping both her faith and her bodie vndefiled vnto Christ her spouse. Ibid.

The cruelte of the Turke against the Citizens of Negropont.

A notable example of maidenly chastitie.

Vide supra, pag. 684.

The like cruelties also was shewed vpon them which kept the castle, and afterward yeelding themselues vpon hope of the Turks promise, were slaine euery one. What should I speake of the miserable slaughter of Methone, and the citizens therof dwelling in Peloponesus? who seeing no other remedie but needs to come into the Turkes hands, set the same on fire where they were gathered together, men, women, and children: some women also with child voluntarilie cast themselues into the sea, rather then they would suffaine the Turks captiuitie. Vide pag. 684.

The miserie of the suffring of Christian men and bloud by the wretched Turkes.

Miserable it is to behold, long to recite, incredible to beleeue all the cruell parts and horrible slaughters wrought by these misercants, against the Christians, though all places almost of the world, both in Asia, in Africa, but especiallie in Europa. Who is able to recite the innumerable societies and companies of the Grecians martyred by the Turkes slued in Achaia, Attica, Thessalia, Macedonia, Cyprus, and all Peloponesus: besides the Iland of Rhodes and other Ilands and Cyclades adiacent in the sea about, numbred to 52. of the which also Pathmos was one, where Saint John being banished, wrote his Reuelations. Where did euer the Turks set a foot, but the bloud of Christians there, without pitie or measure, went to wracke: and what place or prouince is there almost throughout the world, where the Turkes either haue not pierced, or are not like shortly to enter? In Thracia, and thorough all the coastes of Danubius, in Bulgaria, Dalmatia, in Seruia, Transiluania, Bosna, in Hungaria, also in Austria, what hauocke hath beene made by them, of Christians mens bodies, it will rue any christian heart to remember. At the siege of Poldania, at the winning of Buda, of Pesta, of Alba, of Walpo, Strigonium, Socolsia, Cathe, Wizigradum, Nouum Castellum in Dalmatia, Belgradum, Varadinum, Quinque-ecclesiæ: also at the battell of Varna, where Ladislaus king of Polony with all his armie almost, through the rashnesse of the popes cardinall were slaine; at the winning moreouer of Labiachus, Lysias, Dyrrachium: at the siege of Guntza, and of the faithfull towne Scodr, where the number of the Hostie against their walles, at the siege thereof, were reckoned to 25. 30. like wise at the siege of Vienna, where all the Christian captiues were brought before the whole armie and slaine, and diuers drawen in peeces with horses: but especiallie at the winning of Constantinople, aboue mentioned, pag. 651. also at Troia and Methone, what beastly cruelte was shewed, it is vnspeakable. For as in Constantinople, Mahumet the drunken Turke neuer rose from dinner, but he caused euerie day, for his disport 300. Christian captiues of the nobles of that citie to be slaine before his face: so in Methone, after that his captaine Omares had first giuen to him at Constantinople 500. prisoners of the Christians, the cruell tyrant commanded them all to be cut and diuided in sunder by the middle, and so being slaine, to be throwen out into the fields.

The cruelte of the Turke against the prisoners of Methone. Ex Leonica Chalcondyla de rebus Turcicis. lib. 10.

Moreouer Chalcondyla, writing of the same storie, addeth moreouer a prodigious narration (if it be true) of a brute Dre, which being in the fields, and seeing the carcases of the dead bodies so cut in two, made there a loud noise after the lowing of his kinde and nature: and afterward comming to the quarters of one of the dead bodies lying in the field, it tooke by the one halfe, and then comming againe, tooke by likewise the other halfe, and so (as hee could) ioyned them both together. Which being espied of them which saw the doing of the brute Dre, and marueiling thereat, and word being brought thereof to Mahumet, he commanded the quarters again to be brought, where they were before, to proue whether the beast would come againe: who failed not (as the author recordeth) but in like sort as before, taking the fragments of the dead corpes, laid them againe together. It followeth more in the author, how holy that Mahumet being accounted at the strange wonder of the Ore, commanded the quarters of the Christian mans body to be interred, and the Ore to be brought to his house, and was much made of. Some said it to be the body of a Venetian: some affirmed, that hee was an Illyrian: but whatsoeuer hee was, certaine it is, that the Turke himselfe was much more brutish then was the very brute Ore: which being a beast hee shewed more sence of humanitie, to a dead man, then one man did to another. Ex Leonic. Chalcondyla.

A straunge and prodigious wonder of a brute beast recorded of a dead christian body.

To this cruelty adde moreouer, that beside these 500. Bohemians thus destroyed at Constantinople, in the said city of Methone, all the townsmen also were slaine by the foresaid captaine Dinares, and among them their bishop likewise was put to death. Ex Andrea de Lacuna, & ex Wolfgango & aliis.

The slaughter of the Bohemians at Methone.

Ex Andrea de Lacuna, & aliis. Ex Leonic. Chalcondyla. Antonius Bonfinius. Crantzius. Volaterr. lib. 22.

John Faber in his oration made before king Henry the eighth, at the appointment of king Ferdinandus, ꝛ declaring therein the miserable crueltie of ꝑ Turkes toward all Christians, as also toward the bishops and ministers of the Church, testifieth how that in Syriuice in Constantinople, and Trapezunda, what bishops and archbishops, or other ecclesiasticall and religious persons the Turks could find, they brought them out of the cities into the fields, there to be slaine like Oxen and Calues. The same Faber also writing of the battell of Solyman in Hungarie, where Ludouicus the king of Hungarie was ouerthrowne, declareth that 8. bishops in the same field were slaine. And moreouer, when the archbishop of Strigon, and Paulus the archbishop Colocensis were found dead, Solyman caused them to bee taken vp, and to bee beheaded and chopt in small pieces, An. 1526.

The crueltie of the Turkes in Hungarie.

What Christian heart will not pity the incredible slaughter done by the Turkes in Cubeia, where as the said Faber testifieth that innumerable people were theder and gozed vpon stakes, diuers were thrust thorough with a hote iron, children and infants not yet weined from the mother were bathed against the stones, and many cut a sunder in the middest? Ex Iohan. Fabro & aliis.

But neuer did countrie taste and feele more the bitter and deadly tyrannie of the Turkes, then did Rasia, called Syria inferiour, and now Seruia. Where (as writeth Wolfgangus Dreichlerus) the prince of the said countrey being sent for, vnder faire pretence of words and promises, to come and speake with the Turke, after he was come of his owne gentlenes, thinking no harme, was apprehended and wretchedly and vilely put to death, and his slain slaine off, his brother and sister brought to Constantinople for a triumph, and all the nobles of his countrie (as Faber addeth) had their eyes put out, &c.

The prince of Seruia slaine, and name of the Turke.

Briefly to conclude, by the vehement and furious rage of these cursed caitifes, it may seeme that Satan the old dragon, for the great hatred he beareth to Christ, hath stirred them vp to be the butchers of all christian people, inflaming their beastly hearts with such malice and crueltie against the name and religion of Christ, that they degenerating from the nature of men to diuels, neither by reason will be ruled, nor by any blod or slaughter satisfied. Like as in the primitiue age of the church, and in the time of Diocletian and Dacianus, when the diuell saw that he could not preuaile against the person of Christ which was risen againe, he turned all his furie vpon his silly seruants, thinking by the Romaine emperours, vtterly to extinct the name and profession of Christ, out from the earth: So in this latter age of the world Satan being let loose againe rageth by the Turkes, thinking to make no end of murdering and killing, till he haue brought (as he intendeth) ꝑ whole church of Christ, with all the professors thereof, vnder foot. But the Lord (I trust) will once send a Constantinus to vanquish proud Maxentius: Moses to drowne indurat Pharao: Cyrus to subdue the stout Babylonian.

Let neuer Christendome put trust in the Turke.

The Turkes stirred vp of the diuell to be the ministers of Satan against Christ.

The Turkes are Satans ape to the Christians.

And this much hitherto touching our Christian brethren, which were slaine & destroyed by these blasphemous Turkes. Now followeth so much as besides these aforesaid, many other were pluckt away violently from their countrey, from their wiues and children, from libertie, and from all their possessions, into wretched captiuitie and extreame penurie, it remaineth likewise to intreat somewhat also concerning the cruell manor of the Turkes handling of ꝑ said Christian captiues. And first here is to be noted that the Turke neuer commeth into Europe to war against the Christians, but there followeth after his army, a great number of brokers or merchants, such as buy men and children to sell againe, bringing with them long chaines in hope of great cheats: In the which chaines they linke them by fiftie and fiftie together, such as remaine vndestroyed with the sword. Whom they buy of the spoiles of them that rob and spoile the Christian countries: which is lawful for any of the Turkes armie to do, so that the tenth of their spoile or pray (what soeuer it be) be reserued to the head Turke, that is, to the great master thereof.

The miserable state of Christian captiues vnder the Turkes.

The buying and sell ing of Christians captiues vnder the Turkes.

Christian captiues pitied of the Turke.

Of such as remaine for tithe, if they be aged (of whom bee few) be reserued alue, because little profit commeth of that age: they be sold to the vse of husbandrie or keeping of beasts. If they be yong men or women, they be sent to certaine places, there to be instructed in their language and Arts, as shall be most profitable for their aduantage, and such are called in their tongue Sarai: and the first care of the Turkes is this, to make them denie the Christian religion, and to be circumcised: and after that they are appointed euery one as he seemeth most apt, either to the learning of their lawes, or else to learne the feates of war. Their first rudiment of warre is to handle the bow, first beginning with a weake bow, and so as they grow in strength, coming to a stronger bow, and if they misse the marke, they are sharpely beaten: and their allowance is two pence or three pence a day till they come and take wages to serue in war. Some are brought vp for the purpose to be placed in the number of the wicked Janizaries, that is, the order of the Turkes champions, which is the most abominable condition of all other. Of these Janizarites, see before pag. 681. And if any of the foresaid yong men or children shall appeare to excell in any beautie, him they so cut, that no part of that which nature giueth to man, remaineth to be seene in all his body, whereby vnto the freshnesse of age continueth he is compelled to serue their abominable abomination: and when age commeth, then they serue in stead of Eunuches to wait vpon Matrones, or to keepe houses and mules, or else to be fullians and drudges in their kitchins.

Wickednesse passing all miseries!

Diuerse of them also all miseries!

Such as be yong maidens and beautifull, are deputed for concubines. They which bee of meane beautie serue for matrones to their drudgerie worke in their houses and chambers: or else are put to spinning and such other labors, but so that it is not lawfull for them either to professe their Christian religion, or euer to hope for any libertie. And thus much of them which fall to the Turke by tithe.

The seruitude of yong women captiues.

The other which are bought and sold amongst priuate subiects, first are allured with faire words and promises to take circumcision. Which they hauing done, they are more fauourably entreated, but all hope is taken from them of returning againe into their countrie, which if they attempt, the paine thereof is burning. And if such comming at length to libertie, will marrie, they may: but then their children remaine bond to the Lord, for him to sell at his pleasure: and therefore such as are wise amongst them will not marrie. They which refuse to be circumcised, are miserablie handled: for example whereof, the author (which giueth testimony hereof) doth inferre his owne experience.

Such captiues as be expert in any manuall art or occupation can better shift for themselues: but contrariwise, they which haue no handicraft to liue vpon, are in twise case. And therefore such as haue beene brought vp in learning, or bee priests or noble men, and such other, whose tender education can abide no hardnesse, are the least reputed, and most of all other neglected of him that hath the sale or keeping of them, for that he hath lesse profit to rise of them, then of the other: and therefore no cost of rainment is bestowed vpon them, but they are caried about barehead, and barefoote, both summer and winter in frost and snow. And if any saint ꝑ be sicke in the way, there is no reuling for him in any time, but first he is driuen forward with whips, & if that will not serue, hee is set peradauenture vpon some horse: or if his weaknesse be such, that he cannot sit, then is he laid ouerthwart the horse vpon his belly like a calfe, and if he chance to die, they take off his garment such as he hath, and throw him in a ditch.

Ex Bartholom. Georgiewitz Pelegrino lib. de afflictionibus Christianorum sub Turca.

In the way moreouer, beside the common chaine, which doth inclose them all, the hands also of euery one are manicled, which is because they should not harme their leaders, for many times it happened that ten persons had the leading of 50. captiues: and when night came, their feete also were fettered, so that they lodged in no house, but lay vpon the ground all night.

The yong women had a little more gentlenesse shewed, being carried in paniers in the day time. But when night came, pitie it was to heare the miserable crying out of such as were inclosed within, by reason of the filthie iniuries which they suffered by their carriers. Insomuch that the yong tender age of 7. or 8. yeeres, as well of the one sexe as of the other could not saue them from the most filthie villanie of the bestiall Turkes.

The miserable calamitie of Christian women being in captiuitie vnder the Turkes.

When the morning commeth, they are brought forth to the market, to sale, where the buyer, if he be disposed, plucking off their garments, vieweth all the bones and ioynts of their body: and if he like them, he giueth his price, and carieth them away into miserable seruitude, either to tilling of their ground, or to passure their cattell, or some other strange kind of misery incredible to speake of: Insomuch that the author reporteth, that he hath seene himselfe certaine of such christian captiues yoked together like horse and oxen, and to draw the plough. The maid seruants likewise are kept in perpetuall toile and worke in stale places, where neither they come in sight of any man, neither be they permitted to haue any talke with their fellow seruants, &c. Such as are committed to keepe beasts, lie abrode day and night in the wild fieldes, without house and harbor, and so changing their passure, go from mountaine to mountaine: of whom also, beside the office of keeping the beasts, other handie labour is exacted at spare houres, such as pleaseth their maisters to put vnto them.

The manor of christian captiues, how they are brought to markets and sold.

Christians in their captiuitie put to death in the plough like horses.

Out of this miserie there is no way for them to flie, especially for them that are caried into Asia beyond the seas: Or if any do attempt so to do, he taketh his time chiefly about haruest, when he may hide himselfe all the day time in the corne, or in woods, or marshes, and finde food: and in the night onely he flieth flieth, and had rather be deuoured of wolues and other wild beasts, then to returne againe to his master. In their flying, they vse to take with them an hatchet and coards, that when they come to the sea side, they may cut downe trees, and binde together the ends of them, and so, where the Sea of Hellespontus is narrowest, about the Sestos and Abidos, they take the sea, sitting vpon trees, where, if the winde and tide do serue iustly, they may cut ouer in foure or fiue houres: But the most part either perish in the floods, or are driuen backe againe vpon the coastes of Asia, or else be deuoured of wilde beasts in woods, or perish with hunger and famine. If any escape ouer the sea saltus into Europe, by the way they enter into no towne, but trauaile vpon the mountaines, following onely the North starre for their guide.

The great number of Christian captiues which flie out of Turkie.

The manor and shift of one men in getting ouer the sea.

The manifold dangers by the way in flying.

The misery of Christian Cities and Dominces which liue vnder the Turks tribute.

As touching such Townes and Prouinces, which are won by the Turke, and wherein the Christians are suffered to liue vnder tribute: First all the Nobilitie there they kill and make away, the Churchmen & Clergy hardly they spare. The churches with the belles and all the furniture thereof, either they cast downe, or else they conuert to the vse of their owne blasphemous religion, leauing to the Christians certaine olde and blinde Chappels, which when they decay, it is permitted to our men to repaire them again for a great summe of money giuen to the Turke: Neither be they permitted to vse any open preaching or ministration, but onely in silence and by stealth, to frequent together. Neither is it lawfull for any Christian to beare office within the citie or Prouince, nor to beare weapon, nor to weare any garment like to the Turkes. And if any commune or blaspheme, be it neuer so great, be spoken against them, or against Christ, yet must thou beare it, and hold thy peace. Or if thou speake one word against the religion, thou shalt be compelled (whether thou will or no) to be circumcised: And then if thou speake one word against Mahumet, thy punishment is fire and burning. And if it chaunce a Christian being on horseback, to meete or passe by a Ianissman, that is, a Turkish Pzicke, he must light from his horse, and with a lowly looke, deuoutly reuerence and adore the Ianissman: or if he do not, he is beaten downe from his horse with clubs and staues.

If Christians may not goe like Turkes, why should our Gospellers goe like Papists?

The Turke hates their fire and fagots, as well as our papists.

The Christians must light from their horse, meeting a Turkish priest, and adore him.

Furthermore, for their tribute they pay the fourth part of their substance and gaine to the Turke: beside the ordinary tribute of the Christians, which is to pay for euery polle with in his family, a ducket vnto the Turke: which if the parents cannot doe, they are compelled to sell their children into bondage. Other being not able to pay, go cheined in fetters from doze to doze begging, to make vp their payment, or els must lye in perpetuall prison;

An other miserie most lamentable in taking away Christian mens children from their parents, to serue the Turke.

And yet notwithstanding, when the Christians haue discharged all duties: it remaineth free for the Turkes to take vp among the Christians children, whom they best like, and them to circumcise, and to take them away being yong from the sight of their parents, to farre places, to be brought vp, for the Turkes warres, so that they may not returne to them againe: but first are taught to forget Christ, and then their parents: so that if they come againe amongst them, yet are they not able to know their kinsfolkes and parents.

Another miserie.

This miserie passing all other miseries, no man is able with toung to vtter, or with words to expresse. What weeping and teares, what sorow and lamentation, what groning, sighes, and deepe dolor, both teare and rent asunder the wofull harts of the sely parents, at the plucking away of their babes and children: to see their sonnes and their owne children, whom they haue borne and bred vp to the seruice of Christ Iesus the Sonne of God, now to be driuen away violently from them to the warfare of Satan, and to fight against Christ: to them to the warfare of Satan, and to fight against Christ: to see their babes borne of Christian bloud, of Christians to be made Turkes, and to be plucked out of their armes, and out of their sight, without hope euer to returne to them againe: to liue perpetually with aliens, barbarous and blasphemous Turkes, and so to become of the number of them which are called fatherlesse, and motherlesse:

This is with teares rather then with words to be expressed.

Many Gospellers in Turkie.

Albeit the same children afterward do greatly degenerate from the faith of Christ, yet very many of them haue priuily about them the Gospell written of S. John, In principio erat verbum, &c. Which for a token or remembrance of their Christian faith, they carry vnder their arme hole, written in Greeke and Araby. Who greatly desire, and long wake for the reuenging sword of the Christians to come, and deliuer them out of their dolorous thraldome and captiuity, according as the Turkes themselues haue a prophecy, and greatly stand in feare of the same. Whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) in the chapter following.

Rudo Diuisa ca. of the Turke touching the losse of the Christians.

NOw at this time haue ye heard the lamentable afflictions of our Christian brethren vnder the cruell tyranny and captiuity of the Turkes, passing all other captiuities that euer haue beene to Gods people, either vnder Pharao in Egypt, or vnder Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, or vnder Antiochus in the time of the Machabees. Vnder the which captiuity, if it so please the Lord to haue his spouse the Church to be nurtured, his good will be done and obeyed. But if this misery come by the negligence and discord of our Christian guides and leaders, then haue we to pray and cry to our Lord God, either to giue better harts to our guiders and rulers, or else better guides and rulers to his flocke.

And these troubles and afflictions of our Christian brethren suffered by the Turkes, I thought good and profitable for our countrey people here of England to know, for so much as by the ignorance of these, and such like histories worthie of consideration, I see much inconuenience doth follow. Whereby it commeth to passe, that because we Englishmen being farre off from these countreyes, and little knowing what misery is a hoarde, are the lesse moued with zeale & copassion, to tender their greeuances, and to pray for them, whose troubles we know not. Whereupon also followeth, that we not considering the miserable state of other, are the lesse gratefull to God, when any tranquillity by him to vs is graunted. And if any little cloud of perturbation arise vpon vs, be it neuer so little, as pouertie, losse of liuing, or a little banishment out of our countrey for the Lords cause, we make a great matter thereof, and all because we going no further then our owne countrey, and onely feeling our owne crosse, do not compare that which we feele, with the great crosses, wherewith the Churches of Christ commonly in other places abroade are subiect. Which if we did rightly vnderstand, and earnestly consider, and ponder in our minds, neither would we so excessiuely forget our selues in time of our prosperitie giuen vs of God, nor yet so impatiently be troubled, as we are in time of our aduersitie, and all because either we heare not, or else we ponder not the terrible crosses which the Lord layeth vpon our other brethren abroade in other nations, as by this present story here prefixed may appeare.

Necessary for many causes that the troubles of the Church be knowne.

NOw consequently remaineth, as I haue shewed hitherto, what tyrannie hath been vsed of the Turks against Christs people, so to declare likewise, how farre this tyrannie of the Turkes hath extended and spread it selfe, describing as in a table, to the Christian Reader, what lands, countries and kingdomes the Turkes haue wonne, and got from Christendome; to the intent, that when Christian princes shall behold the greatnesse of the Turkes dominions spread almost thorough all the world, and how little a part of Christianitie remaineth behind, they may thereby vnderstand the better, how it is time now for them to beware them, if euer they thinke to doe any good in Gods Church. And therefore to make a compendious draught as in a brefe table, of such Countries, Kingdomes, and Dominions, got from vs by the Turkes, we will first begin with Asia, describing what Tractes, Countries, Cities and Churches, the Turke hath surprised, and violentlie pluckt away from the societie of Christian Dominions, taking onelie such as be most principall, and chiefly them that be in Scripture contained, for that it were to long to discourse all and singular such places by name, as the Turke hath vnder his subiection.

The great larges of the Turkes dominions to claime.

The world being diuided commonly into three parts, Asia, Africa, and Europa, Asia is counted to be the greatest in compasse, containing as much as both the other, and is diuided into two portions, the one called Asia Maior: the other called Asia Minor. And although the Empire of the Turke extendeth vnto them both: yet especially his dominion standeth in the other Asia, which is called Asia Minor, which reacheth from the coast of Europa, vnto Armenia Maior, beyond the riuer Euphrates, and comprehendeth these Regions and Cities following.

¶ Æneas Syluius, otherwise Pope Pius the 2. in describing of Asia Minor, cap. 74. reciteth a certaine fact of a Iewish Virgin: who at what time the Turkes were besieging a certaine towne in Lesbos, and had cast downe a great part of the walles, so that all the townesmen had giuen ouer, putting on mans harnesse, stepped forth into the breach, where not onely she kept the Turkes from entring in, but also slew of them a great sort. The Citizens seeing the rare courage, and good successe of the Maiden, take to them againe their harts and harnesse, and so lustily laid about them, that an incredible number of the Turkes were slaine. The rest being repulsed from the land, reculed into their Ships: who being then pursued by a Nauy of Cassia, were worthily discomfited likewise vpon the Sea. And thus was the Ile of Lesbos at that time, by a poore Virgin, that is, by the strong hand of the Lord working in a weake creature, preserued from the Turkes. Exæne. Syl. Et Seb. Munst. Lib. 5.

The which Persia, although it be vnder the Sophi, which is an enemy to the Turke, yet it is to be thought, that he is a Sultane, one of the Turkish and Mahometish Religion. This Persia and India were once seruants vnto Christs Gospell, as may appeare by the Primitiue Church, page 87. ¶ As I was writing hereof, a certaine found of lamentable newes was brought vnto vs, how the Turke, whom we had hoped before to haue ben repulſed by the emperor Maximilian out of Chriſtendome, hath now of late this preſent yere 1566. got the towne of Gyula alſo in Transilvania, after they had ſuſtained fiftene of his moſt forcible aſſaults, deſtroying in the ſame moſt cruelly, many thouſand of our chriſtian brethren, men, women, and children: but becauſe we haue no full certainty, we will reſerue the ſtory thereof to further information.

At C. Iambur. ſignifieth mad to the field, fighting againſt the Turkes. Vide before, pag. 662. Sigismund King of Hungary, I. ſpake with the Turkes, and was ouercome An. 1444. Villanous, pag. 664. Prophecies conſidered for the beginning and falling of the Turkes kingdome.

¶ The Prophecies of the holy Scriptures conſidered, touching the comming vp and finall ruine and deſtruction of this wicked kingdome of the Turkes, with the Reuelations and foreſhewings alſo of other authors concerning the ſame.

FOr ſo much as you haue hitherto ſufficiently heard, to what quantity and largeneſs the dominion of the Turkes hath increaſed, and do vnderſtand what cruell tyranny the wretched miſcreants haue and doe dayly practiſe moſt horrible whereſoeuer they come againſt the ſeruants and profeſſors of Chriſt: it ſhall not be vnprofitable, but rather neceſſary, and to our great comfort, to conſider and examine in the Scriptures, with what prophecies the holy ſpirit of the Lord hath premoniſhed and forewarned vs before, of theſe heauy perſecutions to come vpon his people by this horrible Antichriſt. For as the gouernment and conſtitution of times and ſtates of monarchies & policies fall not to vs by blind chance, but be adminiſtred and allotted vnto vs from aboue: ſo it is not to be ſuppoſed, that ſuch a great alteration and mutation of kingdomes, ſuch a terrible and generall perſecution of Gods people, almoſt thorough all Chriſtendome, and ſuch a terrour of the whole earth, as is now moued and grafted by theſe Turkes, commeth without the knowledge, ſufferance, and determination of the Lord before: for ſuch ends and purpoſes, as his diuine wiſedome both well know. For the better euidence and teſtimony whereof, he hath left vnto his Scriptures ſufficient inſtruction and declaration, whereby we may plainly ſee to our great comfort, how theſe grieuous afflictions and troubles of the Church though they be ſharpe and heauy vnto vs, yet they come not by chance or by mans working onely, but euen as the Lord himſelfe hath appoint: dit, and doth permit the ſame.

And firſt to begin with the time of the old Teſtament, let vs ſeriouſly aduiſe and ponder, not only the Scriptures and Prophecies therein contained, but alſo let vs conſider the whole ſtate, order and regiment of that people the Church & menne of the Iſraelites. For although the Scriptures and Prophets of the old Teſtament, were properly ſent to the people, and haue their relation properly to things done, or that ſhould be done in that common wealth, of which Prophets Iohn Baptiſt was the laſt and made an end, as our Sauiour himſelfe witneſſeth, ſaying: The law and Prophets be vnto the time of Ioſia, &c. Yet notwithſtanding the ſaid people of that old Teſtament, beareth alwiſe image and reſemblance of the vniuerſall Church which ſhould follow, planted by the Sonne of God thorow the whole earth: So that as the Prophets of God ſpeaking to them from the mouth and word of God prophecied what ſhould come to paſſe in that people: ſo likewiſe the ſingular courſe and hiſtory of theſe Iſraelites, ſo ſimplifieth and beareth a propheticall image or vs, declaring what is to be looked for in the vniuerſall Church of God diſperſed thorow the world, planted in Chriſt Ieſus his Sonne, according as Phil. Melanthon gracely gathering vpon the ſame, teſtifieth in diuers places, in his commentary vpon the Prophet Daniel.

As firſt the hiſtorie of godly Abel ſlaine by wicked Cain, what doth it import or prophecie, but the condition of the people and ſeruants of God, which commonly go to wracke in this world, and are oppreſſed by the contrary part, which belongeth not to God?

The like may be ſaid alſo of Iſhac and Iſmael: of Iacob and Eſau: of whom the ſtorie tels vs, whereof the children of promiſe, and belonged to the election of God, were perſecuted in this world, of the other which were reiected. There nor ought is to be noted concerning Iſmael, th at of his ſtocke after the fleſh came the Sarracens: whoſe ſect the Turkes do now profeſſe and maintaine. And as Iſmael had but 12. ſonnes: ſo it ſeemeth to be willed of God, that this Solyman, which is the twelfth of the Turkiſh generation, may be the laſt. But of this, better accaſion ſhall follow (the Lord willing) hereafter.

Furthermore, of the 12. tribes of Iſrael, the ſacrate hiſtory ſo reporteth, that after they had a long ſeaſon continued together, by the ſpace of 8. or 9. C. yeares, at length, for their idolatrie, and tranſgreſſion of their forefathers, 9. tribes of them were cut off, and diſperſed among the Gentiles 130. yeres before the captiuitie of Babylon: ſo that but two tribes onely remained free, and they alſo at laſt, after 130. yeeres, were captiued vnder the Babylonians, for a certaine time. No otherwiſe hath it hapned with the Church of Chriſt almoſt in the vniuerſall world, of which Church, the greateſt part both in Aſia, in Africa, and almoſt in Europe (where the holy Apoſtles ſo laboured and trauailed, we ſee now to be diſparkled among the Turkes, and their candleſticks remoued (the Lord of his great grace, reduce them againe; Amen:) So that of 12. parts of Chriſtendome, which was once planted in Chriſt, ſcarſe two parts remaine cleare, & they how long they ſhall ſo continue, the Lord knoweth: And albeit through the mercy of the Lord they eſcape the danger of the Turkes, yet haue they bene ſo beaten with the Pope, that they had beene better almoſt haue ben in the Turkes hands.

Againe, after the ſaid Iſraelites returned, being reſtored of Cyrus, let vs conſider well their ſtory, the continuance of time, the maner of their regiments, and what afflictions they ſuffered in the time of the Machabees: and we ſhall ſee a liuely repreſentation of theſe our daies expreſſed in that prophetical people, according as S. Paul writing of them, teacheth how all things hapned to them in figures: that is, the actions and doings of that one nation, be as figures and types of greater maters, what ſhall happen in theſe latter times of the whole Church vniuerſally in Chriſt collected.

So the tranſmigration and deliuerance againe of theſe two tribes, declareth to be the affliction of Chriſts Church for ſinne: and yet the God will not vtterly reiect his people for his Sonnes ſake, as by manifold examples of the Church hitherto may well appeare.

Againe, the continuance of the law firſt giuen by Moſes, vnto the deſtruction of the ſaid people by Titus, amounteth to 1564. yeares: So we counting the age of the new Teſtament, and reckoning from the day of our redemption vnto this preſent, he came now to the yeare 1534. lacking but only 33. yeares of the full number.

Likewiſe, in counting the yeares from their deliuerance out of captiuitie, to the end of their diſſolution, we finde 564. years, during which yeares, as the Church of the Iewes was not gouerned vnder the authoritie of Kings, but the high Prieſts tooke all the power and authoritie to themſelues: ſo we Chriſtians, for the ſpace eſpecially of theſe latter 564. yeares, that haue we ſeene and felt, but only the iuriſdiction & domination of the Pope and high Prieſts playing the Rex in all countries, and ruling the whole, whereby, by the count of the yeares, it is to be thought, the day of the Lords comming not to be farre off.

Furthermore, in thoſe latter yeres of the Iewes kingdome, what troubles and afflictions that people ſuſtained 300. yeares together, but chiefly the laſt 166. yeares before the comming of Chriſt, by Antiochus and his ſeloiues, the hiſtorie of the Machabees can report. Wherein we haue alſo notoriouſly to vnderſtand the miſerable perations & perſecutions of Chriſt an Churches in theſe latter ende of the world by Antichriſt. For by Antiochus, Antichriſt (no doubt) is figured and repreſented. This Antiochus ſurnamed Magnus, and Antiochus Epiphanes his ſonne, came of the ſtocke of Seleucus Nicanor: much like as the Mahumets, the Turke, and Solymannus, came of the ſtocke of Ottomannus. Wherein this is to be noted and pondered, that like as of the ſaid Seleucus were twelue Syrian Kings one after another of that generation, whiche raged ouer the Iſraelites with much ſeuerite and tyranny: ſo of this dinelish generation of Ottomannus, haue come twelue Turkiſh tyrants, whereof this Solymann is now the twelfth: God grant he may be the laſt. And as the two laſt Antiochi, being ſonnes of the two brethren, did fight together for the kingdome, and in fighting were both ſlaine, and thereby after the kingdome fell to the Romanes: ſo the Lord grant for Chriſts ſake, that the bloudie broode of this

And that the truth hereof may the better appeare to ſuch as be diſpoſed to meditate more vpon the matter, I thought good and profitable for the reader, to ſet before his eyes, in table-wiſe, the Catalogue of both theſe Antichriſtian families, with the names and ſucceſſion of the perſons, firſt of the twelue Syrian Kings, then of the twelue Ottomans, in like number and order.

These two peſtilent families and generations, riſing out (I doubtles) from the bottomles pit, to plague the people of God, as in number of ſucceſſion they do not much differ: ſo in manner of their doings and wicked abominations, they be as neere agreeing, being both enemies alike to the people and Church of Chriſt, both murtherers and parricides of their owne brethren and kinsed, both blaſphemers of God, and troublers of the whole world. Where in we haue all to learne and note by the way, the terrible anger of almightie God againſt ſinne, and wickedneſs of men.

The time of Antichriſt examined by propheſies.

Furthermore, who ſo is diſpoſed to conſider and caſt the courſe of times, and to marke how things be diſpoſed by the marueilous operation of Gods prouidence, ſhall finde the times alſo of theſe two aduerſaries, in much like ſort to concurre and agree. For inconſidering with our ſelues both the Teſtamen.s and Churches of God, the firſt of the Iewes, the ſecond of the Chriſtians, loke what time had the Syrian Kings to rage, then in Hieruſalem, the ſame proportion of time hath now the tyranny of the Turkes to murther the Chriſtians: ſo that the one Antichriſt may well repreſent and prefigure the other. For as by the booke of Machabees may appeare, Antiochus Epiphanes was about the 191. yeare before the paſſion of our Sauiour, and day of our redemption: ſo now calling the ſame number from this preſent yeare bakeward, we ſhall finde it to be about the ſame yeare and time, when Baiazetes the fourth Turke after Ottoman, began to remoue his Imperiall ſeate from Burſa in Bithynia, to Adrianople in Europe, which is a City of Thracia. In which yeare and time began all the miſchiefe in Europe, as is to be ſeene before, pag. 678. and this was the yeare of our Lord 1375. Vnto the which yeare, if we adde 691. it maketh 1566. according to the propheſie of the Apocalypſe, chapter 20. where it is propheſied of Gog and Magog, that they ſhall compaſſe about the tents of the Saints, and the well beloued Citie, by the which wellbeloued Citie, is meant (no doubt) Europa: and this was in the yeare aboueſaid, 1375. Although touching the preciſe points of yeares and times, it is not for vs greatly to be enquiſite therein, but yet where diligence and ſtudious meditation may helpe to knowledge, I would not with negligence to be a pretence to ignorance. And thus much for the times of Antiochus and his fellowes.

Apoc. cap. 20.

The name of Antichriſt what it containeth.

Now what cruelty this Antiochus exerciſed againſt the people of God, it is manifeſt in the hiſtory of the Machabees: where we reade, that this Antiochus in the eight yeare of his reigne, in his ſecond comming to Hieruſalem, firſt gaue forth in commandement, that all the Iewes ſhould relinquiſh the law of Moſes, and worſhip the Idoll of Iupiter Olympius, which he ſet vp in the temple of Hieruſalem. The bookes of Moſes and of the Prophets he burned. He ſet garriſons of ſouldiors to warde the Idoll. In the Citie of Hieruſalem he cauſed the feaſts and reuels of Bacchus to be kept, full of all filth and wickedneſs. Old men, women, and virgins, ſuch as would not leaue the law of Moſes, with cruell torments he murthered. The mothers that would not circumciſe their children, he ſlue. The children that were circumciſed, he hanged vp by the necks. The temple he ſpoiled and waſted. The Aultar of God, and candleſticke of gold, with the other ornaments and furniture of the temple, partly he caſt out, partly he carried away. Contrary to the law of God, he cauſed them to offer, and to eate Swines fleſh. Great murther and ſlaughter he made of the people, cauſing them either to leaue their law, or to loſe their liues. Among whom, beſides many other, with cruell torments, he put to death a godly mother with her ſeuen ſonnes, ſending his cruell proclamations through all the land, that whoſoeuer kept the obſeruancies of the Sabboth, and other rites of the law, and refuſed to condeſcend to his abominations, ſhould be executed. By reaſon whereof, the Citie of Hieruſalem was left voide and deſolate of all good men, but there was a great number, that were contented to follow and obey his Idolatrous proceedings, and to flatter with the king, became enemies vnto their brethren. Briefly, no kind of calamity, nor face of miſery could be heiued in any place, which was not there ſeene. Of the tyranny of this Antiochus, it is hiſtoried at large in the booke of Machabees: And Daniell propheſying before of the ſame, declareth that the people of the Iewes deſerued no leſſe for their ſinnes and tranſgreſſions.

1. Machab. cap. 1. Dan. 9.

By conſent of all writers, this Antiochus beareth a figure of the great Antichriſt, which was to follow in the later end of the world, is alreadie come, and worketh what he can againſt vs: Although as S. Iohn ſaith, there haue bene, and be many Antichriſts, as parts and members of the body of Antichriſt, which are forerunners yet to ſpeake of the head and principall Antichriſt, and great enemy of Chriſts Church, he is to come in the later end of the world, at what time ſhall be ſuch tribulation, as neuer was ſeene before: whereby is meant (no doubt) the Turke, prefigured by this Antiochus. By this Antichriſt, I do alſo meane all ſuch, which following the ſame doctrine of the Turkes, thinke to be ſaued by their workes and deſerrits, and not by their faith onely in the Sonne of God, of what title and profeſſion eis ſoeuer they be: eſpecially if they vſe the like force and violence for the ſame, as he doth, &c.

Antiochus a figure of the Turke.

Ex Lyra in Gloſa ordin. cap. 1. Machab.

Of the tyranny of this Antiochus aforeſaid, and of the tribulations of the Church in the later times both of the Iewes Church, and alſo of the Chriſtian Church to come, let vs heare and conſider the words of Daniell in the 11. chapter, and alſo in his 12. chapter, propheſying of the ſame as followeth.

He ſhall returne and freat againſt the holy couenant: ſo ſhall he do, he ſhall euen returne and haue intelligence with them that forſake the holy couenant. And armes ſhall ſtand on his part, and they ſhall pollute the Sanctuary of ſtrength, and ſhall take away the daily ſacrifice, and they ſhall ſet vp the abominable deſolation. And ſuch as wickedly breake the couenant, ſhall flatter with him deceitfully: but the people that do know their God, ſhall preuaile and proſper. And they that vnderſtand among the people, ſhall inſtruct many: yet they ſhall fall by ſword and by flame, by captiuitie, and by ſpoile many dayes.

Dan. cap. 11.

Now when they ſhall fall they ſhall be holpen with a little helpe: but many ſhall cleaue vnto them fainedly. And ſome of them of vnderſtanding ſhall fall to be tried, and to be purged, and to make them white, till the time be out: for there is a time appointed. And the King ſhall do what him liſt: he ſhall exalt himſelfe, and magnifie himſelfe againſt all that is God.

and shal speake maruellous things against the God of Gods, and shal prosper, till the wrath be accomplished: for the determination is made. Neither shal he regard the God of his Fathers, nor the desires of women, nor care for any God: for he shal magnifie himselfe above all. But in his place shal he honour the god Mauzzim, and the god whom his fathers knew not, shal he honour with gold and with siluer, and with precious stones, and pleasant things.

Mauzzim the Popes god.

Thus shal he doe in the holds of Mauzzim with a strange god, whom he shal acknowledge: he shall increase his glory, and shal cause them to rule ouer many, and shal diuide the land for gaine. And at the end of time, shal the king of the South puffe at him, and the king of the North shall come against him like a whirle wind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships, and he shall enter into the countreyes, and shall ouerflow and passe thorough. He shall enter also into a pleasant land, and many countreyes shall be ouerthrowne: but these shall escape out of his hand, euen Edom and Moab, and the chiefe of the children of Ammon. He shall stretch forth his hands also vpon the countreyes, and the land of Egypt shal not escape. But he shall haue power ouer the treasures of gold and of siluer, and ouer all the precious things of Egypt, and of the Lybians, and of the blacke Moores where he shall passe. But the tidings out of the East and the North, shall trouble him, therefore he shall go forth with great wrath to destroy and roote out many: And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace betweene the Seas, in the glorious and holy mountaine, yet he shall come to his end, and none shall helpe him.

To this place of Daniel aboue prefixed, might also be added the Prophesie of the said Daniel written in the seuenth chapter, and much tending to the like effect: where he entreating of his vision of foure beasts which signifie the foure Monarchies) and speaking now of the fourth Monarchie, hath these words.

Dan. cap. 7.

After this, I saw in the visions by night, and behold, the fourth beast was grimme and horrible, and maruellous strong. It had great yron teeth, it deuoured, and brake in peeces, and stamped the residue vnder his feete: and it was vnlike the other beasts that were before it, for it had ten horns. As I considered the horns, behold, there came vp among them another little horne, before whom, there were three of the first hornes pluckt away. And behold, in this horne were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking presumptuous things, and seemed more stout then the other. Which horne also (when I looked) made battaile with the Saints, and preuailed against them: vntill the olde aged one, and iudgement was giuen to the Saints of the highest, and till the appointed time was come, that the Saints should haue the kingdome.

Thus haue ye heard the plaine words of Daniel. In the which, as he both manifestly before the comming of Antiochus the great aduersary, toward the latter end of the Iewes: so by the same Antiochus is figured also to vs the great aduersary of Christ, which is the Turke.

The Papist vseth Gentile to Antichrist.

Although some there be not withstanding, which with great learning and iudgement, doapply this place of Daniel aboue recited, not to the Turke, but rather to the Pope, and that for two, or three especiall causes herein touched and noted.

The first note.

The first is this, that the wicked transgressors of the couenant shall ioyne with him accidentally and hypocritically, which shall pollute the Tabernacle of strength, and take away the perpetuall sacrifice, and bring in the abomination of desolation.

The second note.

The second note is, that the Prophet declareth, how the israelites among the people shall teach many, and that they shall fall vpon the sword, into fire, and captiuitie, and shall be banished, whereby they shall be tried, chosen, and made bright and pure, &c. All which (say they) is not among the Turkes to be seene, but onely in the Popes Church: where the faithfull preachers and teachers of the people are slaine and burned, and go to wracke, &c. Where like wise it followeth, that they shall be holpen against Antichrist, and that many false brethren shall ioyne vnto them dissemblingly, &c. To this they alledge that the Christians haue no such helpe against the Turke, whereunto such false brethren should ioyne themselues, as is and hath bene commonly seene among the Christians against the Pope, from time to time, almost in all Countreyes: as in Germany by the Protestants, and free Cities: In England in king Henries time by the Lord Cromwell, and afterward by king Edward, and now by Queene Elizabeth: in Scotland, by the godly Nobilitie: In France, by the Queene of Nauarre and her sonne: and also by the Prince of Condy and the worthy Admirall, and his two brethren, and many others. In Flaunders, by them whome the Regent calleth Beggers: & as was in the time of the Papshaues against Antiochus.

Helps of the Christians against the Pope.

The third note.

Thirdly, that the king shall exalt himselfe aboue all that hath the name of God, and shall lift vp his mouth to speake presumptuously against God.

The fourth note.

Fourthly, that he careth not for the desires of women: which may seeme to note how the Popes doctrine shall forbid the honest and lawfull marriage in Churchmen.

The fift note.

The fift especialtie which they apply to the Pope, is that which followeth in the Prophet, saying: Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor any God: but in stead of him, shall set vp his God Mauzzim, and shall worship him with siluer and gold, and pretious stone, &c. which they do apply to the Pope, setting vp his god of bread, and worshipping him with glistering golden ornaments, and most solemne seruice.

Mauzzim the Popes god.

The 1. note.

Sixtly, it followeth: and he shall increase them with much glory and riches, and shall diuide vnto them lands and possessions, &c. meaning, that the Pope hauing dominion ouer treasures of gold and siluer, and all precious things of the land, shall indue his Cardinals, Prelats, his flattering doctours, with Friers, Monkes and Priests, and all such as shall take his part, with great priuileges, liberties, reuenues, and possessions. And thus I say, some there be, which apply this prophesie of the vii. and xi. chapters of Daniel, vnto the Bishop of Rome. Whom although I take to be an arrogant persecutor of Christs Church: yet I iudge rather those two chapters of Daniel concerning the little horne in the middle of the ten hornes, and the great destroier of the pleasant land and glorious holy mountaine, to meane first Antiochus, and by him secondly to meane the great Antichrist, the Turke: who hath now set already the tabernacles of his palace betweene the Seas, according to the Prophesies of Daniel, as is aboue said.

The 7. and 11. chapt. of Daniel meaneth the great Antichrist, the Turke.

Ouer and besides these Prophesies aboue alledged, may be added also the Prophesie of Ezechiel chapter 39. speaking of Gog and Magog: which as it may be applied to the oppression of the Iewes vnder the heathen multitude, which stopped the building of the Citie, and vnder the Syrian kings, &c. yet in the same also is expressed the calamities and afflictions of Christes Church: in these latter times, vnder the Saracens and the Turkes, &c.

Ezechiel cap. 38.39.

Gog and Magog.

Proceeding further in this matter, let vs come now to the Prophecies of the new Testament, and marke the words of Saint Paul, writing to the Thessalonians, which then were Christened, and holy either are Turkish, or vnder the Turke, 2. Thess. which words be these: Be ye not sodainly moued in your mind, nor troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as sent from vs, as though the day of Christ were at hand. Let no man deceiue you by any meanes, for the Lord will not come before there come a defection, or a departing first, and that wicked man be reuealed, the sonne of perdition, which is an aduersary, and is exalted aboue all power, and that which is called god: so that he shall sit in the temple of God, boasting himselfe to be god, &c. Although this defection and departing may haue a double vnderstanding, as will of the Popes see which is gone and departed from the free iustification by faith onely in Christ, through the promise of grace) as of the Turkes yet leaning a while to speake of the Pope, because it appeareth more notoriously in the Turke, wee will chiefly apply it to him: in whom to apply it both agree, that vnlesse this great defection from faith in so many Churches, had hapned by the Turke, it had bene hard to vnderstand the Apostles minde. Which now by the history of these Turkes is easie and euident to be knowen, considering what a ruine hath happened to the Church of Christ by these miserable Turkes, what Emperies, Nations, Kingdomes, Countreyes, Dotmies, and Cities, be remoued from the name and profession of Christ, how many thousands and infinite multitudes of Christen men and children, in Asia, in Affrike, and in Europe, are caried away from Christs Church, to Mahumetes Religion, some to serue for the Turkes guard among the Ianizarites, some for souldiours, some for miners, some for gunners, to fight and warre against the Christians: so that the most part of all the Churches planted once by the Apostles, are now degenerated into Turkes, only a small handfull of Christians reserued yet in these wretch parts of Europe, of the which small residue, that shall also become worthy, except Christ himselfe doe helpe, Christ onely himselfe doth know. How great this defection hath bin, spoken of by Saint Paul, thou mayst see (gentle Reader) in the table aboue described, pag. 698.

Prophesies of the Turke and the Pope, which of them is the greater Antichrist. 703

Yide supra pag. 696.

The Popes Church.

Notwithstanding, this tert of the holy Apostle (as I afore said) may be verified also with no lesse reason, vpon the Bishop of Rome, then vpon the Turke, both for that he is a maintainer of wickednesse, and also for that he is an aduersary, that is, contrary in all his doings and proceedings to Christ.

The place of Saint Paul. 2. Thess. applied vnto the Pope.

Thirdly, for that he sitteth in the temple of God, and so did not Mahumet.

Fourthly, because he is an exalter of himselfe, & sitteth more like a god then a man in Rome, whereof see more in the booke set forth in English, called The Conuictions of the Popes.

Fiftly, for that he seduceth, and hath seduced by his apostasie, the most part of all Christendome from the doctrine and free promises of God, into a wrong and strange way of saluation, which is not to be inuented freely before God, onely by our faith in Christ his welbeloued Sonne (vnto the which faith, the promise of God freely and graciously hath annexed all our saluation onely, & to no other thing) but hath taught vs to work our saluation by an infinite number of other things. In so much that he hindreth the necessitie of our saluation also to this, that we must beleeue (if we will be saued) & receiue him to be the Vicar of Christ in earth, &c.

But to returne againe vnto the Turkes, among all the prophecies prophecies both of the old Testament and of the new, there is none that painteth out the Antichristian kingdome of the Turkes, better then doth the Reuelation of S. Iohn, whose words let vs weigh and consider. Who in the Apocalypse 9. where he speaketh of opening the seuenth and last seale, (which signifieth the last age of the world) and there writing of the vi. trumpets of the vi. Angels, at the sounding of the vi. Angell saith, Loose the iiij. Angels, which are bound in the great riuer Euphrates. And 4 foure Angels were loosed, which were ready both day and houre, and moneth, and yeare, to slay the third part of men. And the number of horsemen were twenty thousand times ten thousand: and I heard the number of them. And thus I saw in a vision, horses, and them that sate on them, hauing fiery habergions, and of Iacinth stone, and of brimstone, and the heads of the horses were as the heads of Lyons, and out of their mouthes went foorth fire, and smoke, and brimstone, of these three plagues was the third part of men killed, that is, of the fire, smoke, and brimstone, which proceeded out of their mouthes, &c.

Apoc. 9.

The 7 trumpets of the 7. Angels in the Reuel. expounded.

By the seuen Angels with their seuen Trumpets, is signified the seuen plagues that come in this seuenth and last age of the world.

The first trumpet.

By the first Trumpet of the first Angell, is meant the first plague comming last and next before the plague of the great iudgement day, which first plague is heere described to come by the Gast Kings, that is, by the Turkes, as followeth to be seene.

Loosing of the angels vpon the riuer Euphrates.

By loosing the Angels which had rule of the great riuer Euphrates, is signified the letting out of the East Kings, that is, the Turkes out of Scythia, Tartaria, Persia, and Arabia, by whome the third part of Christendome shall be destroyed, as we see it this day hath come to passe.

Apoc. 9.

It followeth in the prophesie, Their power shall be in their mouthes, and in their tayles. For their tayles be like Serpents, hauing heads, and with them they hurt, &c. Meaning that these Turkes with the words of their mouthes, shall threaten great destruction of fire and sword, to them that will not yeeld vnto them, and in the end, when the Christians shall yeeld vnto them, trusting to their promises, they like Serpents shall deceiue them in the end, and kill them, as appeareth by the story of the Turkes aboue past, pag. 682. 683. 692.

The defection in time of Antichrist declared.

The like prophecy also after the like words and sence, is to be seene and read in the 16. chapter of the Apocalypse, where S. Iohn entreating of seuen cups, filled with the wrath of the liuing God, giuen to the hands of seuen Angels, by one of the foure beasts (that is in the time of one of the foure Monarchies, which was the Monarchy of Rome) speaketh likewise of the first Angell, which poured his viall of Gods wrath vpon the great riuer Euphrates, and the waters thereof dried vp, that the way of the kings of the East should be prepared, &c.

Apoc. ca. 16.

The 4. beasts in the Apoc. meant the 4. Monarchies.

By the first Angell with the first viall, is meant as before, the last plague saue one that shall come vpon the Christians. By the Kings of the East are meant the Saracens, and 12. Ottoman Turkes. By drying vp the riuer of Euphrates, is signified the way of these Turkes to be prepared by the Lords appointment, to come out of the East to the West parts of the world, to molest and afflict the Christians. It followeth more in the text. And I saw three vncleane spirits like frogs, come out of the mouth of the Dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false Prophet, for they are the spirits of diuels, doing wonders, to goe vnto the Kings of the whole earth, to assemble and gather them together to the battell against the day of the great God omnipotent, &c. And it followeth shortly after, And he assembled them together into a place which is called in hebrue Armagedon, that is, a trap or traine of destruction. And immediatly it followeth in the same place, And the seuenth Angell poured out his viall in the ayre, and a mightie voice came from heauen, out of the Throne, saying, fullum est, It is done, or finished, &c. Whereby it is to be vnderstoode, that before the last consummation of the world, great force shall be seene, and a mighty army of the enemies shall be collected and gathered against the people, and Saints of the highest, and then commeth the consummation, with factum est, &c.

The Kings of the East. Drying vp of Euphrates. Ibidem.

Wherefore it is not for naught that the holy Spirit of God in the same place, a little before the first Angell doth poure out his viall, doth exhort all the faithfull, saying: Behold, I come like a theefe in the night, Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, least he walke naked, and men see his filthines, &c.

Ibidem. An exhortation of the holy ghost to the faithfull

Nicol. de Lyra, and Paulus Bishop of Burdens, and Matthias Dorinke writing vpon the 13. chapter of the Apocal. and expounding the mystery of the second beast, rising out of the earth, hauing the hornes of a Lambe, &c. doe apply the same to Mahumet and the Turkes, with a solemne declaration made vpon the same. Which interpretation of theirs, although in some points it may seeme to haue some appearance of probabilitie, neither can it be denied but that Mahumet and the Turke be pestilent and wicked enemies of Christ our Lord, and moll bitter persecutors of his Church, yet as touching the proper supernaturall meaning of the Apostle in that place, speaking of the false lamb, &c. If we consider well all the circumstances of that beast, and marke the consequence of the text, both of that which goeth before, and followeth after, we must needs grant, that Nicol. de Lyra, with his fellowes, and with all such like of the popes schole, that follow that schole to be deceiued, and that the description and interpretation of that false horned lambe, must necessarily bee applied only to the bishop of Rome, and none other, which is to be proued by sixe principall causes or arguments.

The two beasts in the 13. chapter of the Apocalypse expounded.

Ex Bonifacio & Ferrariense Mesanen. & alijs.

The first reason.

The first is, for that this beast is described to beare the hornes of a lambe. By the which lambe, no doubt, is meant Christ. By the hornes of the lambe is signified the outward shew or resemblance of Christ our Saniour: which shew or resemblance can haue no relation to Mahumet, for that he taketh himselfe to be aboue Christ, and Christ as an excellent Prophet of God, sitting at his feet. Wherefore saying Mahumet commeth neither as equall to Christ, nor as vicar vnder Christ, this prophesie cannot agree in him, but only in him which of pensile in plaine words professeth, that all Christs lambs and sheepe not singularly, but vniuersally through the whole world, are committed to him, as vicar of Christ, and successor of Peter, and that all men must confesse the same of necessitie, or els they are none of Christs sheepe, &c. wherein it is easie to see where the pretended hornes of the lambe bee grow.

The second reason.

The second argument, And he spake like the dragon, &c. A Lambes hornes and the mouth of a dragon, doe not agree together. And as they doe not agree together in nature, so neither can they be found in any one person, either Turke, or other, (if we will iudge truly) so likely, as in the bishop of Rome. When thou hearest him call himselfe the apostolicall bishop, the Vicar of Christ, the successour of Peter, the seruant of Gods seruants, &c. thou seest in him the two hornes of a lambe, and wouldest thinke him to be a lambe in deede, and such a one as would vsually vouchsafe for humilitie: but heare him speake, and you shall find him a dragon. See and reade the epistle of pope Martine the fift aboue mentioned, pag. 597. charging, commanding, and threatning emperours, kings, dukes, princes, marquesses, earles, barons, knights, rectors, consuls, proconsuls, with their shires, counties, and vniuersities of their kingdomes, prounces, cities, townes, castles, villages, and other places. See the answere of pope Vrban the second, and his message to king William Rufus, page 168. Behold the workes and doings of pope Innocent against king Iohn.

A Lambes hornes and the mouth of a dragon.

Anno 1553.

Vide supra pag. 595.

Note also the answere of another pope to the king of England, which for the price of the kings head, would not grant vnto him the inuesting of his bishops. Marke well the words and doings of Pope Hildebrand against the Emperour Henrie the fourth, page 161. Also of Pope Alexander the 2. treading vpon the necke of Fredericus Barbarossa, not like a lambe treading vpon a dragon, but like a dragon treading vpon a lambe: so that his owne verse might be turned vpon himselfe: Tanquam aspis & basiliscus super aniculam ambulans, & tanquam Leo & draco conculcans agnum. Consider moreouer the behauiour, manner, condition, and propertie almost of all the Popes which haue bene these 600. yeeres, and what Dragon or Serpent could be more vipperous, then their owne doings and words can speake, and giue testimonie against themselues.

The pope hath the lookes of a Lambe, but the mouth of a Dragon.

It followeth moreouer in the same prophecie of the Apocalypse for the third argument. And he doth all the power of the first beast, presently before his face, and causeth the earth, and all the inhabitants therein to honour the first beast, the stripe of whose deadly wound was cured, &c.

The third reason.

In this prophecy two things are to be noted: first, what the first beast is, whose power the second beast doth execute. Secondly, what this second beast is, which doth exercise his power in his sight. The first of these beasts here in the Apocal. described, hauing seuen heads and ten hornes, must needs signifie the citie of Rome, which may easily be proued by two demonstrations. First, by the expolition of the 17. chapter of the same Apocalyps, where is declared and described the said beast to stand of 7. hils, and to containe 10. Kings, hauing the whole power of the dragon giuen: and also the same citie to bee named the whore of Babylon, drunken with the blood of Saints. All which properties ioyned together, can agree in no wise but onely to the heathen Empire of Rome, which Citie at that time of writing these prophecies, had the gouernment of the whole world. The second demonstration of euidence, may be deduced out of the number of the monethes assigned to this beast, Apoc. 13. For so it is written, that this beast had power to make, that is, to worke his malice against Christes people 42. moneths, which moneths counted by sabbathes of yeeres (that is, euery moneth for seuen yeeres) maketh vp the iust number of those yeeres, in which the primitiue Church was vnder the terrible persecutions of the heathen Emperors of Rome, as is afore specified, pag. 765.

A description of the City and Monarchy of Rome.

Which thing thus standing, proued and confessed, that the first beast must needs signifie the Empire and City of Rome, then must it necessarily follow that the second beast with the

The scripture is cleere both that the ten hornes of the beast Apoc. 13.

lambes hornes must signifie the bishop and pope of the same citty of Rome. The reason wherof is euident, and apparent by that which followeth in the prophecie, where it is declared, that the second beast hauing two hornes of a lambe, receiued and exercised all the power of the first beast, before or in the sight of the said beast, which cannot bee verified neither in the Turke, nor in any other, but onely in the pope of Rome, who (as you see) receiueth, blaspeth, and deriueth to himselfe all the power of that citty and Monarchie of Rome: Insomuch that he saith, that when Constantine or Ludouicus yeelded vnto him the rule and kingdome of that citty, he gaue him but his owne, and that which of right and duty belonged to him before.

The reason why the Turke hath power of Rome.

And this authority or power ouer all the empire of Rome, he worketh not in Asia, or in Constantinople as the Turke doth, but in the sight of the beast which gaue him the power, that is, in the citty of Rome it selfe, which is the first beast here in this prophecie of the Apocalyps described.

Fourthly, it followeth more, And he causeth the earth, and all the inhabitants therein, to worship and honour the first beast, which had a deadly wound, and was cured, &c. The interpretation of this part, as also of all the other parts of the same chapter, standeth vpon the definition of the first beast, for hereby greatest, as cannot be denied, that the first beast, signifieth the citty and empire of Rome, it must consequently follow, that the bishop (whom we call the pope) of the same citty of Rome, must be vnderstood by the second beast, forsomuch as neither Turke nor any other, but only the bishop of Rome, hath holden vp the estimation and dignity of that citty, which began to be in ruine and decay by the Vandalians, Gothes, Herulians, and Lombards, about the yeere of our Lord.456. but afterward by the bishop of Rome, the pristine state and honour of that citty reuiued againe, and flourished in as great veneration, as euer it did before. And that is it which the holy Ghost seemeth here to meeane of the first beast, saying: That he had a wound of the sword, and was cured. For so it followeth.

Apoc. 13. The fourth reason.

The fifth reason.

Fifthly, And he caused all the inhabitants of the earth to make the image of the beast, which had the stripe of the sword and liued. And it was giuen to him to giue life to the image of the beast, and to make the image thereof to speake, and to cause all them that worshipped not the image of the beast, to be killed: forcing all persons both little and great, rich and poore, bond and free, to take the marke of the beast in their right hand, or in their foreheads, and that none might buy or sell but they which had the marke, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name, &c.

Rome almost dead.

By giuing life to the image of the beast, and making it to speake is to be presupposed that the beast was at a meere point of death, and lay speechles before, insomuch that the Citie of Rome began to lose and change his name, and was called a while Odacria, of Odacer King of the Herulians: which by dint of sword surprised the Romaines: and yet not withstanding, by the meanes of this Romaine Prelate, the said Citie of Rome, which was then ready to giue vp the ghost, so recouered his maiestie and strength againe, that it is hard to say, whether Rome did euer ruffle rage in his tyrannie before, in the time of Nero, Domitian, Diocletian, and other Emperors, more tragically, then it hath done vnder the Pope: or whether that Rome had all Kings, Queenes, Princes, Dukes, Lords, and all subiects more vnder obedience and subiection, when the Emperors raigned, or now in the raigne of the pope. And therefore it is said not without cause of the holy Ghost: That it is giuen to him, to giue life and speech to the image of the beast, causing all them to be slaine which will not worship the image of the beast, &c. As for example hereof, who seeth not what numbers and multitudes of Christian men, women and children in all Countreyes, haue bene put to the fire and sword? Stories of all times will declare, what bloudshe hath bene made of Christian blood, about the prehemminence and maiestie of the sea of Rome: what Churches and Countreyes both Greeks and Latin, haue bene excommunicated: what kings haue bene deposed, and Emperours stripped from their Imperiall seate, and all because they would not stoope and bend to the Image of the beast, that is, to the maiesty and title of Rome, aduanced vp so highly now by the Bishop thereof, as it was neuer higher before in the raigne of Nero or Diocletian. Wherefore taking the first beast to signifie the Empire of Rome, which cannot be denyed, it is plaine, that the second beast must necessarily be applied to the pope, and not to the Turke, for as much as the Turke seeketh nothing lesse then the aduancement of that Empire, but rather striueth against it, to plucke it downe.

To giue life to the image of the beast. The Image of Rome speaketh against the citie as euer it did.

Et fecit vt terra & habitantes in ea adorarent imaginem bestiæ. Apoc. 13.

The first reason.

The first and last argument is grounded vpon the number of the name of the beast, expressed by the holy Ghost in the same Prophecie, by the letters χξϛ. In which letters, although there lieth great darkenesse and difficultie to be vnderstoode, yet certaine auncient Fathers which were disciples and hearers of them which heard S. Iohn himselfe, as Irenæus and other, do expound the said letters conuenerally to containe the name of the beast, and to be the name of a man, vnder this word Lateinos: Where as else no other name lightly of any person either in Greeke or Latine, will agree to the same, saue onely the foresaid name Lateinos. Although some later writers giuing their coniectures vpon the same, do find the name of Latcranus in Hebrew letters, to answere to the same number. Some faine other names, as Genseric or Mirac. made words, which signifie nothing, as Diclus, or Ludouic, by Romane letters, &c. But of all names properly signifying any man, none commeth so neere to the number of this mystery, if it goe by order of letters) as doth the word Lateinos aforesaid. And thus much by the way, and occasion of Nicolaus de Lyra, Paulus Burgen, Matthias Dorindus, the author of Fortalitium fidei, and other Commentaries moe of the same faction: who writing vpon this thirteenth Chapter of the Apocalips, and not considering the circumstances thereof, both are deceiued themselues, and deceiue many other, applying that to the Turke, which cannot otherwise be verified but onely vpon the pope, as may appeare sufficiently by the premisses: Not that I write this of any mood or malice either to the citie of Rome, or to the person of the bishop, as being Gods creature: but being occasioned here to entreat of the prophecies against the Turkes, would wish the Readers not to bee deceiued, but rightly to vnderstand the simple Scriptures according as they lie, to the intent that the true meaning thereof being bolted out, it may be the better knowne what prophecies directly make against these Turkes, what otherwise.

The number of the name of the beast mentioned 666.

a The name Lateinos.

Et hic bibet de vino iræ Dei. Apoc. 14.

In the which prophecies against the Turkes, now to proceed, let vs come to the 20. Chapter of the Apocalyps, wherein the holy Scripture seemeth plainelie and directlie to notifie the said Turkes. The words of the prophecie be these.

Apoc. cap. 20.

And I saw an angell descending from heauen, hauing the key of the bottomlesse pit, and a great chaine in his hand: and he caught the dragon, the old Serpent, which is the diuell and Satanas, and bound him vp for a thousand yeeres, and cast him in the pit, and sealed him vp, that he should not seduce the people any more, till the thousand yeeres were expired: and after that hee must bee let loose for a little while, &c.

The beginning of the Turkes Prygenie.

And it followeth after: And when the thousand yeeres shall be complete, Satanas shall be let out of his dungeon, and shall goe abroad to seduce the people, which are on the foure corners of the land of Gog and Magog, to assemble them to battel, whose number is like to the sands of the sea. And they went vp vpon the latitude or breadth of the earth, and compassed about the rents of the Saints, and the welbeloued cities, &c.

To the perfect vnderstanding of this prophecie, three things are necessarie to be knowne. First, what is meant by binding vp, and losing out of Satanas the old dragon. Secondly, at what time and yeare first he was chained vp and sealed for a thousand yeeres. Thirdly, at what yeare and time these thousand yeeres did end, when as hee should be losed out againe for a little season. Which three points being well examined and marked, the Prophecie may easily be vnderstood directly to be meant of the Turke. Albeit Anagogically some part thereof may also be referred not vnproperly vnto the Pope, as is aboue notified.

The binding and loosing out of Satan three things to be noted in this prophecie.

What is meant by binding vp of Sathan.

First, by binding and losing of Satanas, seemeth to be meant the ceasing and staying of the cruell and horrible persecution of the heathen Emperours of Rome, against the true Christians, as is to be seene in the ten first persecutions in the primitiue Church aboue described in the former part of these Acts and Monuments: in the which most bloody persecutions, Satanas the diuell then raged without all measure, till the time it pleased almightie God to stop this old Serpent, and to tye him shorter. And thus haue you to vnderstand what is meant by the binding vp of Sathan for a thousand yeeres: whereby is signified, that the persecution against the Christians stirred vp by the beast (that is, in the Empire of Rome, through the inligation of Sathan) shall not alwayes continue, but shall breake vp after certaine time, and shall cease for a thousand yeeres, &c.

The time of binding vp of Sathan.

Apoc. 11. 42. moneths. In the Apoc. declared.

Now at what time and yeere this persecution, that is, the furie and rage of Sathan should cease, is also declared in the Apocalyps before: where in the 11. and. 13. chapters we read, that the beast afore mentioned, shall haue power to worke his malice and mischiefe, the space of 42. moneths, and no more, and then that Sathan should be locked vp for a thousand yeeres. The computation of which moneths being counted by Sabbathes of yeeres (after the example of the 69. weekes of Daniell, cap. 11.) it doth bring vs to the iust yeere and time, when that terrible persecution in the primitiue Church should end, and so it did. For giue to euery moneth a Sabbath of yeeres, that is, reckon euery moneth for seuen yeeres, and that maketh 294. yeeres, which was the full time betweene the 18. yeere of Tiberius, (vnder whom Christ suffered) and the death of Parentius the last persecutor of the primitiue Church in Europe, stirred by Constantinus, as may appeare by calculating the yeeres, moneths, and dayes betweene the said yeere of the raigne of Tiberius, and the latter end of Parentius: and so haue you the computation of the yeere and time, when Satan was first bound vp, after hee had raged in the primitiue Church 42. moneths.

Computation of yeeres betweene the beginning and ceasing of the persecutions in the primitiue Church.

Which

Which moneths, as is said, being counted by Sabbaths of yeeres, after the vsuall manner of the Scripture, mounteth to 294. yeeres: and so much was the full time betweene the passion of our Lord, wh. was in the 18. yeere of Tiberius, vnto the last yeere of Parentius.

Vide supra pag. 366.

The pope vpon no better reason found beast mentioned in the Apoc. ca. 13.

And here by the way commeth a note to be obserued, that forasmuch as by the number of these 42. moneths, specified in the Apocalyps the Empire of Rome must necessarily be confessed to be the first beast: therefore it must by like necessitie follow, the Bishop of Rome to be the second beast, with the two hornes of the Lambe, for that he onely hath and doth cause the said Empire of Rome to reuiue and to be magnified, and so doth not the Turke, but rather laboureth to the contrary. Wherefore let euery Christian man be wise and beware betime how he taketh the marke of the beast, least peraduenture it follow vpon him, that he drinke of that terrible cup of wrath mentioned, Apocal. chap. 14.

Thirdly, it remaineth to be discussed touching the third point in this foresaid prophecie, that as we haue found out (through the helpe of Christ) the yeere and time of Satans binding, so we search out likewise the time and season of his losing out, which by the testimonie of Scripture, was appointed to be a thousand yeeres after his binding vp, and rightly according to the time appointed, it came to passe. For if we number well by the Scripture the yeere of his binding vp, which was from the passion of our Lord 294. yeeres and adde thereto a thousand yeares, it mounteth to 1294. which was the very yeere when Ottomannus the first Turke began his raigne: Which was Ottomannus the first Turke began his raigne: Which was the first spring and welhead of all these wofull calamities that the Church of Christ hath felt both in Asia, Affrica, and Europe, almost these three hundreth yeeres past. For so we finde in Chronicles, that the liuing borne of the Turkes being first deriued into foure families, an. 1280. at length the familie of Otto made into foure families, an. 1280. at length the familie of Ottomannus preuailed, and thereupon came these, whom now we call Turkes: which was about the same time, when pope Boniface the eight was bishop of Rome.

The third yeere of the prophetie for the loosing out of Sathan.

The time of Transubstantiation.

The time of the Turkes.

Where by the way this is againe to be noted, that after the decree of transubstantiation was enacted in the councel of Laterane by pope Innocent the 3. the yere of our Lord 1215. not long after, about the yeere of our Lord 1260. was stirred vp the power and armes of the Otzuians, and of Othogules father of Ottomannus: who about the yeere of our Lord 1294. began first to vere the Christians about Pontus and Bithinia, and so beginning his kingdome an. 1300. reigned 28. yeeres, as is afore mentioned.

Ex Leonino Chalcondyla lib. 1.

The prophecie of Ezech. c. 38.

Mention was made before of Ezechiell prophecying against Gog, whose woods diuers expositours do applie against the Turke, and are these: Thou shalt come from thy place, out of the North parts, thou and much people with thee, all riding vpon horses, a great and a mighty army, and thou shalt come vp against my people of Israel as a cloud, to couer the land: Thou shalt be in the latter dayes, and I will bring thee vpon my land, that the heathen may know me, when I shall be sanctified in thee, O Gog, before their eies. Thus saith the Lord God: Art not thou he, of whom I haue spoken in the old time, by the hand of my seruants the Prophets of Israel, that prophecied in those dayes and yeeres, that I would bring thee vpon them? At the same time also, when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, my wrath shall arise in mine anger. For in mine indignation, and in the fire of my wrath haue I spoken it: Surely at that time there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel, so that the fishes of the sea, the foules of the heauen, the beasts of the field, and all that moue and creepe vpon the earth, and all the men that are vpon the earth shall tremble at my presence: the mountaines shall bee ouerthrowen: the starres shall fall, and euery wall shall fall to the ground, &c.

The prophecies of Methodius, Hildegardis and other, concerning the raigne and ruine of the Turkes.

Methodius prophecies.

VNto these testimonies aboue excerpted out of the holy Scriptures, let vs adde also the prophetical reuelations of Methodius, Hildegardis, Sybilla, and others. This Methodius is thought of some to be the same Methodius of whom Hierome, and Suidas make mention: which was bishop first of Olympus in Lycia, then of Tyrus, and suffered martyrdome in the last persecution of the primitiue Church, vnder Diocletian. Vnto whom also Trithemius attributeth the booke intituled: De Quatuor nouissimis temporibus. But that cannot be, forasmuch as the said Methodius doth cite and alleadge the Maister of Sentences, namely, in his second booke, and fire distinction, which maister of Sentences followed more then a thousand yeere after Christ: besides certaine other fabulous matter contained in the same booke. Albeit, bee cause he speaketh there of many things concerning the state of the Church vnder Antichrist, and the reformation of religion, as seemeth rightly to come to passe, and more is like to follow, I thought not to debraud the Reader thereof, leauing the credite of the Author to his arbitrement, to esteeme and iudge of him as he seeth cause. Among diuers other places of Methodius, prophecying of the latter time, These words doe follow.

The booke of Methodius mistaken.

The prophecies of Methodius, touching the Turke.

After that the children of Ishmael haue had multiplied in their generations to an infinite and innumerable multitude, in the desert aforesaid, they came out of the wildernes of Arabie, and entred into the habitable land, and fought with the kings of the Gentiles, which were in the land of promise, and the land was filled with them. And after 70. weekes, and halfe of their power wherewith they haue subdued all the kingdomes of the Gentiles, their heart was exalted, seeing themselues so to haue prenailed, and to haue conquered all things, &c. And afterward it followeth of the same matter in this sort.

It shall come to passe that the said seed of Ismaell, shall issue out and obtaine the whole world, with the regions thereof, in the entring of peace, from the land of Aegypt, vnto Ethiopia: and from the floud Euphrates, vnto India: and from the riuer Tygris, to the entring of Nabaot, the kingdom of Ionithus, the son of Noe, & from the North, vnto Rome & Illyricū Aegypt, and Thessalonica, and Albania, and so forth to the sea Ponticum, which diuideth the said kingdomes from Germany and France: and their yoke shall be double vpon the necks of all nations, and Gentiles: neither shall there bee nation or kingdome vnder heauen, which shall be able to stand against them in battaile, vntil the number of 8. weekes of yeeres, &c.

Eight weekes of yeeres, counting euery weeke for a sabbath of yeeres, that is, euery day for a yeere, amounteth to 56. yeeres.

Briefly, as in a grosse summe, this shall suffice, to admonish the reader, touching the meaning and methode of Methodius Prophecies, which Methodius first describing the long and tedious afflictions of Christs Church, maketh mention of the seede of Ishmaell, which comming out of the parts and deserts of Arabie, shall destroy (saith he) and vanquish the whole earth. So that the Christians shall be giuen of God, to the hands of the filthy Barbarians, to be slaine, polluted, & captiued: Persia, Armenia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Syria, Aegypt, the East parts, Asia, Spaine, all Grecia, France, Germania, Agathonia, Sicilia. The Romanes also shall be slaine and put to flight: also the Islands of the Seas shall be brought to desolation, and to captiuity, and put to the sword. The which tribulation of the Christians shall be without mercy or measure: the raunsome of gold and siluer and other exactions, intollerable, but especially the dwellers of Aegypt and Syria shall be most in the affliction of those times: And Hierusalem shall be filled with multitudes of people brought thither in captiuitie, from the foure windes which are vnder heauen. So that beasts also, and foules and fish in the water, and the waters of the sea, shall be to them obedient. Cities and Townes, which were before full of people, shall be laid wast. Women with child shall be ript: their children sticked: infants taken from their mothers, and cast in the streets, and none shall bury them. The rulers and sage of the people shall be slaine, and thrown out to the beasts. Churches shall be spoiled: the priests defroied: virgins defloured, and men compelled to sell their children, and the comming of them shall be chastisement without mercy, and with them shall goe their foure plagues: captiuity, destruction, perdition, and desolation, with much more, which for breuitie I omerpasse. And this affliction, saith he, shall last eight weekes, or Sabbaths of yeeres, which I take to signifie eight hundreth yeeres, &c.

Eight plagues threatned by the Scripture.

The first plague of the Christians.

Secondly after these terrible plagues thus described by Methodius vpon the Christians, which he saith shall fall vpon them for their wicked abhominations vsed in the first and second chapter of S. Paule to the Romanes: the said Methodius afterward, in this great distresse of the Christians, being out of all hope and comfort of reliefe, declareth and speaketh of a certaine king of the Greekes or Romanes, which shall stirre peace againe to the Christians. In which peace they shall reedifie their cities and mansions againe: the priests shalbe deliuered from their grieuances, and men at that time shall rest from their tribulations, and then shall the king of the Romanes dwell in the citie of Hierusalem a weeke or sabbath, and a halfe of times, &c.

The second plague of Christians for their sinnes.

Christians abusing Gods benefites.

Thirdly, during the time of this peace, the said Methodius saith, that men shall fall into licentious security, and carelesse life: and then according to the words of the Apostle, saying: When they shall say, peace, peace, sodaine destruction shall fall vpon them: then (saith he) shall be opened the gates of the North, and the beastly people shall breake in, which king Alexander the great did close vp within 2. mountaines, making his prayer vnto the Lord God, that he would bind vp that beastiall and execrable people, least with their filthy and detestable pollutions, they should come out & pollute the holy land. Whose intercession being heard, the Lord commaunded them to be inclosed within two mountaines in the North parts, to the deepenesse of 12. cubits (which significth peraduenture 12. hundred yeeres) so that neither by witchcraft, nor by any meanes they could get out, or any might come vnto them, vntill the time of the Lord appointed, which are (saith he) the latter times: and then according to the prophecie of Ezechiel in the latter time of the consummation of the world, Gog and Magog out from the North, shal come forth into the land of Israel, & shal worke all this mischiefe against Christians, aboue recited. And then (saith Methodius proceeding in his Prophecies) shal the King of Romanes, after he hath reigned in Ierusalem a Sabbath of times, and a halfe, that is, saith Yet. x. yeeres and a halfe, take the crowne from his head, and yeeld it vp to the crosse in Golgotha where Christ was crucified, and shall die. And the Crosse with with the crowne shall be taken into heauen, which shal not appeare againe before the comming of the Lord.

By this reckoning it is like enough to the credite of Sybilla, that the reading of the Chaldaine in Hierusalem will not be many of Saint Barthelmewes yeares, and Constantinople yet stand a great while after the Antichrist.

Fourthly, it followeth then moreouer in the Prophecies of Methodius, which declareth, that when the weeke of Sabbath and halfe weeke of times shall end, & when the ix. of Romanes shall giue vp his crowne in Jerusalem, and die: Then immediatly shall Antichrist the sonne of perdition begin to appeare, and be borne in Iewry, of the tribe of Dan, whereof also came Iudas Iscariot, and he shall be borne (saith Methodius) in Chorosaim and shall be bred in Bethsaida, & shall raigne in Capernaum: to the which 3. cities, Christ the Lord gaue his 3. Væ. And when great tribulation shall increase and multiple in the dayes of this Antichrist, and all lordship and dominion shall be destroyed, the Lord shall send his two faithfull and deere seruants, Enoch and Hely, to reproue and detect the false seducing, and lying forgiues of this Antichrist, openly before all men: to that the people seeing themselues fully beguiled, and seduced by this Son of perdition, comming out of the temple dissemblingly, to the destruction of many, shall leaue and flie from him, and ioyne themselues to the said two holy Prophets. Which sonne of perdition and Antichrist seeing his proceedings so to be repressed, and brought into contempt, in his fury and anger shall kill the two Prophets of God. And then shall appeare (saith Methodius) the signe of the comming of the sonne of man, and he shall come in the clouds of heauenly glory, and shall destroy the enemie with the spirit of his mouth, &c.

The destruction of Anti-Christ.

The interpretation.

The comming of the Saracens.

The comming of the Turkes.

Turkes, but among the people of God, and of the tribe of Israell. Whereby is to be collected, that Antichrist shall not come of the Saracens, nor Turkes, but shall spring vp among the Christians, and (saith Methodius) shall seeme to come out of the Temple, to deceiue many, &c. Whereby the pope may seeme rather then the Saracen or the Turke, to bee described, for so much as the pope, being elected, nourished and raigning in the midst of Gods people, at Rome, sitteth in the temple, and very place of Christ: and (no doubt) deceiueth many, &c.

The time of Antichrist. Decretu Lom. bardus. Gratianus. Innocentius. 3.

And now to come to the time assigned of Methodius, here is to be added also, that which we read in Antoninus. Par. 3. that about this said present time, a certaine Bishop of Florence preached that Antichrist was then comming. But the Pope commanded him to keepe silence, and to speake no more therof. Now why the pope so did, and why he could not abide the preaching of Antichrist, I referre it to them, which list to muse more vpon the matter. This is certaine, that about this time here assigned by Methodius, came Petrus Lombardus, Gratianus, and pope Innocent the third, the first authors and patrons of transubstantiation. At which time also began the first persecution by the Church of Rome, against the Albingenses & Waldenses, about Tolous, Bittures, and Auinion. Of whom 17. M. the same time were slaine, by the popes crossed souldiers. Among whom frier Dominicke was then the chiefest & r. About which time also was Frier Frances, of which two came the two orders of begging Friers: all which began much about one time together. an. 1215. which were here, within 20. yeres after the kingdom of the Christians was taken of the Turkes, according to the prophecie afore said.

Transubstantiation. The first persecution by the church of Rome Dominicke. Frier Francis. Ex Antonino parte. 3. tit. 19. c. 5. The orders of Friers began.

It followeth moreouer in Methodius, That in his time all Lordship and dominion shall cease and giue ouer, &c. The verity wherof we see now accomplished in the pope. For where the pope with his double sword, and triple crowne doth come, there all secular power must giue place, both Emperours, kings, and princes must stoupe.

Childericke the French king had his crowne taken from him, and giuen to Pipine an. 747.

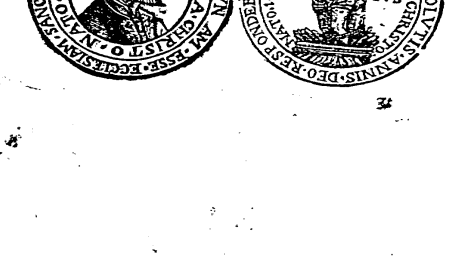
Fredericus Barbarossa Emperor, in S. Markes Church in Venice, was faine to lay downe his necke vnder the pope Alexanders feet. an. 1177. Which Fredericke also before, was faine to hold the stirrop to pope Adrian, &c.

What should I speake of the Ambassadour of Venice, named Franciscus Dandulus: who being sent to pope Clement the 5. was made to lie vnder the popes table like a dog, and gather vp the crums, mentioned in Sabel. Aenn. 9. li. 7.

Henrie the 3. being Emperor, had his diademe first set on with the feete of the pope, and afterward stroken off from his head with the popes foote againe.

And what shall I speake more hereof: when as Carolus Magnus submitted himselfe so lowe to kisse the feete of Pope Leo. An. 800.



Enoch and Hely.

It followeth then in the prophecie of Methodius: That in the tribulation of those dayes, shall be sent from God two speciall Prophets, Enoch and Hely, to reproue and disclose the fraudulent falsehood of Antichrist, and that manner of seeing his delusion, shall forsake him and follow them: Whereat Antichrist being grieued shall kill them, &c.

John Hus and Hierome of Prage. Vide in primo Tom. operum Iohan. Hus. De Anatomia. Hierome of Prage a prophet and Martyr.

We neuer read yet in any story, of any such two prophets to be sent either to the Saracens, or to the Turkes: Whereas against the pope, we read John Hus and Hierome of Prage two learned Martyrs and Prophets of God to haue beene sent, and to haue reproued and described the Anatomie of Antichrist, and at last to haue beene burned for their labour. And what Prophet can speake more plainly, either Enoch or Hely, then did Hierome of Prage, prophecying of the comming of Martin Luther, an hundred yeres after him: when the pope and his fellowes shall answere to God and to him. The time we see come with. Now let the pope see with his fellowes, what answere they can make.

The true plate of Hus and Hicrome, among the Bohemians.

The nearenesse of the Lords iudgement.

It followeth further in Methodius concluding his prophecie. And then (saith he) shall appeare the comming of the sonne of man in the cloudes of heauen, with celestiall glorie, &c.

Wherefore after the burning of these two notable Prophets, with many other the Lords burned also since their time by the Bishop of Rome, it is to be thought, that the comming of Christs iudgement in the cloudes, is not farre of. Veni cito Domine, Amen.

And thus much touching Methodius, of whose prophecies how much or how little is to be esteemed, I leaue it indifferent vnto the Reader. For me it shall suffice simply to haue recited his words, as I find them in his booke contained: noting this by the way, that of this booke of Methodius, De nouissimis temporibus, neither Hierome in his Catalogue, nor Suidas, nor yet Auentinus in the place where he inueacth purposely of such prophecies, maketh any mention. As touching Hildegardis and Brigit, and other whom the French call Sibylles for their songs and prophetical verses, sufficient hath beene alleadged before out of Auentinus: Who in his third booke of Chronicles, writing of the testimonies of Hildegard, Brigit, and Bardi, seemeth to ground vpon them, that the Turks, whether we will or not, shall haue their imperiall seat at Colen: And Ippap Colen by land, &c.

The prophecies of Hildegardis & Brigit of the Turkes.

Ex Auentino lib. 3. Annalium. A counsel to England.

Ex Brigitta, lib. 4. cap. 57.

Brigit peraduenture me to cut off many testimonies and reuelations of these aboue said, or else I could here rehearse the prophetical words of Brigit, lib. 4. cap. 57. concerning the city and Church of Rome, which as the saith, must be purged and scoured with three things: to wit, with sharpe sword, with fire, and with the plough, and that God will deale with that citie, as one that remoueth the stones out of one place vnto another: and finally that the Church of Rome shall susteine the sentence, as if a Iudge should command the skin to be slaine off, the blood to be drawen from the flesh, and the flesh to be cut in small peeces, and the bones thereof to be broken, so that all the marrow may be quised out from the same, &c. But for Brigitte I let Brigit passe, and some thing will declare out of Erythrea Sybilla, in her booke of prophecies found in S. Georges Church in Venice: Where the prophecying many things of the birth of Christ vnder Augustus, and of the birth of John Baptist, and of baptisme, of the Apostles, of the conuersion of the Gentiles, and of Constantinus, &c. hath these words: After that the peaceable bull shall conclude all the clinses of the world vnder tribute, in those dayes a heauenly lambe shall come: and the dayes shall come, when the power of the flowing streame shall bee magnified in water, and the Lyon the Monarch shall bee conuerted to the lambe, which shall shine to all men, and subuert kinglesnes.

Prophecies of Brigit, against Rome.

The Prophecies of Sybilla Sybilla named Erythrea.

Ex Erithrea Sybillasuo Vaticinio ad imperatorem Constantinum scripto.

Moreuer saith Sybilla, In the latter age Gods shall bee humbled, and the diuine ofspring shall be abased, and Deitie shall bee ioyned with humanitie, the lambe shall lie in hay, and God and man shall bee bred vp vnder a maidens attendance, signes and wonders shall goe before amongst the circumcised, &c. Also, an aged woman shall conceiue a child hauing knowledge of things to come. The world shall maruell at Boetes (the star) which shall be a leader to his birth. Behauing 32. feete and 6. thumbes shall chuse him selfe out of fifteen and abicets, the number of 15. and one diuell, not with sword nor with battell, &c. afterward this followeth moreouer in Sybilla, saying: The health of the lambe lying shall bee clothed with a few speiles of the Lyon. Blacke shall be turned into red. He shall subdue the citie of Aeneas, and kings, but in the booke of the fisher, In deiection and pouerty he shall conquere riches and shall tread downe pride with his owne death. In the night he shall rise vp, and be changed, he shall liue and raigne, and all these things shall be consummated, and regeneration (or new things) be made: at last he shall iudge both good and euill, &c. And thus much briefly collected out of Sybilla Erythrea concerning Christ our Lord.

Prophecies of Sybilla of Christ.

By his feete is supposed to be meant the greatest yeeres of his age.

The lambe lying, &c. that is, the church with out trauell shall be maintained with some liuing or possessions of the chiefe sisters.

Moreouer, touching the state and course of the Church and of Antichrist, it followeth in the saide Sybilla, saying: Then shall foure winged beasts rise vp in testimonie, they shall sound out with trumpets the name of the lambe, sowing righteousnesse, and the law irreprehensible. Against which law, the beast shall gainstand, and the abhomination and froth of the Dragon. But a marueilous star shall rise, hauing the image of the foure beasts, and shall be in a marueilous multitude, he shall bring light to the Greekes, and shall illustrate the world. The lake of the fisher shall bring the name of the lambe with power, into the citie of Aeneas, vnto the end of the world (or time.) Then in the citie of Aeneas, the starre ioyned, shall loose such as were bound of the deuill, and thereof he shall reioyce and glory, and glorious shall be his end, &c.

By these foure beasts is meant the 4. Monarchies of the world, that is the multitude of all the kingdomes of the Gentiles as in the Apocal.

By the citie of Aeneas is meant Rome.

The prophecies of Sybilla, of Antichrist.

The 663. feete doe meane the yeeres of his raigne.

Then two starres like to the first starre, shall arise against the beast, and shall not preuaile, till the abhomination shall be come, and the will of the Lord shall be consummate. And against speaking of the same matter, he inferreth these words of the foresaid two starres aboue mentioned. And toward the latter dayes, two bright starres shall arise, rayshing vp men lying dead in their sins, being like to the first starre, hauing the face of the foure beasts which shall resist the beast, and the waters of the dragon, testifying (or preaching) the name and lawe of the lambe, the destruction of abhomination and iudgement, and shall diminish his waters, but they shal be weakened in the bread of affliction, and they shall rise againe in stronger force, &c.

These two starres seeme to meane John Hus, and Hierome, who being put to death by the Pope, there succeeded after them many stronger then before.

And it followeth moreouer. After the abhomination, then shall truth be reuealed, and the lambe shall be known, to whom regions and countries shall submit their necks, and all earthly men shall agree together in one, to come into one fold, and to be ruled vnder one discipline, and after this shall be but a small time, &c.

And shortly after, the said Sybilla speaking of the latter iudgement to come, declareth how all the abhominations of sinnes shall come before the lambe: and that terrible fire shall fall from heauen, which shall consume all earthly things created vnto the top of heauen, &c.

And thus much out of Sybilla, touching her prophecies of Christ and Antichrist, according as I found them alleadged of a certaine Catholicke Romish writer, in his booke intituled Onus Ecclesiæ, excerpted, as he saith, out of the library of Saint George in the citie of Venice.

Ex libro christianorum. cap. 8.

Philip Melanchton in his preface vpon Bartholomæus Georgienitz Peregrinus, writing of the Origine and manners of the Turkes, alleadged a certaine prophecie of Vitterus, mentioned hereafter, which foresaid, that the Turkes should beare rule in Italy and in Germany. an. 1600.

Now it remaineth in conclusion of these prophesies of the Turkes, some thing to say of the Turks owne prophecies, concerning the enduring & ending of their owne kingdome, whose prophetical prognostication, being taken out of their owne language, and their owne bookes, I thought here to insert, as I find it alleadged in the booke of the foresaid Bartholomæus Georginitz, as followeth.

The same in English.

OUr Emperor shall come: he shall get the kingdome of the Gentiles prince: also he shall take the red apple and shall bring it vnder his subiection: and if the sword of the Christians shall not rise vnto the vij. yere, he shall haue dominion ouer them vnto the xij. yere. Hee shall build houses, plant vineyards, shall hedge about his orchards, shall procreate children: and after the xij. yere shall appeare the sword of the Christians, which shall put the Turke to flight euery where.

The expedition of the Turkes prophecie.

They which make declaration of this Turkish prophecy do expound this xij. yere to signifie the xij. yere after the winning of Constantinople: which Constantinople, say they, is meant by the red apple: and after that xij. yere, say they, shall rise the sword of the Christians, &c. and this prophecie being written and translated out of the Persian tongue, with this exposition vpon the same, it is to be found in the booke of Bartholomeus Georginitz. Albeit, concerning the exposition thereof, it seemeth not to be true which is there spoken of the xij. yere, after the winning of Constantinople, being now 100. yeres since the winning thereof.

Ex Bartholo. Georginitz.

Wherefore it may rather seeme probable, that by the vij. and xij. yere of the Turkes, this to be the meaning, that if the vij. of the Ottoman Turkes do raige the sword of the Christians, they shall continue, build and plant, &c. vntill the xij. Turke, (this to this Solymannus, and then after that shall rise the Christians sword, which shall put them to flight, and vanquish them in all quarters. And this exposition may seeme to accord with the place of Genesis, Wherein is written of Ismaell, that he had xij. sonnes, and no mo: So that this Solymannus being the xij. Turke after Ottomannus, may (by the grace of Christ) be the last, whom we heard credibly to be reported at the printing hereof, to be dead. But howsoeuer this prophecie is to be taken, it appeareth by their owne Oracles, that at length they shall be ouercome by the Christians.

Christian souldiers, first got the city of Nicea against the Sultane of the Turkes: then Lycaonia, Cilicia, Syria, afterward Mesopotamia, and Comagena, then Antiochia. An.1098. and the next yere recouered Jerusalem, being then in the handes of the Saracens, which they a little before had wan from the Turkes, as is aforesaid. That done, he subdued Hierusalem, which had been in the hands of the Christians before, the space of — 88, yeers Transl. Translation.

An.1189. Frederick emperor, Philip French king, Richard king of England, made their voiage into Asia, where Fredericke washing in a riuer at Cilicia, died. In this voiage at the siege of Accon, Saladinus wan the field of our men, of whom 2000. were slaine in the chase. Accon at length was got of the Christians. King Richard got Cyprus. The two kings fell at strife. Philip retired home without any good doing. King Richard laid siege to Jerusalem, but in vaine, and so returning homeward, was taken neere to Vienna in Austria, after he had taken truce before with the Soldane, vpon such condition as pleased him. And this god speed had the popes, sending out against the Turks.

An.1215. There was another councell holden at Rome by pope Innocent ỳ 3. where was enacted a new article of our faith for transubstantiation of bread and wine, to bee turned into the body and bloud of our Sauior. In this councell also great excitation was made by the pope, and great preparation was through all Christendom, for set forward for recouery of the holy land. A mighty army was collected of bishops, lords, knights, bishops and prelats, that if Gods blessing had gone with them, they might haue gone throughout all Asia and India.

Vide supra pag. 685.

An.1219. The Christians after 18. moneths siege, got a certaine towne in Egypt, called Damiata or Elipolis, with much adoe, but not much to the purpose. For afterward as the Christian army of the popes sending, went about to besiege the citie Cairus or Babylon, the Sultane through his subtill traine is intrapped and inclosed them within the danger of Nilus, that they were constrained to render again the citie of Damiata, with their prisoners and all the furniture therof as they found it, into the Soudanes hand, and glad so with their liues to passe forward to Tyrus. An.1221.

In the meane time the Egyptian Turke caused the citie of Jerusalem to be raced, that it should serue to no vse to the Christians. What great thing else was done in that voiage, it doth not greatly appeare in stories. Albeit Fredericus the 2. emperour was not vnfruitfully there occupied, and much more might haue done, had it not been for the violence and persecution of the bish. of Rome against him: whereby he was enforced to take truce with the Sultan for 10. yeres, and so returned. After which things done, not many yeres after, at length the last citie of all belonging to the Christians, which was Ptolomais or Akers, was also taken from them by the Sultane, so that now the Christians had not one foot left in all Asia. — 88. yeers

Vide supra, pag. 278.

An.1230. Thus the Christians being driuen out of Asia by the Sultanes and Turkes, yet the said Turkes and Sultans did not long enioy their victorie: For ecclesiones the Lord stirred vp against them the Tartarians, who breaking into Asia by the ports of Caspius subdued diuers parts of Asia, namely, about Comana, Colchis, Iberia, Albania, &c. These Tartarians as they had got many captiues in their warres: so for gaine vsed to shippe them ouer customable to Alexandria in Egypt to bee sold: which seruants and captiues Melechsala the great Sultane was glad to buy to serue him in his warres. Which captiues and seruants after they had continued a certaine space in Egypt, and through their — 80 yeers valiant seruice grew in fauor and estimation with the said Melechsala, who began more to increase in number and dignitie: at length they slue him, and took to themselues the name and kingdome of the Sultane. And thus ceased the storie of Saracon and Saladinus afore mentioned, which continued in Egypt, about the space as is said of. — 100. yeers

Saladinus storie in Egypt ceaseth.

An.1240. After the death of Melechsala, the army of these foresaid rascals and captiues, set vp to themselues a king of their owne company, whom they called Turquemenius. Who to fill vp the number of their company that it should not diminish, deuised this order, to get or to buy christian mens children, taken young from their parents, and the mothers lap: whom they sold so to bring vp to make them to deny Christ and to bee circumcised, and instructed in Mahumets law, and afterward to bee trained in the feats of war, and these were called Mamaluchi. Among whom this was their order, that none might bee aduanced to bee king, but out of their owne number, or else chosen by them: neither that any should bee made knights or horsemen, but onely the children of christians which should denie Christ before, called Mamaluchi. Also it was among them prouided, that to this dignitie neither Sarcens nor Iewes, should bee admitted. Item, that the succession thereof should not descend to the children and offspring of these Mamaluchi. Also that the succession of the crowne should not descend to the Children of the foresaid Sultanes, but should goe by voice and election. The Tartarians with Turquemenius their king, about this time obtained Turquia, that is, Asia minor, from the Turks, and within 2. yeres after, prenailing against the Turks, expelled them from their kingdome, and so gouerned these Mamaluchi raigning ouer Egypt, and a great part of Asia, till the time of Tomumbeius their last king, which was destroyed and hanged at the gates of Memphis, by Selymus the Turke, father to this Solymannus, as in his historie is declared, pag. 685. These Mamaluchi continued the space of: — 260. yeers

Mamaluchi in Egypt.

Vide supra pag. 685.

An.1245. These Tartarians ranging through the countries of the Georgians, and al Armenia, came as far as Iconium, which was then the imperiall citie of the Turkes.

An.1289. The Soldane of Egypt and Babylon got from the Christians Tripolis, Tyrus, Sidon, and Berithus in Syria.

An.1291. Lastly, Ptolomais, which also is called Akers, was surprised by the said Soldan, raced and cast downe to the ground, and all the Christians therein (which were not many left) were slaine. And this was the last citie which the Christians had in Asia. So that now the Christians haue not one foot (as is said before) left in all Asia. Thus the Egyptian Soldanes, and the Tartarians raigned and ranged ouer the most part of Asia aboue the Turkes, till the raigne of Ottomannus the great Turk, about the space of — 80. yeers

And thus haue yee the whole discourse of the Turkish storie, with their names, countries, kinges, dominions also with their times, continuance, interruptions and alterations, in order described, and in peces ballanced. Which otherwise in most authours and writers bee so confused, that it is hard to vnderstand distinctly, what difference is betweene the Saracens, Turkes Tartarians, the Sultans or Soldans, & Mamaluches, or Famisarites: what is their Caliph a, their Seraphes, their Sultan, or Balla, in what times they began, and how long, and in what order of yeeres they raigned. All which in this present table manifestly to thine eie may appeare.

¶ Wherein if thou hast no couer gratle reader to consider, which is worthy the noting, how the bishop of Rome all this season, from the first beginning of the Turkes raigne, hath not ceased from time to time continually, calling vpon Christian princes and subiects, to take the crosse, and to bee assaunt the Turkes: whereupon so many great voiages haue been made to the holie land, and so many battels fought against the Turke and Soldan for winning the holy crosse: and yet no luckie successe hath followed thereof hitherto, nor euer come it prosper, nathe forward, what soeuer through the exciting of that bishop, ha, been attempted against that great enemie of the Lord: Inso much that the Christians haue lost not onelie all that they had in Asia, but also vnneath are able to defend that little they haue in Europe, against his violence. What the cause is of this hard lucke of the bishops voiages, it is hard for man to define. Let men muse as their mindle deth, and as the Gospell saith, bee that hath eies to see let him see. This is certaine, that as there hath lacked no care nor diligence in the bishop of Rome, to stir men vp to that business: so on the princes behalfe there hath lacked no courage nor strength of men, no contribution of expenses, no supportation of charges, no furniture or abillement of warres: onely the blessing of God seemeth to haue lacked. The reason and cause wherof I would it were so easie to be reformed, as it may bee quickly confuted.

For what man beholding the life of vs Christians, will greatly marueil, why the Lord goeth not with our armye to fight against the Turkes? And if my verdit might here haue place, for mee to adde my censure, there appeareth to mee another cause in this matter, yet greater then this aforesaid: which to make plaine and euident in full discourse of words, leisure now both not permit. Briefly to touch what I conceiue, my opinion is this: that if the sincere doctrine of Christian faith deliuered and left vnto vs in the word of God, had not been so corrupted in the Church of Rome, or if the bishop of Rome would yet reclame his impure idolatry, & prophanations, and admit Christ the Lambe of God to stand alone, without our impure additions, to be our onely Iustification, according to the free promise of Gods grace: I nothing doubt but the power of his faith grounding only vpon Christ the sonne of God, had both framed our liues into a better disposition, and also done would or yet will bring downe the pride of that pseudo hyperlenes. But otherwise, if the B. of Rome will not gentlie giue place to the milde voice of Gods word, I thinke not contrary, but he shalbe compelled at last to giue place & roome to the Turk, whether he will or not. And yet notwithstanding, when both the Turke and the pope shall do against it what they can, the truth and grace of Gods testament shall triumphe and increase by such meanes as the Lord shall worke, which beginneth already (praise to the Lord) to come gratiously and luckily forward in most places.

God offereth with Pharao, and blesseth the Christians.

A prayer against the Turkes.

A praier against the Turkes.

O Eternall Lord God, Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, Creator and disposer of all things, iust, gratious, and wise only, in the name and reuerence of thy Sonne Iesus, we prostrate our selues, desiring thine omnipotent Maiestie, to looke downe vpon these afflicted times of thy poore creatures and seruants: relieue thy church, increase our faith, and confound our enemies: and as thou hast giuen thine onely begotten Sonne vnto vs, promising with him life to all that shall beleeue vpon his name: so incline the obedience of our faith to thy promises in him, that our hearts may bee farre off from all other sinfull additions and prophane inuentions, which are besides him, and not in him, grounded vpon thy will and promise. And grant (we beseech thee) to thy church, more and more to see how terrible a thing it is, to set vp any other meanes or helpe of saluation, but onely in him whom thou onely hast sent and sealed. Reforme thy church with perfect doctrine and faithfull teachers, that wee seeing our owne weaknesse, may put off our selues, and put on him without whom wee can doe nothing. So shall wee stand strong, when nothing standeth in vs, but thy Sonne alone, in whom thou art only pleased. Renue in this thy church againe the decayed faith of thy Sonne Iesus, which may plentifullie bring forth in vs, not leaues onely, but fruits of christian life: And forgiue our wretched Idolatrie and blind phantasies past, wherewith wee haue prouoked manifold waies thy displeased indignation against vs: For our hearts haue bin full of Idols, our temples full of Images, our waies full of hypocrisie: thy Sacraments prophened, and thy religion turned to superstition; because the lanterne of thy word went not before vs, therefore wee haue stumbled. Miserably wee haue walked hitherto, like sonnes not of Sara, but of Agar, and therefore these Turkish Agarens haue risen vp against vs. Many hard and strait waies wee haue passed, but the waies of the Lord we haue not found. Much cost we haue bestowed on bread that swageth no hunger, but that bread which only feedeth and commeth freely, we haue not tasted. We haue sailed far and neere in barkes of our owne building, but haue not kept within the Arke onely of thy promise, and therefore these floods haue taken vs. We haue praied much, but not in thine appointed temple, and therefore haue not bin heard. We haue plowed and tilled, but without thy heifer, and therefore this vntidy ground of ours, bringeth forth so many weeds. We do fish apace and that al night, but because we fish not on the right side of the boate, in our fishing we catch neuer a fin. Our buildings be full of good intentions & great deuises, but because the ground worke is not surely laid vpon the rocke of thy promise, the East wind riseth and shaketh them all to pieces, but because the ground worke is not surely laid vpon the rocke of thy promise, the East wind riseth and shaketh them all motions and bones of the body be shaken out of place. Wherefore we beseech thee (O Lord) put to thy holy hand, and set them in the right ioynt again. And finally, reduce this same thy misticall body againe, to his perfect and naturall head, which is thine only sonne Iesu Christ, and none other. For him onely hast thou anointed and appointed. Neither is there any other head, that can minister strength and nutriment to this body, but he alone: forasmuch as all other heads be sinfull, and are not able to stand in thy sight, but make this body rather worse then better. Only this thy welbeloued and perfect sonne is he, in whom onely dwelleth all our strength and fulnesse: him onely we confesse and know ledge. For whom and with whom, we beseech thee (O Lord God of hosts) grant to thy church strength and victory against the malicious fury of these Turkes, Saracens, Tartarians, against Gog and Magog, and all the malignant rabble of Antichrist, enemies to thy sonne Iesus our Lord and Saviour. Prevent their deuices, ouerthrow their power, and dissolue their kingdome, that the kingdom of thy sonne so long oppressed, may recoue and flourish ouer all: and that they which wretchedly be fallen from thee, may happily be reduced againe into the fold of thy saluation, through Iesus Christ our onely mediatour and most mercifull aduocate. Amen.

§ Anno § 1500

IN this long digression, wherein sufficiently hath beene described the grieuous and tedious perfecution of the Saracens and Turkes against the Christians, thou hast to vnderstand (good reader) & beholde the Image of a terrible Antichrist euidently appearing both by his owne doings, and also by the scriptures, prophecied and declared to vs before. Now in comparing the Turke with the pope, if a question be asked, whether of them is the truer or greater Antichrist, it were easie to see and iudge, that the Turke is the more open and manifest enemy against Christ and his church. But if it be asked whether of them two hath bin the more bloody and pernitious aduersary to Christ and his members: or whether of them hath consumed and spilt more Christian bloud, be with sword, or this with fire and sword together, neither is it a light matter to discern, neither is it my part here to discusse, which doe onely write the history, and the Acts of them both. Wherefore after the story of the Turkes thus finished, now to reenter againe there where as we left, in describing the domesticall troubles and persecutions here at home vnder the Bishop of Rome: after the burning of Babram in Norfolke aboue declared. pag. 671. I signified also of another certaine aged man, mentioned in an old written Chronicle borrowed of one in the tower, intituled Polychron, (although I find not his name in the said chronicle expressed) which suffered the paines of burning in Smithfield, about the same time, which was the yere of our Lord, 1500. Ex Polychron.

This aged father, I suppose, be he of whom I find mention made in certaine old papers and records of William Carp citizen (albeit the day of the month both a little differ) wherein is thus testified, that on the 20. day of July, an. 1500. vpon the day of S. Margaret, there was an old man burned in Smithfield for an heretike, & the same person vpon the 20. day before he was burned, would haue stollen out of ye Lollards tower, & so falling out of the tower, wo fully hurt himself: wherupon he was caried in a cart to his death, as he went to his burning.

In the foresaid papers of ancient record, is furthermore declared, how in the yere aboue prefixed, which was an. 1499. in the time of one Perkenel, many were taken for heretikes in Kent, and at Paules crosse they bare fagots and were abiured, and shortly after the same yere, there went thirteene Lollards afore the procession in Paules, and there were of them eight women and a yong lad, and the lads mother was one of the eight, and all the 13. bare fagots on their necks afore the procession.

William Tilsworth martyr.

FOr so much as the world is come now to such a monastike and peruish insensibilitie in their contentious and cauilling daies of ours, that nothing can be so circumspectly written and ordred, but that ill we in danger of one sycophant or another, which neuer will credit there, where they list not to like: neither will they euer like that, which seeme th preiudicall to their faction, or not to serue the humor wherewith their fantasies be infected: therefore to stop the mouths of such carping cauillers with as much possibilitie as I may, be it knowne to all and singuler such persons, who by euidence of truth and witnes will be satisfied, that in the towne of Amersham be yet aliue both men and women, which can and do beare witnes of this that I shall declare. Also there is of the said company, one named William Page, an aged father and yet aliue, witnes to the same. Also another named Agnes Wetherley widow, being about the age of an hundred yeres, yet liuing and witnes hereof: that in the daies of king Henrie the fourth, anno 1506. in the diocelle of Lincolne in Buckingham shire (William Smith being bishop of the same diocelle) one William Tylsworth was burned in Amersham, in a close called Standley about fiue yeeres ago. At which time one Ioane Clerke, being a married woman, which was the only daughter of the said William Tylsworth and a faithfull woman, was compelled with her olde bones to set fire to her deare father: and at the same time her husband John Clerke did penance at her fathers burning, and bare a fa gget, as did also

| Robert Bartler. | John Mumbe and his wife. |
| Richard Bartler. | Richard Bennet. |
| John Bartler. | Rog. Bennet. Iohn Fip. |
| Tho. Harding & his wife. | William Grinder. |

| Richard Harding. | Yomand Dorman. |

All these bare fagots, and afterward were compelled to weare certaine badges, and went about to certaine townes to doe penance, as to Buckingham, Aylesbury, and other townes moe: And also diuers of these men were afterward burned in the cheeke, as William Page, which at this present is aliue, and likewise did beare a fagot with the aforesaid. Furthermore the foresaid Agnes Wetherley testifieth, that at the burning of this William Tylsworth, there he, and about that were put to beare fagots for their penance, of whom diuers were inioyned to beare and weare fagots at Lincolne the space of 7. yeeres, some at one time, some at another, &c. In which number was also one Robert Bartlet a rich man, who for his profession sake was put out of his farme and goods, and was condemned to be kept in the monastery of Alnygge, where he ware on his right sleeue a square peece of cloth, the space of 7. yeeres together.

The burning of Thomas Bernard, and James Mordon.

Tho. Bernard, James Mordon martyrs.

It followeth moreouer in the testimony of the forenamed, that about the same time of the burning of William Tylsworth (as the Amersham men do say) or the next day after, as record eth the foresaid Agnes) was one father Roberts burned at Buckingham. He was a miller, and dwelled at Dissenden: and at his burning there were aboue 20. persons that were compelled to beare fagots, and to doe such penance as the wicked Pharises did compell them. After that by the space of 2. or 3. yeeres, was burned at Amersham, Thomas Bernard a husband man, and Iames Mordon, a labourer, they two were burned both at one fire, and there was William Litlepage (who is yet aliue) compelled to be burned in the right cheeke, and father Rogers, and father Reuer, alias Reiue, which after was burned. This father Rogers was in the Bishops prison 14. twelues together, night and day, where he was so cruelly handled with cold, hunger, and paines, that after his comming out of the said prison, he was so lame in his backe that he could neuer go vpright as long as he liued, as can testifie diuers honest men that be now liuing. Also there were 30. mo burned in the right cheeke, and bare fagots the same time. The cause was that they would talke against superstition and idolatry, and were desirous to heare and reade the holy scriptures. The manner of their burning in the cheeke was this: their neckes were tied fast to a post or stay, with towels, and their hands holden that they might not sturre, and so the yron being hot, was put to their cheekes, and thus bare they the points and marks of the Lord Iesus about them.

¶ The cruell handling of Thomas Chase of Amersham, wickedly strangled and martyred in the bishops prison at Woburne, vnder W. Smith bishop of Lincolne.

§ Anno § 1506 § Thomas Chase martyr.

AMang these aforesaid, which were so cruelly persecuted for the Gospell and word of Christ, one Thomas Chase of Amersham, was one of them that was thus cruelly handled. Which Thomas Chase by the report of such as did know him, was a man of a godly, sober and honest behauior (whose vertuous doings do yet remaine in memory) and could not abide idolatrie and superstition, but many times would speake against it: Wherefore the vngodly and wicked did the more hate and dispite him, and tooke him, and brought him before the blind bishop, being at that time at Wooburne in the countie of Buckingham, and as it is written Acts 12. that wicked Herode did here certaine of the congregation, and slue Iames the brother of Iohn with the sword, and because hee saw that it pleased the Iewes, &c. he proceeded further, and had this same Thomas Chase before him, asking him many questions touching the Romish religion, with many taunts, checkes, and rebukes, but what answere this godly man Thomas Chase made them, it is vnknowne. Howbeit it is to bee supposed, that his answere was most zealous and godly in professing Gods true religion and Gospell, and to the extirpation of idolatrie and superstition and hypocrisie, for that the said Thomas Chase was commanded to be put in the bishops prison called little ease, in the bishops house at Woobarne, which prison had not beene inhabited vnto him, had not his answeres beene found and bright. There Thomas Chase lay bound most painefully with chaines, gyues, and manicles and irons, oft times sore pined with hunger, where the bishops elues was daily brought vnto him by his chaplaines: Which elues was nothing else but checkes, taunts, rebukes and threatnings, flouting and mockings. All which cruelty the godly martyr tooke most quietly and patiently, remembring and hauing respect to Christs promises. Matth. 5. Blessed are they which suffer perfecution for righteousnesse sake: for theirs is the kingdome of heauen, and as followeth 1 Blessed are ye when men reuile you and persecute you, &c. When the bishop with his bond of thauelings, perceiued that by their daily practises of cruelty they could not preuaile against him, but rather that he was the more feruent and earnest in professing Christs true religion: and that he did vtterly and vtterly most patiently all their wicked vnciuile and cruelsie minister vnto him, they imagined how and which way they might put him to death, left there should be a tumult or an vproze among the people. And as Richard Hun shortly after was hanged or strangled in Lollards tower, about the yere of our Lord 1514. euen so these bloud-suckers most cruelly strangled and slew to death this said Thomas Chase in prison, which most heartily called vpon God to receiue his spirit: as witnesseth a certaine woman, that kept him in prison.

The perfect patience and constance of Thom. Chase.

Thomas Chase cruelly murthered in the bishops prison.

After that these stinging vipers being of the wicked band of Antichrist, had thus most cruelly and impiously murthered this faithfull Christian, they were at their wits end, and could not tell what shift to make, to cloke their shamefull murther withall, at last to blind the ignorant silly people, these bloodie butchers most slanderously caused by their ministers to be bruted abroad, that the foresaid Thomas Chase had hanged himselfe in prison: which was a most shamefull and abominable lie, for the prison was such, that a man could not stand vpright, nor lie at ease, but stooping, as they do report that did know it. And besides that, this man had so many manicles and irons vpon him, that he could not well moue neither hand nor foot, as the woman did declare that fed him dead, in so much that they confessed that his bloud bulke was broken by reason they had so bitely beaten him and bruised him: And yet these holy catholikes had not made an end of their wicked act in this both killing and slandering of this godly martyr, but to put out the remembrance of him, they caused him to be buried in the wood called Hoxland wood, in the high way betwixt Woburne and little Marlow, to the intent he should not be taken vp a gaine to the light: And thus commonly are innocent men laid by the false clerkly clergie men. But he that is effectually true of himselfe, hath promised at one time or at another, to cleare his true seruants, not with lies and fables, but by his owne true word. No secret, saith he, is so close, but once shall be opened, neither is any thing so hid, that shall not at the last be knowne clearely. Such a sweet Lord is God alwaies to those that are his true seruants. Blessed be his holy name therefore, for euer and euer, Amen.

Thomas Chase hanged himselfe in prison.

Witnesse to the story.

God bringeth to light the secret murthers of the papists. March. 10. Luke 12.

Thomas Harding being one of this companie, thus molested and troubled as is aforesaid, in the towne of Amersham for the truth of the Gospell, after his abiuration and penance done, was againe sought for, and brought to the fire, in the dates of king Henrie the eight, and vnder doctor Langlond then bishop of Lincolne, succeeding after cardinall Wolsey. Of whose death and martyrdome, we shall likewise record (Christ willing and granting) in order when we shall come to thetime and yeere of his suffering.

After the martyrdom of these two, I read also of one Thomas Hosier, who likewise for the same cause, that is, for the profession of Christs Gospell, was condemned by the bishop, and burnt at Norwich, the last day of March. an. 1507.

Thomas Hosier martyr. § Anno § 1507

In the next yere following, which was an. 1508. in the consistorie of London, was conuented Elizabeth Sampson, of the parish of Aldermanbury, vpon certaine articles, and specially for speaking against pilgrimage and adoration of Images, as the Image of our Lady at Willdon, at Stanings at Croine, at Walsingham, and the image of saint Saviour, of Barmondsey, and against the Sacrament of the altar, and so that they had spoken these or like words: that our Lady of Willdon was but a burnt arse elfe, and a burnt arse stocke, and if shee might haue holpen men and women which go to her on pilgrimage, she would not haue suffered her taile to haue been burnt: and what should folke worship our Lady of Willdone, or our Ladie of Croine, for she one is but a burnt arse stocke, and the other is but a puppit: and better it were for the people to giue their almes at home to poore people, then to goe on pilgrimage. Also she called the image of S. Saviour, Sim Saviour with kit lips, and that she said she could make as good bread, as that which the priest occupied, and that it was not the bodie of Christ but bread, for that Christ could not be both in heauen and in earth at one time. For these and certaine other articles, she was compelled to abiure, before master William Horsley, chancellor, the day and yere aboue written. Ex Regist. Lond.

¶ Laurence Ghest.

LAmentable it is to remember, and a thing almost infinit to comprehend the names, times, and persons of all them which haue been slaine by the rigour of the popes clergie, for the true maintaining of Christs cause, and of his Sacraments. Whose memorie being registred in the booke of life, albeit, it need not the commendation of our stories, yet for the more confirmation of the Church, I thought it not vnprofitable the suffering and martyrdome of them to be notified, which innocently haue giuen their bloud to be shed in Christs quarrell.

Laurence Ghest martyr.

In the Catalogue of whom next in order commeth the memoriall of Laurence Ghest, who was burned in Salisbury for the matter of the sacrament, in the daies of king Henry the 7. he was of a comely and tall personage, and otherwise (as appeareth) not vnfriended, for the which the bishop and the close were the more loth to burne him: but kept him in prison the space of two yeeres. This Laurence had a wife and children. Wherefore they thinking to expugne and peruade his mind by sparing of his fatherly affection toward his children, when the time came which they appointed for his burning, as he was at the stake, they brought before him his wife and his foresaid children. At the sight whereof, although nature is commonly wont to worke in other, yet in him religion ouercomming nature, made his constancie to remaine vnmouueable, in such sort, as when his wife began to crie out and desire him to saue himselfe, he against desired her to be content, and not to be a blocke to his way, for he was in a good course, running toward the mark of his saluation: and so fire being put to him, he finished his life, renouncing not only wife and children, but also himselfe to follow Christ. As he was in burning, one of the bishops men threw a fire brand at his face: Which at the sight of Laurence standing by, ranne at him with his dagger, and would haue slaine him, had he not beene otherwise staid.

Laurence Ghest was put by torment his wife and children.

Laurence died a Martyr.

Confirmed and witnessed by the credible report of one William Russell, an aged man dwelling of late in Colmanstreete, who was there present the same time at the burning of Laurence, and was also himselfe burned in the cheeke, and one of the persecuted flocke in those daies, whose daughter is yet liuing: the same is confirmed also with the testimony of one Richard Web seruant sometime to Sr. Latymer, who seiourning in the house of the said William Russell, heard him many times declare the same.

A faithfull woman burned.

BEsides amongst all the examples of them, wherof so many haue suffered from time to time for Christ and his truth, I can not tell if euer were any martyrdome more notable and admirable wherein the plaine demonstration of Gods mighty power and iudgement hath at any time bin more euident against the persecutors of his flocke, then at the burning of a certaine godly woman, put to death in Cheaping sabery, about the same time, vnder the raigne of K. Henry the seuenth.

A notable story of a faithfull woman burned in Cheaping sabery.

The constancie of which blessed woman, as it is glorious for all true godly Christians to behold: so against the example of the bishops Chauncellour, which cruelly condemned the innocent, may offer a terrible spectacle to the eies of all papisticall persecutors to consider, and to take example: which the liuing God grant they may. Amen. The name of the towne where she was martyred, was, as is said, Cheaping sabbery. The name of the woman is not as yet come to my knowledge. The name of the Chancellor, who condemned her, was called D. Whittington. The time of her burning was in the raigne and time of K. Henry the 7. orderly therefore in this place and time to be inserted. Wherein is to be noted moreouer the opportunitie tunity of this present history brought to my hands, and that in such conuenient season, as I was drawing toward the end of the foresaid kings reigne: so that it may appeare to them, which behold & opportunity of things, not to be without Gods holy will and prouidence, that this foresaid example should not lie hid and vnremembred, but should come to light and knowledge, and that in such order of placing, according as the due course of our story hitherto kept, requireth.

After this godly woman and manly martyr of Christ was condemned by the wretched chancellour about named D. Whittington, for the faithfull profession of the truth, which the papists then called heresie, and the time now come when she should be brought to the place and paines of her martyrdome, a great concourse of all the multitude both in the towne and countrie about (as the maner is in such times) was gathered to behold her end. Among whom was also the foresaid Doctor Whittington the chancellor, there present to see the execution done. Thus this faithfull woman, and true seruant of God constantly persisting in the testimony of the truth, committing her cause to the Lord, gaue ouer her life to the fire, refusing no paines nor torments to keepe her conscience clere and vnreprouable in the day of the Lord. The sacrifice being ended, the people began to returne homeward, comming from the burning of this blessed martyr. It happened in the meane time, that as the catholike executioners were busie in slaying this silly lambe at the townes side, a certaine Butcher within the towne was as busie in slaying of a bull, which bull he had fast bound in ropes, ready to knocke him on the head. But the Butcher (belike not so skilfull in his art of killing beasts, as the papists be in murthering Christians) as hee was lifting his axe to strike the bull, failed in his stroke, and smit a little too low, or else how hee smit, I know not: this was certaine, that the bull, although somewhat grieued at the stroke, but yet not stricken downe, put his strength to the ropes, and brake loose from the butcher into the streete, the very same time as the people were comming in great preasse from the burning. Who seeing the bull comming towards them, and supposing him to bee wild (as was no other like) gaue way for the beast, euery man shifting for himselfe, as well as he might. Thus the people giuing backe, and making a lane for the bull, he passed thorough the throng of them, touching neither man nor child, till hee came where as the chancellour was. Against whom the bull, as pricked with a sudden bounteine, ranne full butte with his hornes, and taking him vpon the paunch, gored him thorow and thorow, and so killed him immediatly, carying his guts, and trailing them with his hornes all the street ouer, to the great admiration and wonder of all them that saw it.

Although the carnall sense of man be blind in considering the workes of the Lord, imputing many times to blind chance the things which properly pertaine to Gods only praise and prouidence: yet in this so strange and so euident example, that man can be so dull or ignorant, which seeth not herein a plaine miracle of Gods mightie power and iudgement both in the punishing of this wretched chancellor, and also in admonishing all other like persecutors, by his example, to feare the Lord, and to abstaine from the like cruelties?

Now for the credit of this story, lest I be said vpon mine owne head to commit to storie things rashly, which I cannot iustifie, therefore to stop such cauilling mouthes, I will discharge my selfe with authorities I trust sufficient: that is, with the witnesse of him which both was a papist, and also present at the same time at the burning of the woman, whose name was Rowland Webbe: which Rowland dwelling then in Chippingsadbery, had a son named Richard Webbe, seruant sometime to master Latimer, who also inducing with him in time of his trouble sir peeres together, was himselfe imprisoned and persecuted for the same cause. Vnto the which Richard Webbe, being now aged, then yong, the foresaid Rowland his father, to the intent to exhort him from the sect of heresie (as he then called it) recited to him many times the burning of this woman, and withall added the story of the bull aforesaid, which he himselfe did see and testifie. This Richard Webbe is yet liuing, a witnesse of his owne fathers words and testimonie, which I trust may satisfie all indifferent Readers, except only such as thinke no truth to be beleeued, but that only which is in their Portues.

A faithfull Christ an woman and a manly martyr, burned at Chipping-sadbery.

A comparison betweene Butchers and the popes murthering ministers.

A neare and speciall example of the iust punishment of God vpon a persecutour.

And thus much concerning the state of the Church. Wherein is to be vnderstood, what plagues and persecutions haue been raised vp in all quarters against the flocke and congregation of Christ, not only by the Turks, but also at home within our selues, by the bishop of Rome, and his retinue. Where also is to be noted in the daies and raigne of this king Henry the vij. how mightily the working of Gods Gospell hath multiplied and increased, and what great numbers of men and women haue suffered for the same, with vs in England, as by these stories aboue past, may be apparent.

Now these things declared, which to the Church matters be appertaining, consequently it remaineth something to intreat of the state likewise of the commonwealth, which commonlie doth follow the state of the Church. Where the church is quietie and moderatlie gouerned, and the flocke of Christ defended by godly Princes in peace and safetie, from deuouring and violence of blondie Molues: the succesle of ciuill estate, for the most part, there doth flourish, and the princes long continue through Gods preseruation, in prosperous rest and tranquillitie. Contrariwise, where the Church of Christ, either through the negligence of princes, or through their setting on, the poore members of Christ be persecuted and deuoured: shortly after ensueth same iust recompence of the Lord vpon those princes, that either their liues do not long continue, or else of our owne countrie nere at home.

The state of the common-wealth commonly followeth the state of the Church.

The date of princes to defend their subiects from the slaughter of the Church of Rome.

And here not to inuander in our story, farther then to France only, let vs a little behold the example of king Charles the viij. who liuing in this kings time, died also not long before him. This Charles is commended of Philippus Cominæus, to bee a moderate, valiant and victorious prince, adorned with many speciall vertues to a prince appertaining. And yet the same king, because he was slacke and remisse in defence of Christs church, neither did he his authority, nor take his occasion offered to him of God, to amend and reforme the state of the bishop and clergy of Rome then he might, he was therefore himselfe punished and cut off of the Lord, as by his sleepe ensuing may right well appeare. For so it is of him recorded, that being marueilously excited and prouoked, of his owne minde (contrary to the counsell of most of his Nobles) he take his voiage into Italie, neither being furnished with money, nor the season of the yeare being conuenient thereunto. And that this may appeare the better to procede of the Lords doing, to the intent he would haue the church and clergy of Rome reformed by the princes sword, which so vexed all Christendome at that time, we shall heare what is testified in the Commentaries of the foresaid Philip Cominæus Lib. 3. De bello Neapolit. writing in this wise.

Ex Commentarijs Phil. Cominæi De bello Neapolitano, lib. 3.

There was (saith he) in the city of Florence the same time a Dominicke Frier, named Hieronymus Sauonarola (of whom mention was made before, pag. 672.) a man of a right godly and approoued life: who in the said city of Florence preached and prophecied long before, that the French King should come with an army into Italy, being stirred vp of God to suppresse the tyrants of Italy, and none should withstand him. He should also come to the city of Pisæ, and the state of Florence should be altered: al which happened true. He affirmed moreouer to be signified to him of the Lord, that the Ecclesiasticall state of the church must be redressed Per vim armorum. i. by the sword, or force of armes. Many things also he prophecied of the Venetians, and of the French king, saying that the king with some danger and difficulty, should passe that iourney, yet notwithstanding should ouercome it and escape, albeit his strength were neuer so slender: for God would safely conduct him in that iourney, and safely bring him home againe. But because he had not done his office, in amending the state of the church, and in defending his people from iniurie, and from deuouring, therefore it should come to passe (said he) and that shortly, that some incommoditie or detriment should happen to the king: or if he should escape that danger of his sicknesse and recouer health, then if hee did resist the cruelty of the wicked, and procure the safety of the poore and miserable, God would shew mercy vnto him, &c. And this the said Hieronymus declared before to Cominæus one of the kings counsellours, which was the writer of the story, and required him to What difference betweene moderate princes and them that were persecutors.

to signifie the same vnto the king, which so did, and hee moreouer himselfe comming to the presence of the king, declared no lesse.

All which things, as he had foretold, came directly to effect. For the king being but easily accompanied with a small power, entred into Italie, where first he came to Asta, then to Genua, and to Pisæ, from thence prosecuted to Florence, which also he obtained, displacing there Petrus Medices the duke, who had bled great tyrannie vpon the subiectes. From thence he remooued toward Rome, where a great part of the citie wall at the comming of the French king, fell downe.

Afterward when the king was entred into the citie and the pope (who then tooke part with Alphonsius king of Neapolis against the French king) had vnmured himselfe within the mount of Anion, the wall of the Castell fell downe of it selfe, whereby, when the king was both occasioned, and exhorted also by his Captaines to inuade the Pope, and to depose him, and to reforme the Church of Rome, (which he might then easily haue done, as it hath pleased him) yet all these occasions offered so opportunely of God mooued not the king to doe his dutie, and to helpe the poore Church of Christ: wherefore shortly after, returning home into France from Neapolis, either the same yeare or the nert yeare following, he was stroken with a sodaine sickenesse at Amboise, as he was looking on them that played at tennis, & that in the stinckingest place in all the Castle, where he fell downe and died within 12. houres, according to the forewarning of Pictoninus, who wrote vnto him a little before, both of his sodaine death and of his time, which was about the yeare of our Lord 1498. Ex Philip. Cominæo. Lib. 5.

The death of K. Henry 7.

Like examples we haue many here also in this our realme of England. So long as king John kept out of the realme the popes authoritie and power, he continued safe and quiet with his nobles: but so soone as he brought the realme vnder tribute and subiection to that forreine Bishop, God stirred vp his nobles against him, whereby hee had much disquiet and trouble, and soone thereupon deceased.

Of all the kings of England, from William Conquerour, to this king Henry 7. were none which either longer continued, or more prosperously flourished, then king Henry the second, king Henry the third, king Edward the first, king Edward the third, of whom the first, how stout hee was in withstanding Thomas Becket and pope Alexander the 3. is sufficiently before comprehended, pag. 201.

Couentry newes perfourned.

The second, which was sonne of king John, albeit through the wretchednesse of that time his power was not sufficient to repulse the popes vsurped iurisdiction out of the realme, yet his will was good: at least he so defended and prouided for his subiects, that they tooke no great wrong at the popes handes: who reigned one yeare longer then Augustus Cæsar, which hath not commonly beene seene in any Prince.

Examples of Kings of England, which were blessed of God with long prosperitie being enemies to the bishops of Rome.

Augustus reigned 55. yeares.

The third, which was king Edward the first, so diligently behaued himselfe for the publicke commodities and safetie of his people, that hee defended them from all forraine power and hostilitie both of the Scottes (then our enemies, now our friendes) and also from the bishop of Rome, taking part with them against vs, as may appeare aboue, pag. 311. Furthermore of the same king, and of his worthy nobles and house of Parliament, how valiantly they stood in denial of the popes subsidies, and also how the said king secluded out of his protection the Bishops, and especially the Archbishop Pecham for standing with the pope, reade pag. 320.

Vide supra pag. 311.

Vide supra pag. 320.

Now as touching king Edward the third, how little he regarded, how princely he with his nobles likewise resisted the popes reseruations and prouisions, how he bridled the Archbishop John Stratford, and reiected the vaine authoritie of the bishop of Rome, both in defence of his subiectes, and also in defence of claiming his right title in the realme of France, reade pag. 346.

Vide supra pag. 346.

Not that I doe here affirme or define, as in a generall rule, that vnciuile incestie and vnpolycie of life alwaies followeth the goodnes, which we see rather to be giuen more often to the wicked sort: but speaking of the dutie of Princes, I note and obserue by examples of histories, that such Princes as haue most defended the church of Christ committed to their gouernance, from iniurie & violence of the Bishop of Rome, haue not lacked at Gods hand great blessing and felicitie: whereas contrariwise they which either themselues haue been persecutors of Christes members, or haue not shielded them by their protection from forraine tyrannie and iniuries, haue lacked at Gods hand that protection, which the other had, as may appeare by king Edward the second, Richard the third, king Henry the fourth, king Henrie the fift, king Henry the first, &c. who because either negligently they haue suffered, or cruelly caused such persecuting lawes to be made, and so much Christian blood inuriously to be deuoured: therefore haue they been the lesse prospered of the Lord, so that either they were deposed, or if they flourished for a while, yet they did not long continue, almost not halfe the time of the other kinges before named.

And therefore, as the state of the common wealth doth commonly follow the state of the Church, as ye heard before: so it had been to be wished, that this king Henry the vij. being otherwise a prudent and temperate Prince, had not permitted the intemperate rage of the popes clergie so much to haue their willes ouer the poore flocke of Christ, as then they had: according as by these persecutions aboue mentioned may appeare. The which king Henry vij. albeit he had a sufficient continuance, who had now raigned 24. yeares, yet notwithstanding here commeth the same thing to be noted, whereof I spake before: that when the Church of Christ beginneth to be iniured with violence, and to goe to wracke through misorder and negligence, the state of the common wealth cannot there long endure without some alteration, and broile of Gods correction. But howsoeuer this marke is to be taken, thus lieth the storie: that after the burning and bering of these poore seruants of Christ aboue recited, when the persecution began now in the Church to be hote, God called away the king, the same yeare aboue mentioned, which was 1509. after he had raigned the terme of yeares, 24. Who if he had adioyned a little more pitifull respect, in protecting Christes poore members, from the fire of the popes tyranny, to his other great vertues of singular wisedome, excellent temperance, and moderate frugalitie: so much had hee been comparable with the best of those Princes aboue comprehended, as he had been inferiour but to a fewe: but this defect which lacked in him, was supplied most luckily (blessed be the Lord) by his posteritie succeeding after him. Of whom in the next volume following (Christ thereunto assisting vs) we haue to speake more at large.

Among manie other things incident in the reigne of this king Henry 7. I haue ouerpassed the historie of certaine godly persons perfecuted in the Diocelle of Couentry and Lichfield, as we finde them in the registers of the Diocelle recorded, here following.

The yeare of our Lord 1485. March 9. amongst diuers and sundry other good men in Couentry, these vi. hereunder named were examined before Iohn Bishop of Couentry and Lichfield, in S. Michaels Church, vpon these articles, following in order.

J. Blomstone.

FIrst, Iohn Blamston was openly and publikely infamed, accused, reported, and appeached, that he was a very heretiche, because hee had preached, taught, holden and affirmed, that the power attributed to S. Peter in the Church of God, by our Sauiour Iesus Christ immediatly did not slit, or passe from him, to remaine with his successors.

The power of Peter limited not to his successors.

Item, that there was as much vertue in an herbe as in the Image of the virgin Marie.

Item, that prayer and almes auaile not the dead, for incontinent after death, he goeth either to heauen or hell, whereupon he concludeth, there is no purgatorie.

Purgatorie denied.

Item, that it was folishnesse to goe on pilgrimage to the image of our Ladie of Dancaster, Walsingham, or of the tower of the citie of Couentrie: for a man might as well worship the blessed Virgin by the fire side in the kitchen, as in the foresaid places, and as well might a man worship the blessed Virgin, when he seeth his mother or sister, as in visiting the images, because they be no more but dead flocks and stones.

Images not to be worshipped.

Item, that hee said in English with a frowning countenance, as it appeared: a vengeance on all such hoison priests, for they haue great enuie that a poore man should get his liuing among them.

RIchard Hegham of the same citie was accused, &c. to be a very heretiche, because he did hold & that a Christian man being at the point of death, should renounce all his owne works good and ill, and submit him to the mercie of God.

Richard Hegham. Heresies condemned.

Item, that it was fondnesse to worship the Images of our Ladie of tower in the foresaid citie, or of other Saints, for they are but stockes and stones.

Item, that if the image of our Ladie of tower were put into the fire, it would make a good fire.

Images strut. Fuell to be burned, then be worshipped.

Item, that if it were better to deale monie vnto poore folks then to offer to the images of Christ and other Saints, which are but dead stockes and stones.

RObert Crowther of the same citie was accused, that hee was an heretiche, because he did hold, that who so receiueth the Sacrament of the altar in deadly sinne, or out of charitie, receiueth nothing but bread and wine.

Robert Crowther.

Item, that neither bishop, nor priests or curats of Churches, haue power in the market of periance to bind and lose.

Item, that pilgrimage to the image of our Ladie of tower is folishnesse, for it is but a stocke or a stone.

Against Pilgrimage.

IOhn Smith was accused to bee a very heretiche, because he did hold that euery man is bound to know the Lords prayer, and the Crede in English, if he might for these false priests.

John Smith.

Item, that who so beleeued as the Church then did beleeue, beleeued ill: and that a man had need to frequent the Schooles a good while, ere that he can attaine to the knowledge of the true and right faith.

The Lordes prayer to be in English.

Item, that no Priest hath power to assoile a man in the market of penance, from his sinnes.

Roger Brown. Against Pilgrimage.

ROger Brown of the same citie, was also accused to be an hereticke, because he did hold that no man ought to worship the Image of our Ladie of Walsingham, nor the blood of Christ at Hailes, but rather God almightie, who would giue him whatsoeuer he would aske.

Item, that he held not vp his handes, nor looked vp, at the elevation of the Eucharist.

Item, that he promised one to shew him certaine bookes of herselie, if he would sweare that hee would not vtter them, and if he would credite them.

Flesh eating in Lent.

Item, that he did eate flesh in Lent, and was taken with the manner.

Item, if anie man were not shriuen his whole life long, and in the point of death would be confessed, and confesse not, if he had no more but contrition onlie, hee should passe to ioy without Purgatorie: And if hee were confessed of anie sinne, and were enioyned onlie to say for Penance one Pater noster, if he thought he should haue anie punishment in Purgatorie for that sinne, he would neuer be confessed for anie sinne.

Item, because hee said all is lost that is giuen to Priestes.

Item, that there was no Purgatorie, that would pardon all sinnes without confession and satisfaction.

Against Purgatorie and confession auricular.

Against confession and satisfaction.

The Butler.

THomas Butler of the same citie, was likewise openlie accused to be a verie hereticke, because he did hold that there were but two waies, that is to say, to heauen, and to Hell.

Against Purgatorie.

Item, that no faithfull man houlde abide any paine after the death of Christ, for any sinne, because Christ died for our sinnes.

Against merites.

Item, that there was no purgatorie, for euerie man immediatly after death passeth either to heauen, or hell.

John Falkes.

Item, that whosoeuer departeth in the faith of Christ and the church, howsoeuer he hath liued, shall be saued.

Against Images.

Item, that praiers and pilgrimages are nothing worth, and auaile not to purchase heauen.

IOhn Falkes was accused to be a verie hereticke, because he did affirme that it was a foolish thing to offer to the Image of our Lady, saying, her head shall be hoare or I offer to her, what is it but a blocke? If it could speake to me I would giue it an halfepenny worth of ale.

Item, that when the Priest carrieth to the sicke the bodie of Christ, why carrieth he not also the blood of Christ?

Item, that he did eate cole milke vpon the first Sunday of Lent.

He is heretike to say a stone is a stone, and a blocke is a blocke.

Item, that the Image of our Ladie was but a stone or a blocke.

Rich Hilmin.

RIchard Hilmin was accused that hee was a verie hereticke, because he did say and maintaine that it was better to depart with money to the poore, then to giue tithes to Priestes, or to offer to the images of our Ladie, and that it were better to offer to Images made by God, then to the Images of God painted.

Scripture in English.

Item that he had the Lords praier and the Salutation of the Angell and the Creed in English, and another booke did he see and had, which contained the Epistles and Gospels in English, and according to them would he liue, and thereby be serued to be saued.

Item, that no Prince speaketh better in the Pulpit then that booke.

Item, that the Sacrament of the aultar is but bread, and that the Priestes make it to blinde the people.

Item, that a Priest whiles he is at Masse, is a Priest, and after one masse done, till the beginning of another Masse, he is no more then a lay man, and hath no more power then a meere lay man.

¶ After they were enforced to recant, they were alloyed and put to penance.

Purgery Sept.

IN the yeare of our Lord 1488. the third of April, Margery Sept, wife of Iames Sept of Alburne, was brought before the foresaid Iohn Bishop of Couentry and Lichfield, who was there accused that the saide, that that which the Priests sit ouer their heades at Masse, was not the true and verie bodie of Christ: For if it were so, the Priestes could not breake it so lightly into foure partes, and swallowe it as they doe: for the Lordes bodie hath flesh and bones, so hath not that which the Priestes receiue.

Against the Sacrament of the aultar.

Item, that Priestes buying Leakes for a halfepenny, and shewing them to the people and saying, that of euery of them they make the body of Christ, doe nothing but deceiue the people and enrich themselues.

Item, seeing God in the beginning did create and make man, how can it be that man should be able to make God?

¶ This woman also was constrained to recant, and so was the assoiled and did penance.

Thus much I thought here good to insert, touching these foresaid men of Couentry, especiallie for this purpose, because our cauilling aduersaries be wont to obiect against vs the newnesse of Churches old and ancient religion. To the intent therefore they may see this doctrine not to be so new as they report, I wish they would consider both the time and articles here obiected against these foresaid persons, as is aboue premised.

Picus Mirandula Earle.

I should also in the same reigne of king Henry 7. haue introduced that historie of Ioannes Picus Earle of Mirandula, the mention of whose name partly is touched before, pag. 660. This Picus Earle of Mirandula being but a young man, was so excellently witted, & so singularly learned in all sciences and in all tongues, both Latine, Greeke, Hebrew, Chaldey, and Araby, that comming to Rome booted & spurred, he set vp 90. conclusions, to dispute in the same with any in all Christendome, whosoeuer would come against him. Of which conclusions diuers were touching the matter of the Sacrament, &c. And when none was found in all Rome, nor in Europe, that openly would dispute with him, priuily and in corners certaine of the Popes Clergie, Prelates, Lawyers and Friers, by the Pope appointed, consulted togither to enquire vpon his conclusions, whereupon they did articulate against him for suspition of herselie. And thus the vnlearned clergie of Rome priuily circumuented & entangled this learned Earle in their snares of herselie, against whom they neuer durst openly dispute. He died being of the age of 32. yeeres, of such wit and towardnesse, as is hard to say, whether euer Italie breede vp a better. In his sicknesse Charles the 8. the French king moued with the fame of his learning, came to visite him. The furniture of his bookes cost him 7000. florens. A little before his death his mind was to giue all away, and to take a coule, to go about and preach, but the Lord would not permit him. His storie requireth a long tractation, which if place doe serue, we will not peraduenture forget. With two Popes, that is, with Pope Innocent, and Alexander 6. he had much deration.

¶ The names of the archbishops of Canturburie in this fiue booke contained.

A briefe note of Ecclesiasticall lawes ordained by ancient kings in this realme.

Ecclesiasticall lawes ordained by ancient kings of this Realme.

FOrsomuch as it is, and hath bene a persuasion long gendered in the heades of many that the bishops of Rome be the vniuersall heades of the whole militant Church of Christ in earth, and haue alwaies so continued from the beginning of the primitiue time: And that no Prince, King, nor Emperour in his owne realme hath any interest to intermeddle with matters and lawes Ecclesiasticall, but onlie the said bishops of Rome: to refell and remoue that opinion out of the heades of all Englishmen, as a thing most false, and contrary both to histories of time, and examples of ancient kinges and gouernors of this realme, I thought to fill vp a little end of paper here left, with some such briefe rehearsall of lawes deuised and appointed by kinges and rulers of this land, for the ordering of the Church, and causes Ecclesiasticall, to the intent that all the world may see the gouernment of Christes Church here in earth vnder Christ, hath not depended onely of the Pope from ancient time, but hath beene rather directed by such kinges and princes as God here had placed vnder him to gouerne the people of this Realme of England, as followeth here in this present table to be noted.

Ecclesiasticall lawes of King Canutus.

King Canutus lawes.

CAnutus the Dane king began to reigne in this land in the yeare of our Lord 1016. The saide Canutus (as Ethelrede had done before) diuided his lawes into Ecclesiasticall and temporall.

1. That ecclesiasticall persons being accused of fighting, murder, or anie other offence; should purge themselues thereof.
2. That Priests should be degraded for periury, and put in sureties of good behauiour.

8. That Bishops and Priestes should do their duties: that they cry out and warne their flocks, when the wolfe commeth.
9. That at the court of euerie shire, the bishop of the Diocese shall be present with the sheriffe, and that the one shal teach them Gods lawe, and the other mans lawe, as ye heard in king Edgars lawes before.

Kings of England before the Conquest gouerned as well in causes Ecclesiasticall as temporall.

Many other lawes both Ecclesiasticall and temporall beside these were enacted by these and other kinges here in England before the Conquest: but these be sufficient to giue the vnderstanding reader to consider, how the authoritie of the Bishops of Rome, all this while, extended not so farre to prescribe lawes for gouernment of the Church, but that kinges and princes of the Realme, as they be now, so were then full gouernours here vnder Christ, as well in causes Ecclesiasticall, as temporall, both in directing orders, instituting lawes, in calling of Synodes, and also in conferring Bishoprickes and benefices, without any leaue of the Romish Bishops. Thus Odo, Dunstane, Oswold, Ethelwold, Adelmus, and Lanckrancus, although they set their palles afterward from Rome, yet were they made bishops and archbishops by kings onlie, not by popes.

When kinges of England came first vnder the popes subiection.

And thus stoode the gouernment of this Realme of England all the time before the conquest, til Pope Hildebrand through the setting on of the Saxons, began first to bring the Emperour (which was Henry 4.) vnder foot. Then followed the subduing of other Emperours, kings, and subiects after that, as namely here in England, when Lanckrancus, Anselmus, and Becket, went to complaine of their kinges, and gouernours, then brought they the popes iudiciall authoritie first from Rome, ouer this land, both ouer kings and subiects: which euer since hath continued, till these latter yeares. Albeit the said kings of this Realme of England being prudent Princes, and seeing right well the ambitious presumption of those Romish Bishops, did what they couldc to shake off the yoke of their supremacie, as appeareth by the lawes and actes of their parliaments, both in K. Edward the thirds time, king Richard the 2. and king Henry the 4. aboue in their parliament notes specified: yet for feare of other forreine princes, and the blinde opinion of their subiects, such was then the calamitie of that time, that neither they could nor durst compasse that, which faine they would: till at last, the time of their iniquitie being complete, through the Lords wonderfull working, their pride had a fall, as in the volume ensuing (the Lord so graunting) shall by processe of historie be declared.

The

The proud primacie of Popes painted out in Tables, in order of their rising vp by little and little, from faithfull Bishops and Martyrs, to become Lords and gouernours ouer kings and kingdomes, exalting themselues in the Temple of God, aboue all that is called god, &c. 2. Thessal. 2.

The martyrdome of good bishops vnder wicked Emperours in the primitive Church.

IN the Table of the primitiue Church afore described, hath beene (gentle Reader) set forth and exhibited before thine eies the grieuous afflictions and sorrowfull torments, which through Gods secret sufferance, fell vpon the true Saints and members of Christs Church in that time, especially vpon the good Bishops, Ministers, and Teachers of the flocke: of whom some were scourged, some beheaded, some crucified, some burned, some had their eies put out, some one way, some another, miserably consumed: which dates of wofull calamitie continued (as is foreshewed) neere the space of CCC. yeares. During which time, the deare spouse and elect Church of God, being sharply assaulted on euery side, had small rest, no toy, nor outward safetie in this present world, but in much bitternesse of heart, in continuall teares and mourning vnder the crosse passed ouer their dates, being spoiled, imprisoned, consumed, reuiled, famished, tormented and martyred cruelie where they neither durst well tarrie at home for feare & dread, and much lesse durst come abroad for the enemies, but onelie by night, when they assembled as they might, sometime to sing Psalmes and Hymnes together. In all which their dreadfull dangers, and sorowfull afflictions, notwithstanding the goodnesse of the Lord left them not desolate: but the more their outward tribulations did increase, the more their inward consolations did abound: and the farther off they seemed from the ioyes of this life, the more present was the Lord with them with grace and fortitude to confirme and reioyce their soules. And though their possessions and riches in this world were left and spoiled, yet were they enriched with heauenly gifts and treasures from aboue an hundreth fold. Then was true religion truely felt in heart. Then was Christianitie not in outward appearance shewed, but in inward affection receiued, and the true image of the Church not in outward shewe pretended, but in her perfect state effectuall. Then was the name and feare of God true in heart, not in lips alone dwelling. Faith then was feruent, zeale ardent, prayer not swimming in the lips, but groned out to God from the bottome of the spirit. Then was no pride in the Church, no; leisure to seeke riches, nor time to keepe them. Contention for trifles was then so farre from Christians, that well were they when they could meete to prate together against the diuell, author of all dissension. Briefly, the whole Church of Christ Iesus, with all the members therof, the farther it was from the type and shape of this world, the neerer it was to the blessed respect of Gods fauour and supportation.

The true riches of the church described.

¶ The first rising of the Bishops of Rome.

The first rising of the Bishops of Rome.

AFter this long time of trouble, it pleased the Lord at length mercifully to looke vpon the Saints and seruants of his sonne, to release their captiuitie, to release their miserie, and to bind vp the old Dragon the Diuell, which so long bereaued them, whereby the church began to aspire to some more libertie: and the Bishops, which before were as abiects, bitterly contemned of Emperours, through the prouidence of God (which disposeth all things in his time after his owne will) began now of Emperours to be esteemed and had in price. Furthermore, as Emperours grew more in deuotion, so the Bishops more and more were exalted, not onely in fauour, but also preferred vnto honour, insomuch that in short space they became not quarter masters, but rather halfe Emperours with Emperours.

The riches of the Church ruines to worldly riches. Ex libro Sereni. Discipuli.

After this in processe of time, as riches and worldly wealth crept into the clergie, and that the diuell had powred his sorrome into the Church (as the voice was heard the same time ouer Constantinople) so true humilitie began to decay, and pride to set in his foote, till at last they plaied as the Iuy doth with the Oke tree, which first beginning with a goodly greene theiue, imbraceth him so long, till at length it ouergroweth him, and so sucketh all his moisture from him, setting his roote fast in his barke, till at last it both stifleth the stocke and killeth the branches, and so commeth to be a nest for Owles and all vncleane birds. Not vntruely therefore it was said of Augustine: Religio peperit diuitias, & filia deuorauit matrem. i. Religion begat riches, and the daughter hath deuoured the mother. The veritie whereof notoriously may appeare aboue all other in the church of Rome, and the Bishops of the same. For after that the church of Rome, through fauour of Emperours, was indued with lands, donations, possessions, and patrimonies, so that the Bishops thereof feeling the smacke of wealth, ease, and prosperitie, began to swell in pompe and pride: the more they flourished in this world, the more Gods holy spirit forsooke them, till at last the said Bishops, who at the first were poore, creeping low vpon the ground, and were persecuted long time, euery man treading vpon them in this world now of persecuted people, began to be persecutors of others, and to treade vpon the necks euen of Emperours, and to bring the heads of kings and princes vnder their girdle. And not onely that, but furthermore through pride and and riches, they were so farre gone from all religion, that in the verie end they became the great aduersary of God (whom we call Antichrist) prophecied of so long before by the spirit of God to come, sitting in the temple of God, &c. Of whom thus we reade in the Epistle of Paul, 2. Thess. 2. where he saith: We beseech you brethren, by the comming of our Lord Iesus Christ, & by our fellowship together in him, that ye be not suddenly moued in your minde, nor troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word nor letter, as it were from vs, as though the day of Christ were at hand. Let no man in any wise deceiue you, for that day shall not come except there come a departing first, and that man of sinne be reuealed, euen the sonne of perdition, that aduersarie which exalteth himselfe aboue all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he shall sit in the temple of God, as God, and set forth himselfe as he were God, &c.

The great aduersarie called Antichrist described by S. Paul, 2. Thess. 2.

A declaration of S. Pauls words.

By which words of S. Paul we haue diuers things to vnderstand: First, that the day of the Lords coming was not then neere at hand. Secondly, the Apostle giuing vs a token before, to know when that day shall approch, bideth vs looke for an aduersarie first to be reuealed. Thirdly, to shew what aduersary this shalbe, he expresseth him not to be as a common aduersarie, such as were then in his time: For although Herode, Annas and Caiphas, the high Priests and Pharises, Tertullus, Alexander the Coppersmith, Elymas and Simon Magus, and Nero the Emperour in Pauls time were great aduersaries yet here he meaneth another besides these, greater then all the rest, not such a one as should be like to Priest, King or Emperour, but such as farre exceeding the state of all kings, priests and emperours, should be the prince of priests, should make kings to stoope, and should tread vpon the necke of Emperours, and make them to kisse his feete. Moreouer, where the Apostle saith, that he shall sit in the temple of God, thereby is meant, not the personall sitting of the Pope in the citie of Rome, but the authoritie and iurisdiction of his see exalted in the whole vniuersall Church, equall with God himselfe. For let men giue to the pope that which he in his lawes, decrees, and in his pontificall requireth, and what difference is there betweene God and the pope? If God set lawes and ordinances, so doth he. If God haue his creatures, so hath he. If God require obedience, so doth he. If the breach of Gods commandements be punished, much more he his. God hath his Religion, the pope also hath his, yea for Gods one religion, he hath an hundred. God hath set vp one Aduocate, he hath an hundred. God hath instituted but a few holydaies: for Gods one, he hath instituted xl. And if the holy day that God hath appointed be simplex, the feast that the pope appointeth is duplex & triplex. Christ is the head of the Church: so is the pope. Christ giueth influence to his bodie: so doth the pope. Christ forgiueth sinne, the pope doth no lesse. Christ expelleth euill spirits by his power: so pretendeth the pope by his holy water. Furthermore, where Christ went barefoot vpon the bare ground: thee with his golden shoes is carried on mens shoulders. And where Christ was called Sanctus Sanctorum: he is called Sanctorum Sanctissimus. Christ neuer practised but only the spirituall sworde: hee claimeth both spirituall and temporall. Christ bought the Church: he both buieth and selleth the Church. And if it be necessarie to beleeue Christ to be the Sauiour of the world: so is it necessarie to beleeue the pope to be the head of the Church. Christ paied tribute vnto Cæsar: hee maketh Cæsar pay tribute vnto him. Finally, the crowne of Christ was of sharpe thorne: the pope hath three crownes of golde vpon his head, so farre exceeding Christ the sonne of God in glorie of this world, as Christ exceedeth him in the glorie of heauen. The image and paterne of whole intollerable pride and exaltation, according as S. Paul both describe him in his Epistle aforesaid, we haue here set forth, not onely in these tables to be seene, and by his owne facts to be noted, but also in his own words and Regifleros, Clementines, Extrauagants, and Pontificals, expressed, as in order (the Lord willing) shall follow.

The pope matching himselfe euen with God.

¶ The exaltation of popes aboue kings and emperours out of histories.

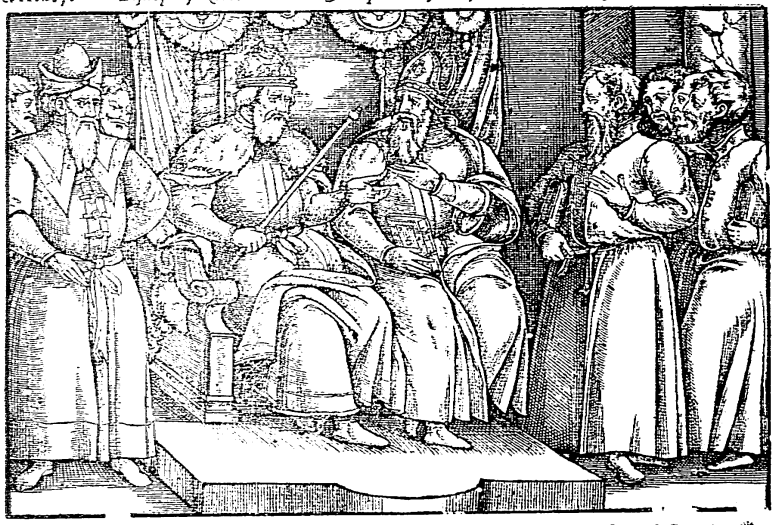
FIrst, after that Italie and the Citie of Rome were ouerrunne by the Gothes and Vandales, so that the seate of the Empire was remoued to Constantinople, then began Ioannes Patriarch of Constantinople, to put forth himselfe and would needes be called vniuersall Bishop of the worlde: but the Bishop of Rome in no case would suffer that, and stopped it. After this came the Emperours deputie, and exarch of Rauenna to rule Italie: but the Bishop of Rome through aide of the king of Lombards soone quailed him.



John Patriarch of Constantinople subdued by the bishop of Rome.

The Emperour lieutenant of Rauenna subdued by the Lombards and Romane Bishops.

Not long after, about the yeare of our Lord 500. came Phocas the murderer, who slue the Emperour of Constantinople his master Mauritius and his children. By which Phocas the bishops of old Rome aspired first to their preheminence, to be crowned the head bishops ouer the whole Church, and so together with the Lombards began to rule the citie of Rome. Afterwards when the Lombards would not yeeld vnto him, in accomplishing his ambitious desire, but would needes require of the bishop the said citie of Rome; he stirred vp Pipinus, but first deposed Childericus the king of France, and so thrusting him into an Abbay, set vp in his place Pipinus and his son Carolus Magnus to put downe the said king of Lombards called Aistulphus. And so translated the Empire from Constantinople into France, diuiding the spoile betweene him and them: so that the kings of France had all the possessions and lands which before belonged to the Empire, and he to receiue of them the quiet possessio of the citie of Rome, with such donations and lordships, which now they challenge vn-

Pope Alexander 3. excommunicateth Frederick Barbarossa.

Pope Innocent 3. vsurpeth ouer the Emperour.

Pope Innocent 3. excommunicateth king John.

Following then in proces of time, after the dates of Pipinus, Carolus and Ludouicus (who had indued these bishops of Rome, called now popes, with large possessions) when the kings of France were not so appliable to their becke, to aid and maintaine them against the Princes of Italy, who began then to pinch the said bishops for their wrongfull vsurped goods, they practised with the Germaines to reduce the Empire to Otho first of that name Duke of Spaine, referring the election thereof to 7. princes Electours of Germane, which was about an. 1002. notwithstanding referring still in his hands the negatiue voyce, thinking thereby to enioy that they had, in quietnesse and securitie, and so did for a good space.

At length when some of these Germaine Emperours also after Otho began a little to spurne against the said bishops and popes of Rome, some of them they accursed, some they subdued and brought to the kissing of their feet, some they deposed, and placed other in their possessions.

So was Henricus 4. by these bishops accursed, the Emperour himselfe forced with his wife and childe to wait attendance vpon the popes pleasure three daies and three nights in winter at the gates of Canossus. Reade before pag. 162. Besides all this the said pope raised vp Rodulphus to be Emperour against him: who being slaine in warre, then the said pope Gregorie 7. not resting thus, stirred vp his owne sonne Henricus 5. to fight against his owne naturall father and to depose him, which Henricus the 5. was also himselfe afterward accursed and excommunicated, and the Saxons at last set vp vnthe b. bishops to fight against him.

After this the Emperours began to be somewhat calmed and more quiet, suffering the bishops to reigne as they listed: till Fredericke the first called Barbarossa came, and began to three coales against them. Howbeit they hampered both him, and his sonne Henry in such sort, that they brought first the necke of Fredericke, in the church of Venice, vnder their feete to tread vpon: and after the said bishops crowning Henricus his sonne in the Church of S. Peter, set his crowne on his head with their feete, and with their feete spurned it off again, to make him know that the popes of Rome had power both to crowne Emperours, and depose them again. Where of read before pag. 185. 1. 50. 221. 2. 62.

Then followed Philippus brother to Henry aforesaid, whom also the popes accursed, about the yeare of our Lord 1198. and set vp Otho Duke of Saxonie. But when the said Otho began to be so saucie to dispossesse the bishops of their cities and lands (which they had inuocked into their hands, they could not beare that, but incontinent they put him besides the cushion. The like also fell vpon Otho the 4. that followed after Philip who was suffered no longer then foure yeares to raigne, about the yeare of our Lord 1209.

At this time Fredericus 2. the sonne of Fredericus Barbarossa aboue mentioned, was but young, whom the bishops of Rome supposing to find more mortified and tamed to their hand, aduanced to be Emperour after his father. But that fell out much contrary to their expectation. For he perceiuing the immoderate pompe and pride of the Romane bishops, which he could in no case abide, so netled them and cut their combs, and waxed so stout against them, intending to extripe their tyrannie and to reduce their pompous riches to the state and condition of the primitiue Church againe, putting some of them to slight, and pilloning some of their cardinals, that of three popes, one after another he was accursed, circumuented by treason, at last deposed, and after that poisoned, and at last forsaken and died.

After this Fredericke followed his sonne Conradus, whom the aforesaid bishops for his disobedience soone dispatched, exciting against him in mortall warre the Lantgraue of Thuring, whereby he was at length driuen into his kingdome of Naples, and there deceased.

Marre raised against Conradus, by the Bishops of Rome.

This Conradus had a sonne called Conradinus duke and prince of Suevia. When this Conradinus after the decease of his father came to enioy his kingdome of Naples, the said bishops stirred vp against him Charles the French kings brother, in such sort, that through craftie conueiance, both Conradinus (which descended of the blood of so many Emperors, and also Fredericke Duke of Austria, were both taken, and after much wretched handling in their miserable imbarance vnlesoming to their state, at length were both brought vnder the axe by the popes procurement, and so both beheaded. And thus ended the imperiall stocke of Fredericke the first, surnamed Barbarossa.

Ex Auentino.

The like as happened to Fredericke the Emperor, had almost also fal'n vpon Philip the French king, by pope Boniface the 8. who because he could not laue his commodities and reuenewes out of France after his will, cast out his Bulles and letters patents to displace king Philip aforesaid, and to possesse Albertus king of Romans in his roome.

The insolence of Pope Boniface 8. against Philip the French king.

And thus hitherto in forreine stories. Now touching our countrey Princes here in England, to speake somewhat likewise of them: did not pope Alexander the third presumptuously taking vpon him where he had nothing to doe to intermeddle with the kings subiects, for the death of Becket thereby, albeit the king sufficiently cleared himselfe thereof: yet notwithstanding did hee not wrongfully bring the said king Henry 2. to such penance as it pleased him to enioyne, and also violently constrained him to sweare obedience to the see of Rome? pag. 206. The like also was shewed before in this story to happen to king Johnthis sonne. For when the said king like a valiant prince had held out the tyrannie of those Bishops seuen yeares together, were not all the Churches in England barred vp, and his inheritance with all his dominions minions giuen away by pope Innocent the third, to Ludouicus the French king, and he afterward compelled to submit both himselfe, and to make his whole realme feodatarie to the bishops of Rome, and moreouer the king himselfe driuen also to surrender his crowne to Pandulphus the popes Legat, and so continued as a priuate person fiue daies, standing at the popes courtesie whether to receiue it againe at his hands or no: And when the nobles of the realme rose afterward against the king for the same, was not he then faine to seeke and sue to the foresaid pope for succour, as by his owne letter, taken out of the publike rolles, may appeare.

And yet all this notwithſtanding that the ſaid king Iohn did ſo yeeld to the pope, he was both purſued by his nobles, and alſo in the end was poiſoned by a ſubiect of the popes owne religion, a monke of Swinſted: As I haue ſufficiently to proue, not only by William Caxton aboue in my ſtorie alleaged, pag. 233. but alſo haue teſtimonie of the moſt part of chronicles for the ſame (a few only excepted:) as of Thomas Gray in his French chronicle: Alſo of another French chronicle in meeter, of Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis: Thomas Rudburne alſo doth witneſſe the ſame: So doth Richard Rede in nouo Chronico ad tempora Henr. 6. Ex D. Paulo, 2. Theſſ. 2.

1. FOr as much as it ſtandeth vpon neceſſitie of ſaluation, for euery humane creature to be ſubiect vnto me the pope of Rome, it ſhall be therefore requiſit and neceſſarie for all men that will be ſaued, to learne and know the dignitie of my ſee, and excellencie of my domination, as heere is ſet forth according to the truth and very words of mine owne lawes, in ſtile as followeth. 2. Firſt my inſtitution began in the old Teſtament, and was conſummate and finiſhed in the new, in that my primacie ſhould was preſigured by the ſons of Aaron that were vnder him. 3. Neither is it to be thought that my church of Rome hath bin preferred by any generall councell, but obtained the pinnacle only by the voice of the Goſpell, and the mouth of the Sauiour. 4. And hath in it neither ſpot nor wrinkle, nor any ſuch like thing. 5. Wherefore as other ſeats be all inferiour to me, and as they cannot abſolue me: ſo haue they no power to bind me nor to ſtand againſt me, no more then the are hath power to ſtand or preſume aboue him that ſitteth with it, or the law to preſume aboue him that ruleth it. 6. This is the holy and Apoſtolike mother church of all other churches of Chriſt. 7. From whoſe rules it is not meet that any perſon or perſons ſhould decline, but like as the Son of God came to do the will of his Father, ſo muſt you do the will of your mother the church, the head whereof is the Church of Rome. 8. And if any other perſon or perſons ſhall erre from the ſaid church, either let them be admoniſhed, or elſe their names taken, to be knowne who they be that ſwarue from the cuſtomes of Rome. 9. Thus then for as much as the holy Church of Rome, whereof I am gouernour, is ſet vp to the whole world for a glaſſe or example, reaſon would what thing ſoeuer the ſaid Church determineth, or ordaineth, that to be receiued of all men for a generall and a perpetuall rule for euer. 10. Whereupon we se it now verified in this church, that was forprophecied by Ieremie, saying: Behold I haue set thee vp ouer nations and kingdomes to plucke vp and to breake downe, to build and to plant, &c. 11. Who so vnderstandeth not the peroratiue of this my priesthood, let him take vp to the firmament, where he may se two great lights, the Sunne and the Mone: one ruling ouer the day, the other ouer the night. So in the firmament of the vniuersall church, 12. God hath set two great dignities, the authoritie of the Pope, and of the Emperour. Of the which two this our dignitie is so much more waighter, as we haue the greater charge to giue account to God for kings of the earth, and the lawes of men. 13. Wherefore be it knowne to you Emperours, which know it also right well, that you depend vpon the iudgement of vs: we must not be brought and reduced to your will. 14. For (as I said) looke what difference there is betwixt the Sunne and the Mone, so great is the power of the pope ruling ouer the day, that is, ouer the spirituall: aboue emperours and kings ruling ouer the night, that is, ouer the lattie. 15. Now seeing then the Earth is seuen times bigger then the Mone, and the Sunne eight times greater then the Earth, it followeth that the popes dignitie fifty se times doth surmount the estate of the emperours. 16. Upon consideration whereof, I say therefore and pronounce that Constantine the emperour did naught in setting the Patriarch of Constantinople at his feete on his left hand. 17. And although the said emperour wrote to me, alleaging the words of Saint Peter, commanding vs to submit our selues to euerie humane creature, as to kings, dukes, and other for the cause of God, &c. 1. Peter 2. yet in answering againe in my Decretall, I expounded the mind and the words of Saint Peter to pertaine to his subiects, and not his successors, willing the said emperour to consider the person of the speaker, and to whom it was spoken. For if the mind of Peter had been there to debase the order of priesthood, and to make vs bridelings to euerie humane creature, then euerie Iacke might haue dominion ouer prelats: which maketh against the example of Christ, setting vp the order of priesthood to beare dominion ouer kings, according to the saying of Jeremie: Behold I haue set thee vpouer kings and nations, &c. 18. And as I feared not then to write this boldly vnto Constantine, so now I say to all other emperours, that they receiuing of me their approbation, vnction, consecration, and crowne imperiall, must not disdaine to submit their heads vnder me, and sweare vnto me the r allegeance. 19. For so you read in the Decree of Pope Iohn, how that princes heretofore haue been wont to bow and submit their heads vnto bishops, and not to proceed in iudgement against the heads of bishops. 20. If this reuerence and submission was wont to be giuen to bishops, how much more ought they to submit their heads to me being superiour, not onely to kings, but Emperours: and that for two causes: First for my title of succession that I Pope of Rome haue to the Empire, the roome standing vacant: also for the fulnesse of power that Christ the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords hath giuen to me though vnworthie in the person of Peter. 21. By reason whereof, seeing my power is not of man but of God, who by his celestiall providence hath set me ouer his whole vniuersall Church master and gouernour, it belongeth therefore to my office to looke vpon euerie mortall sinne of euerie Christian man: 22. Whereby all criminall offences as well of kings as all other, be subiect to my censure, 23. in such sort, that in all manner of pleading, if any matter of person at any time either before the sentence giuen or after shall appeale to me, it shall be lawfull for him so to do. 24. Neither must kings and princes thinke it much to submit themselues to my iudgement: for so did Valentianus the worthie emperour, so did Theodosius, and also Carolus. 25. Thus you see all must be iudged by me, and I of no man. Yea and though I pope of Rome, by my negligence or euill demeanour be found vnprofitable, or hurtfull, either to my selfe or others: yea if I should draw with me innumerable soules by heapes to hell, yet no mortall man be so hardie, so bold, or so presumptuous to reprone me, 26. or say to me: Domine cur ita facis: that is, Sir why do you so? 27. For although you reade that Balaam was rebuked of his asse, by the which asse our subiects, by Balaam the prelats are signified: yet that ought to be no example to our subiects to rebuke vs. 28 And though we reade in the Scripture, that Peter, vpo receiued power of the kingdome, and being chiefe of the Apostles, might by vertue of his office controll all other, was content to come and giue answere before his inferiours, obiecting to him his going to the Gentiles, yet other inferiours must not learne by this example to be checkmate with their prelats, because that Peter so tooke it at their hands, shewing thereby rather a dispensation of humilitie, then the power of his office: by the which power he might haue said to them againe in this wise: It becommeth not thee, nor belongeth to their office to accuse their shepheard, &c. 29. For else why was Dioscorus Patriarch of Alexandria condemned and excommunicated at Chalcedone? not for any cause of his faith, but only for that he durst stand against pope Leo, and durst excommunicate the bishop of Rome: for who is he that hath authoritie to accuse the seate of Saint Peter? 30 Albeit I am not ignorant what Saint Jerome writeth, that Paul would not haue reprehended Peter, vnlesse he had thought himselfe equall vnto him. 31. Yet Hierome must thus be expounded by my interpretation, that this equalitie betwixt Peter and Paul consisteth not in the office of dignitie, but in parenesse of conuersation. 32. For who gaue Paul his license to preach but Peter, and that by the authoritie of God, saying: Separate to me Paul and Barnabas? &c. 33. Therefore be it knowen to all men, ỹ my church of Rome is Hauing both twoords in my power, both of the spirituall and temporall iurisdiction, 62. so farre surmounting the authoritie of the emperour, that I of mine owne power alone without a councell haue authoritie to depose him, or to transferre his kingdome and to giue a new election, as I did to Frederiche and diuers other, 63. What power then or potestate in all the world is comparable to me: who haue authoritie to bind and lose both in heauen and earth? 64. That is, who haue power both of heauenly things, and also of temporall things, 65. To whom emperors and kings be more inferior, then lead is inferiour to gold, 66. For doe you not se the necks of great kings and princes bend vnder our knees, yea and thinke themselues happie and well deferred, if they may kisse our hands? 67. Wherefore the fauntiesse of Honorius the emperour is to be reprehended, and his constitution abolished, who with his laitie would take vpon him to intermeddle, not onlie with the temporall order, but also with matters ecclesiasticall and election of the pope. 68. But here perase some will obiect the examples and words of Christ, saying, that his kingdome is not of this world, and where hee being required to diuide betwixt two brethren their heritage, did refuse it. But that ought to be no preiudice to my power, 69. For if Peter, and I in Peter, if we I say, haue power to bind and lose in heauen, how much more then is it to bee thought, that we haue power in earth to lose and to take away empires, kingdoms, dukedoms, and what else so euer no: tall men may haue, and to giue them where we will? 70. And if we haue authoritie ouer Angels, which bee the gouernors of princes, what then may we doe vpon their inferiors and seruants? 71. And so that you shall not marueil that I say, Angels be subiect to vs, you shall heare what my blessed clerke Antonius writeth of the matter, saying, that our power, of Peter and me, is greater then the angels in foure things: In iurisdiction, 2. in administration of sacraments, 3. in knowledge, 4. and in reward, &c. 72. And againe in Bulla Clementis, doe I not there command in my bull, the Angels of Paradise to absolue the soule of man out of Purgatorie, and to bring it into the glorie of Paradise? 73. And now besides my heauenly power, to speake of mine earthlie iurisdiction, who did first translate the empire from the Grecbes to the Almaines, but I? 74. Did not I Alexander 3. suspend all the realme and churches of England for the kings marriage? an. 1159. 88. But what boe I speake of kings? did not I the said Alexander bring the valiant emperour Fredericke the first to Venice, by reason of his sonne Otho there taken prisoner, and there in S. Markes Church made him fall downe flat vpon the ground while I set my foot vpon his necke, saying the verse of the Psalme; Super aspidem & basiliscum ambulabis? &c. 89. Did not I Adrianus pope, an Englishman borne, excommunicate William king of Sicile, and refuse his peace, which he offered? and had not hee ouercome me in plaine field, I would haue shaken him out of his kingdoome of Sicile, and dukedome of Apulia. 90. Also did not I the said Adrianus, controle and correct the foresaid Fredericus emperor, for holding the left stirrup of my horse when he should haue holden the right? 91. and afterward did not I excommunicate and curse him, for that he was so saucie to set his owne name in writing afore mine? 92. And although a pope die afterward ouercame and strangled me, yet I made kings and emperors to stoope. 93. Did not I Innocentius 3. detect Philippus, brother to Fredericus, from the Imperiall crowne, being elected without my leaue, and after set him vp againe? & also set vp Otho of Brunswicke, and after did excommunicate and also depose the same 4. pères, setting vp the French king to war against him. 94. Then was Fredericus 2. by me set vp and raigned 27. pères; and yet 5. pères before he died. 95. Did not I Honorius interdict him, for not restoring certain to their possessions at my request? 96. Whom also Gregorius 9. did excommunicate twice together, and raiset vp the Venetians against him. 97. And at length Innocentius spoken him of his Empire: after that he caused him to bee poisoned, at length to be strangled by one Manfredus, and did excommunicate his sonne Conradus after him, not onely depriuing him of his right inheritance, but also caused him with Fredericke duke of Austria to be beheaded. 98. Thus then did not I excommunicate and depose all these emperours in order? Henricus 4. Henricus 5. Fredericus 2. Philippus Otho 4. Fredericus 2. and Conradus his sonne? 99. Did not I interdict king Henry the 8. 100. and all his kingdom of England? 101. And had not his prudence and power preuented my practise, I had displaced him from his kingdom also. Briefly, who is able to comprehend the greatnesse of my power and of my seat? 102. For by me onely generall councels take their force and confirmation, 103. and the interpretation of the said councels, and of all other causes hard and doubtfull, ought to be referred and stand to my determination; 104. By me the workes of all writers, what soeuer they bee, either bee reproued or allowed: 105. Then how much more ought my writings and decrees to be preferred before all other? 106. Insomuch that my letters and epistles decretall be equivalent with generall councels: 107. And where as God hath ordained all causes of men, to be iudged by men, he hath only reserued me, that is, the pope of Rome, without all question of men, vnto his owne iudgement: 108. And therefore where all other creatures be vnder their Iudge, onely I which in earth am the iudge of all, can bee iudged of none, either of emperour, nor the whole clergie, nor of kings, nor of the people. 109. For who hath power to iudge vpon his iudge? 110. This iudge am I, and that alone, without any other assistance of any councel ioyned to mee. For I haue power vpon councels, councels haue no power vpon me. But if the councell determine amisse, it is in my authority alone to interrupt it, or to condemn them I lust without any councell: 111. And all for the preheminence of my predecessour blessed Saint Peter, which by the voice of the Lord, hee receiued, and euer shall retaine. 112. Further more, and whereas all other sentences and iudgements both of councels, person or persons, may and ought to bee examined, 113. for that they may be corrupted soure waies, by feare, by gifts, by hatred, by fauour: onely my sentence and iudgement must stand, 114. as giuen out of heauen by the mouth of Peter himselfe, which no man must, 115. breake, nor retract, 116. For man must dispute of doubt of, 117. But if my iudgement, Statute, or yoke seeme scarcely tollerable, yet for reuerence of S. Peter it must be humbly obaied. 118. Yea and moreouer obedience is to be giuen, not onely to such decrees set forth by me in time of my popedome, but also to such as I doe foresee and commit to writing before I be pope. 119. And although it be thought by some writers, to be giuen to all men to erre, and to be deceiued. 120. yet neither am I a pure man, 121. and again, the sentence of my apostolicke seat is alwaies conceiued with such moderation, is concoct and digested with such patience and prudence, and deliuered out with such grauitie of deliberation, that nothing is thought in it necessarie to be altered or retracted, 122. Wherefore it is manifest, and testified by the voice of holie bishops, that the dignitie of this my seat is to be reuerenced thorough the whole world, in that all the faithfull submit themselues to it as to the head of the whole bodie, 123. Wherefore it is spoken to mee by the Prophet, speaking of the arke: If this be bumbled, whither shal you run for succour, and where shall your glorie become? Seeing then this is so, that so holy bishops and scriptures doe witnesse with me, what shall we say then to such as will take vpon them to iudge of my doings, to reprehend my proceedings, or to require homage and tribute of me to whom all other are subiect? 124. Against the first text the Scripture speaketh, Deut. Thou oughtest not to put thy sithe into another mans corne. thing to attempt against me, that is it but plaine sacrilege? Which 125. According to my canons, which thus define sacrilege to consist in three things, either when a mã iudgeth of his princes iudgement: or when the holy day is prophaned, or when reuerence is not giuen to lawes and canons, 126. Against the second text maketh the place of the booke of Kings, where we read the arke of God was brought from Gaba to Hierusalem, and in the way the arke inclining by reason of the vnrulie Oren, Dzias the Leuit put to his hand to helpe, and therefore was stricken of the Lord. By this arke is signified the prelates: by the inclination thereof, the fall of prelats, 127. which also be signified by the angels that Iacob did see going vp and comming downe the ladder: 128. Also by the Prophet where he saith: Hee bowed downe the heauens and came downe, &c. By Dzias, and by the vnrulie Oren are meant our subiects, 129. Then like as Dzias was stricken for putting his hand to the arke inclining, no more must subiects rebuke their prelats going awry, 130. Albeit heere may be answered againe, that all be not prelates which so be called: for it is not the name that maketh a bishop, but his life, 131. Against the third text of such as would bring vs vnder the tribute and oracions of secular men, maketh the new Testament, where Peter was bidde giue the groate in the fishes mouth, but not the head nor the bodie of the fish: No more is the head or bodie of the Church subdued to kings, but only that which is in the mouth, that is, the externe things of the Church. And yet nor they neither, 132. For so wee read in the book of Gen. that Pharao in time of dearth subdued all the land of the Egyptians, but yet he ministred to the priests, so that he toke neither their possessions from them, nor their libertie. If then the prelats of the Church must be neither iudged, nor reprehended, nor oraced, how much more ought I to be free from the same? 133. Which am the bishop of bishops, and head of prelats, 134. For it is not to bee thought that the case betwixt mee and other prelates: betwixt my sea and other Churches, bee is giuen to Peter, 153. and to me in Peter, being his successor, 154. who is he then in all the world that ought not to bee subiect to my decrees which haue such power, in heaven, in hell, in earth, with the quicke and also the dead? 155. commanding and granting in my bull of lead sent to Vienna, vnto all such as died in their peregrination to Rome, that the paine of hell should not touch them: And also that all such as take the holy crosse vpon them, should euery one at his request not only bee deliuered himselfe, but also deliuer three or foure soules whomsoeuer he would, out of purgatorie: 156. Againe, hauing such promise and assurance that my faith shall not faile, who then will not beleeue my doctrine? For did not Christ himselfe first pray for Peter that his faith should not faile? 157. Also haue I not a sure promise of Pauls owne mouth, writing to my Church by these words: God is my witnesse whom I serue in my spirit, in the Gospell of his sonne, that without ceasing I make mention of you alwaies in my prayers? Rom. 1. 158. Wherefore as I condemne all such worthily, which will not obay my decrees to be dispossessed of all their honour, without restitution, 159. So will they that beleeue not my doctrine, or stand against the priuiledge of the church, especially the church of Rome, I pronounce them heretickes: 160. And as the other before is to bee called Iudah, so this man is to bee called an heretike: 161. For whosoeuer goeth against the faith which goeth against her, she is the mother of faith: 162. But here may rise perease a doubt or scruple, that if my faith and knowledge stand so sure by the promise of Christ, and by the continuall prayer of S. Paul: whether is it true, or is to be granted that any other should excell me in knowledge, or interpretation of holy scripture: 163. For looke whose knowledge is grounded on most reason, his words shall seeme to be of more authoritie, 164. Wherunto I answer and grant, that many there be and haue been more abundantly indued with fuller grace of the holy Ghost and greater excellencie of knowledge; and therefore that the tractations of Augustine, Hierome and others ought to be preferred before the constitutions of diuers popes: yet I saw in determination of causes, because they haue not the vertue and height of that authoritie, which is giuen to me; therefore in expounding of scriptures they are to be preferred, but in deciding of matters they stand inferiour to my authoritie. 165. By vertue of which authoritie, 165. both they themselues bee alleaged for doctors, and their workes approoued, and also all other matters bee rul'd through the power of the keies which is giuen to me in the vicarie of Christ. Although I denie not but the same keies bee also committed to other prelates, as they were to other apostles besides Peter, 166. yet it is one thing to haue the keies, another thing to haue the vse of the keies: 167. Wherefore here is to be noted a distinction of keies, after the minde of my schoole doctors: one key which is called Clauis ordinis, hauing authoritie to bind and lose, but not ouer the persons whom they bind and loose, and this authoritie they take not immediatlie of Christ, but mediatlie by me the vicar of Christ. The other key is called Clauis iurisdictionis, which I the vicar of Christ take immediately of him, hauing not onlie authoritie to bind and loose, but also dominion ouer them on whom this key is exercised. By the iurisdiction of which key, the fulnesse of my power is so great, that whereas all other are subiects, 168. yea and emperours themselues ought to subdue their executions to me: Onelie I am subiect to no creature, 169. no not to my selfe, except I list, in foro penitentiæ, to my ghostlie father submitting my selfe as a sinner, but not as pope: So that my papall maiestie euer remaineth vnminished. Superiour to all men, 170. whom all persons ought to obay, 171. and follow, 172. whom no man must iudge nor accuse of any crime, either of murder, adulterie, simonie, or such like, 173. No man depose, but I my selfe, 174. No man can excommunicate me, yea though I communicat with the excommunicate, for no canon bindeth me. Whom no man must lie to, 175. For he that lieth to me is a Church robber, 176. And who obayeth not me is an heretike, and an excommunicate person, 177. For like as all the Iewes were commanded to obay the high priest of the Leuiticall order, of what state or condition so euer they were; so are all Christian men more and lesse bound to obay mee Christs lieutenant in earth. Concerning the obedience or disobedience of whom, we haue in Deu. 17. 178. Where the common Glosse saith, that he who denieth to the hie priest Obedience, lieth vnder the sentence of condemnation, as much as hee that denieth to God his Omnipotentiam. Thus then appeareth, that the greatnes of my priesthood, 179. begun in Melchisedech, solemnized in Aaron, continued in the children of Aaron, perfectionated in Christ, represented in Peter, exalted in the vniuersall iurisdiction, and manifested in Siluester, &c. So that through this Preheminence of my priesthood, hauing all things subiect to me, 180. it may seeme well verified in me that was spoken of Christ, Psal. 8. Omnia subiecisti sub pedibus eius, oues & boues, & vniuersa pecora campi. Volucres cœli & pisces maris, &c. Thou hast subdued all things vnder his feet, sheepe and oxen, and all cattell of the field, the birds of heauen, and fish of the sea, &c. 181. Where it is to be noted, that by oxen, Iewes and heretikes, by cattell of the field, Pagans bee signified. For although as yet they bee out of the vse of my keies of binding and losing, yet they be not out of the iurisdiction of my keies, but if they returne I may absolue them, 182. By sheep and al cattell, are meant al Christian men both great and lesse, whether they bee emperours, princes, prelats or other. By birds of the aire you may vnderstand the angels and potestates of heauen, who be all subiect to me, in that I am greater then the angels, and that in foure things as is afore declared: and haue power to bind and lose in heauen, 182. and to giue heauen to them that fight in my warres. 184. Lastlie, by the fishes of the sea, are signified the soules departed in paine or in purgatorie, as Gregorie by his prayer deliuered the soule of Traianus out of hell, and I haue power to deliuer out of purgatorie whom I please, 185. Lastly, by the fishes of the sea, are signified such as be in purgatorie: inasmuch that they stand in need and necessitie of other mens helpe, and yet bee in their iourny Viatores, & de foro Papæ. i. passengers and belonging to the court of the pope: therefore they may be releeued out of the storehouse of the Church, by the participation of indulgence. And forasmuch as some doe obiect that my pardons cannot extend to them that be departed, for that it was said to Peter: What soeuer thou shalt loose vpon earth; and therefore seeing they are not vpon earth, they cannot bee losed of me: Here I answer againe by my doctors, that this word Super terram, &c. i. vpon the earth, may be referred two manner of waies: first to him that is the looser, so that he which shall lose shall be vpon the earth. And so I graunt that the pope being dead can loose no man. Also it may be referred to him that is loosed, so that whatsoeuer is loosed must be vpon the earth, or about the earth. And so the soules in purgatorie may be losed, which albeit they are not vpon the earth, yet they are about the earth, at least they be not in heauen. And because oftentimes one question may rise vpon another, and the heads of men now adaies are curious, a man hearing now that I can deliuer out of purgatorie, will aske here a question; Whether I be able also to empticie all purgatorie at once, or not. To whom my Canonist August. de Ancho. doth answere by a triple diffinction: Quantum ad absolutam meam iurisdictionem, quantum ad ordinatam executionem, quantum ad diuinam acceptationem. First, touching my absolute iurisdiction, he saith, I am able to rid out all purgatorie together, for as many as be vnder my iurisdiction, as all be, except only infants vnbaptised. In Limbo dwell men departed onely, Cum baptismo flaminis, that is, with the baptisme of the spirit: and such as haue no friends to doe for them that wherefore pardons be giuen: these onely excepted. For all other besides, the pope (he saith) hath power to release all purgatorie at once, as touching his absolute iurisdiction. Albeit Thomas Aquine, part 4. denieth the same, forsomuch as Christ himselfe (hee saith) when hee came downe, did not vtterly at once release all purgatorie. As touching my ordinarie execution they hold, that I may if I will, but I ought not to doe it. Thirdly, as concerning the diuine acceptation, that is, how God would accept it if I did it, that (they say) is vnknowne vnto them, and to euery creature, yea, and to the pope himselfe.

And to the intent I would all men to see and vnderstand that I lacke not witnesses moe besides these, if I list to bring them out, you shall heare the whole quire of my diuine clergie brought out, with a full voice testifying in my behalfe, in their bookes, tractations, distinctions, titles, Glosses, and Summaries, as by their owne words here followeth. The pope (say they) being the vicar of Jesus Christ thorough the whole soeuer this my sée shall enact, appoynte or dispoose, all men ought to appeale or repeale the same, without either iudging, disputing, doubting or retracting. Such is the priuiledge giuen of Christ in the behalfe of Peter, to the Church of Rome, 186. that what soeuerie Sacer, Burgoone or prouince, chusing to themselues bishops and ministers, although they agree with all other Christs faithfull people in the name of Iesu, that is in faith and charitie, beleeuing in the same God, and in Christ his true son, and in the holy Ghost, hauing also the same Creed: the same Euangelists and Scriptures of the Apostles: yet not withstanding vnlesse their bishops and ministers take their origine and ordination from this apostolicall seate, they are to bee counted not of the Church. So that succession of faith onlie is not sufficient to make a Church, except the ministers take their ordination by them which haue their succession from the Apostles. So their faith, supremacie, the chaire of Peter, keies of heauen, power to bind and loose, all these be inseparable to the Church of Rome: so that it is to be presumed, that God alwaies prouiding, and saint Peter helping the bishopriche and diocese of Rome, shall neuer fall from the faith. And likewise it is to be presumed and presupposed that the bishop of that Church, is alwaies good and holy. Yea, and though he be not alwaies good, or be destitute of his owne merits, yet the merits of Saint Peter, predecessour of that place, be sufficient for him, who hath bequeathed and left a perpetuall dowrie of merits, with inheritance of innocencie to his posteritie, 187. yea, though hee fall into homicide or adulterie, hee may sinne, but yet he cannot be accused, but rather excused by the murders of Sampson, the thefts of the Hebrues, the adulterie of Iacob, 188. And likewise, if any of his clergie should be found embracing a woman, it must be expounded and presupposed that he doth it to bless her. Furthermore, the pope (say they) hath all the dignities, and all power of all patriarches. In his primacie, hee is Abel: In gouernment, the arke of Noe: In patriarchdome, Abraham: In order, Melchisedech: In dignitie, Aaron: In authoritie, Moses: In seate iudiciall, Samuell: In zeale, Helias: In meekenesse, Dauid: In power, Peter: In vnction, Christ. (Say thou art Ant christ) By power (they say) is greater then all the saints. For whom I confirme, no man may infirme: I may fauour and spare whom I please, 189. to take from one, and to giue to another. And if I be enemie to any man, all men ought to eschew that person forthwith, and not tarie and looke vnto I bid them so to do. All the earth is my diocese, and I the Ordinarie of all men, hauing the authoritie of the king of all kings vpon subiects. I am all in all, and aboue all, 190. so that God himselfe and I the vicar of God haue both one Consistorie, 191. and am able to doe almost all that God can doe, Clause non errante, 192. Item, it is said of me, that I haue an heauenly arbitrement, and therefore am able to change the nature of things, Substantialia vnius applicando alteri, and of nothing to make things to be: and of a sentence that is nothing to make it stand in effect: In all things that I list, my will to stand for reason. For I am able by the law to dispense aboue the law, and of wrong to make iustice, in correcting lawes and changing them. You haue heard hitherto sufficiently out of my doctors. Now you shall heare greater things out of mine owne decrees, 193. Reade there Dist. 96. Satis, 194 Also 12. Cauf. 11. q. 1. cap. Sacerdotibus, 195. Also 12. q. 1. cap. Futurum. Doe you not find there expressed, how Constantinus the emperour sitting in the generall councell of Nice, called vs prelates of the Church, all Gods? 196. Againe, reade my canon Decretal. De transl. Episc. cap. Quanto. Do you not see there manifestlie expressed, how not man, but God alone separateth that which the bishop of Rome doth dissolue and separate? Wherefore if those things that I doe be said to be done not of man, but of God: What can you make me but God? Againe, if prelates of the Church be called and counted of Constantinus for gods, I then being aboue all prelats, seeme by this reason to bee aboue all Gods. Wherefore no marueil, if it bee in my power to change time and times, to alter and abrogate lawes, to dispense with all things, yea with the precepts of Christ. For where Christ bidden Peter put vp his sword, monished his disciples not to vse any outward force in reuenging themselues, 197. Do not I pope Nicolaus writing to the bishops of France, exhort them to drain out their materiall swords in purlining their enemies, and recouering their possessions, setting against the precept of Christ, the prophet saying: Dissolue colligationes impietatis, &c? Item, where Christ was present himselfe at the marriage in Cana Galilea, 198. doe not I pope Martinus in my distinction inhibite the spirituall clergie to be present at mariage feasts, and also to marry themselues? Item where matrimonie by Christ, cannot be loosed but onlie for whordome, 199. do not I pope Gregorius Iunior, writing ad Bonifacium permit the same to bee broken for impotencie or infirmitie of bodie? 200. Item, against the expresse caution of the Gospel, doth not Innocentius the fourth, permit vim vi repellere? 201. Likewise against the old testament. I doe dispense in not giuing tithes, 202. not I pope Martinus giue dispensation for the same? and notwithstanding the councell of Theron enacted the contrarie, yet with two Bulls I disanulled that decreement, 208. What should I speake of murder, making it no murder nor homicide to slay them that be excommunicate, 209. Likewise against the lawe of nature, 210. Item, against the apostle, 211. Also against the Canons of the Apostles: I can and doe dispense. For where they in their canon commaund a priest for fornication to be deposed. I through the authoritie of Syluester doe alter the rigour of that constitution, 212. considering the minds and bodies also of men now to be weaker then they were then, 213. Wherfore, against the vniuersall state of the Church I haue dispensation, scilicet quando status ecclesiæ non decoloratur: And for marriage in the second degree of consanguinity and affinitie, In collateralibus æquali linea, that is, betweene the brethrens children: although not inæquali linia, so that the vncle may not marrie his neece, vnlesse for an vrgent and weightie cause. As for all such contracts betwixt partie and partie, where that matrimony is not yet consummat by carnall copulation, it is but a small matter for me to dispense withall. In summa, if yee list briefly to heare the whole number of all such cases as properlie do appertaine to my papall dispensation, which come to the number of one and fiftie points, that no man may meddle withall but onely I my selfe alone, I will recite them first in Latine, then in English, as they be set forth in my canonicall doctors.

Dist. 32 cap. graue hæc. Verum.

These be the cases wherein I only haue power to dispense, and no man else, neither bishop, nor metropolitane, nor Legat, without a licence from me.

After that I haue now sufficiently declared my power in earth, in heauen, and in purgatorie, how great it is, and what is the fulnesse thereof, in binding, loosing, commanding, permitting, electing, confirming, deposing, dispensing, doing, and vndoing, &c. I will intreat now a little of my riches likewise and great possessions, that euery man may see by my wealth and abundance of all things, rents, tithes, tributes, my fishes, my purple miters, crownes, gold, siluer, pearles and gemmes, lands and lordships, how God here prospereth and magnifieth his vicar on the earth. For to mee pertaineth first the imperiall citie of Rome, the pallace of Laterane, the kingdome of Cicile is propper to me, Apulia and Capua, bee mine. Also the kingdome of England and Ireland, bee they not or ought to be tributaries to me? 214. To these I adioyne also, besides other prouinces and countries both in the Occident and Orient, from the North to the South, these dominions by name, 215. as Surrianum, Montembordon, & Lunæ insulam, Corsicæ regnum, Paruam Mantuam, Montenselete, Insulam Venetiarum, Ducatum Ferrariæ, Canellum, Caniodam, Ducatum Histriæ Dalmatiam, Exarchatum Rauennæ, Fauentiam, Cesenam, Castrum, Tiberiatus Roccam Mediolanum, Castrum Ceperianum, Castrum Cusianum, Terram Cornularian, Ducatum Armini, Contam, Montum ferretum, Montem Capitiiæ seu Olympicum, Castrum exforij, Robin, Eugubin, Virbin, forti Sempronij, Galli, & Senogalli, Anconam, Cosam, Ducatum Perusij, Vrbenetam, & Tudertum, Castrum Sinianum, Ducatum Spoletanum, Theanum, Calabriam, Ducatum Neapolim, Ducatum Beneuenti, Selernum, Sorrenti insulam, Cardiniam insulam, Anciæ insulam, Territorium Cutisan, Territorum prænestinum, Terram Silandis, Terram Clusium, Terram fundan, Terram vegetan, Terram Claudian, Terram Camisinam, Terram Fabinensem, Terram Siram, Terram portuensem, cum insula Archis, Terram Ostiensem cum maritimis, Ciuitatem Aquinensem, Ciuitatem lamentū, & Sufforariam, Ciuitatem Falisenam, Fidenam, Ferertum, Citernam, Neapolim, Caliopolim, with diuers other mo, 216. which Constantinus the emperour gaue vnto mee, not that they were not mine before he did giue them, 217. For in that I take them of him, I take them not as a gift as is afore mentioned) but as a restitution. And that I rendered them againe to Otho, I did it not for any dutie to him, but onlie for peace sake. What should I speake here of my bailie reuenues, of my first fruits, annats, palles, indulgences, bulles, confessionals, indults and rescripts, testaments, dispensations, priuiledges, elections, prebends, religious houses, and such like, which come to no small masse of money? Insomuch, that for one pall to the archbishop of Spentz, which was wont to be giuen for ten thousand 218. Florence, now it is growne to xxvj. thousand Florence, which I receiued of Iacobus the archbishop not long before Basill councell: Besides the fruits of other bishoprickes in Germany, comming to the number of fiftie, wherebp what bantage commeth vnto my coffers, it may partly be coniectured. But what should I speak of Germany, 219. when the whole world is my diocesse, as my canonists doe say, and all men are bound to beleeue, 220. except they will imagine (as the Manichies doe) two beginnings, which is false and hereticall. For Moses saith: In the beginning God made heauen and earth, and not in the beginnings, 221. Wherefore as I begun, so I conclude, commanding, declaring, and pronouncing, to stand vpon necessitie of saluation, for euerie humane creature to bee subiect to me.
